Moyſes notwithſtanding this departure of the garriſon Turks of TEMESVVAR, was yet maſter of the field, Baſta with his ſmall forces not daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, yet by far too ſtrong for him, the ſuccours from the Vayuod of VALACHIA beeing not yet come which he daily expected, howbeit that many hot skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the ſtragling ſoldiers on both ſides, as they by chance met together roaming abroad in the countrey ſeeking after bootie. Moyſes therefore ſeeing not any ſufficient enemie to appeare in field able to ſtay him, laid ſiege to CLAVDINOPLE, a great but weak citie, and not very wel manned; for that it was thought a place fitter by the weakneſſe thereof to weaken and deſtroy ſuch as ſhould vndertake the defence thereof, than ſufficient to be maintained by their valour. Neuertheleſſe, the garriſon ſouldiers and the inhabitants (more to make a ſhew of their fidelity and allegeance toward the Emperor, than for any hope they had to maintain the place) ſtanding vpon their guard & defence, Moyſes was conſtrained to plant his great ordnance againſt it, and to batter it, which he did, and in a very ſhort time with the fury of the cannon had beaten downe the bulwarkes and ſlankers thereof, and made a faire breach in the wall, ready how to haue giuen thereunto an aſſault, and to haue entred. Whereupon the beſieged not ignorant, Claudinople yeelded to Moyſes.

Moyſes ſendeth for his wife and familie to Temeſwar.

The Ianizaries of Tameſwar refuſe to deliuer Moyſes his wife and familie.

rant of their owne weakneſſe, came to parley, and agreed to giue vp the citie, the citizens hauing their liues, goods, libertie, and religion ſaued, to ſtay there ſtill, and the ſouldiers with G their armes and baggage to bee in ſafetie brought ouer the mountaines into ſome place of ſuretie. The taking of this citie much encouraged the rebell, reſolued there to make his reſiſtance, and the ſeat of his principalitie. Full eares of corne draw birds to pick vpon them, and the good fortunes of Generals, ſouldiers to follow them: they forſake none but ſuch as are before forſaken of their better fortunes; to become ſlaues vnto gaine, and enemies vnto honour. The Turkes and Tartars thirſting after theſe commodities, and allured with the ſmell of riches, repared thither on euery ſide, in ſuch ſort, that the army of Moiſes increaſed in number, his mind with hope, & his fortune with power. Armed with theſe aſſurances, he ſent for his wife & familie then at TEMESVVAR to come vnto him to CLAVDINOPLE, to be partakers with him of his good hap. And for that purpoſe ſent a conuoy of 400 Turks to con- H duct them on the way thither. Who being come to TEMESVVAR, and about to haue led the wife & family of Moſes out of the citie, were not ſuffered by the Ianizaries that had the garding of the towne, ſo to do: who told them, That the great Sultan had in former times found ſo many diſloialties, trecheries, & treaſons in the Hungarians, Tranſyluanians, and Valachians, to the great hurt and hinderance of his eſtate, that hee could no more aſſure himſelfe of them: and that doubting of the fidelitie of Moiſes, being a Tranſyluanian, hee was reſolued to keepe this gage for his more aſſurance: aſſuring him withall, That his wife and family being in his power, ſhould receiue nothing from him but fauour and grace, ſo long as he receiued from him the effects of his loyaltie, but that hee ſhould neuer hope to inioy them but in I TEMESVVAR, or ſome other ſuch like place aſſured for his ſeruice. Moſes aſtonied at this anſwer, was much mooued againſt the great Sultan; complained in his ſoule, that hauing ruinated his faith, his honor, & the welfare of his country, to aſſure him of his fidelitie towards him, hee yet doubted of his conſtancie, as if all theſe crimes did not bind him to ſerue him with his perſon for euer, were it euen but for feare of puniſhment from them whom hee had ſo grieuouſly offended.

In the meane time the ſuccours ſent from the Vayuod of VALACHIA were vpon the borders of TRANSYLVANIA vnder the conduct of Marſa the Vayuod his lieutenant, and Baſta was gathering together his forces, to recouer again his former ſtate; expecting euerie houre the comming of two thouſand horſemen out of SILECIA, with which vnited power hee K was in good hope to diſcomfit the rebel, & to recouer his former loſſes. Al which, Moſyes by his eſpials right well knew, and for the remedy thereof reſolued to march with thirtie thouſand men to meet with the Valachians, and to cut them off, before they could come far into TRANSYLVANIA, or ioine their forces with Baſta. For the furthering of which his purpoſe he had learned the place wherby they were to enter, their number, & the way they were to hold, the better to conduct his armie againſt them; and beeing in number more than three to one, alreadie aſſured himſelfe of the Victorie. All which fell out according to his deſire: for the Valachians comming on, being in number but eight thouſand, fell as it were a prey into his mouth. For needs fight they muſt, or die therefore, although the number were vnequall; for that to flie was more dangerous to the Valachians (hauing the Turkes & Tartarian L horſmen at their backs) than manfully to fight it out. Neceſſitie gaue courage vnto the weaker ſide, and feare cauſed them to performe more than they would haue done, had they had libertie to haue fled: yet for al that the greater number at length preuailed againſt the leſſe; ſo that after a great and mortall fight, wherin a great number of the Turkes and Tartars were ſlaine, the Valachians in the end were enforced to leaue their dead companions, their honor, and their tents, with all their baggage in the field, and to betake themſelues to flight; but not all in rout as freſh-water ſouldiers, but with often making ſtands, as men diſdayning by true valour, but onely with number oppreſſed, to bee ouercome. The rebels proud of their victorie, and now fearing no more harme, forthwith gaue themſelues to the rifling of the enemies campe, diuided the ſpoyle, and filling the heauens with the noyſe of their trumpets, publiſhing thereby the trophies of their victorie. Which diſorder the Valachians perceiuing, and thereof couceiuing hope of ſome good to bee done, turned head, and ſerred cloſe together, cuoragiouſly thruſt themſelues into the midſt of theſe proud and tryumphant victors. Which vnexpected thunderclap ſo diſmaied them and troubled their wits, that ſurpriſed in diſorder, with their hands full of ſpoils in ſtead of weapons, they could neither recouer their courage, nor put themſelues againe in order. Such confuſion maketh men oftentimes to feele the blowes of death, before they be aware of the armie that giueth the ſame: ſo, of theſe men ſo confounded, ſome ſtood as men amazed, otherſome ran away to ſaue themſelues, and otherſome ſtood vpon their defence, but all were alike ſlaine: ſo that in fine, this great armie was for the moſt part cut in pieces, and the reſt put to flight. Moyſes himſelfe was there among the reſt ſlaine, worthy for his treaſon to haue been reſerued to a more ſhamefull death.

Moyſes with his army by the Valachians ouerthrowne, and himſelfe ſlaine

Of this victorie the Vayuod by letters certified Baſta, to whom he ſent fiue and twenty of the enemies enſignes for an honourable preſent, with this ioyfull newes of the death and ouerthrow of the rebell; whoſe bodie as the Vayuod writ, was found dead among the midſt of the dead, ſlaine euen at the firſt charge, wherein his gaurd was ouerthrowne. And for that it was commonly beleeued, that hee was not yet dead, neither preſent at that battell, as ſome had giuen it out, to manifeſt the contrarie vnto the world, and by his example to terrifie others, his head was vpon a lance ſet vp at CAROLSTAD for all men to behold: a preferment well beſeeming ſuch an ambitious head, as had made ſo great troubles, and beene the death of ſo many Chriſtians.

Moyſes his head vpon a lance ſet vp at Carolſtad

This rebell ſuppreſſed, another by and by ſtart vp, called Albert Nage, who gathering together the rebels of TRANSILVANIA, mingled with certain Turkes, Tartars, Coſſackes, and Moldauians, all together amounting to the number of ſix thouſand, made head towards LIPPA. Againſt whom, Baſta with all ſpeed ſent foorth three thouſand Haiduckes well acquainted with the countrey, which ſometimes ſerued them to better purpoſe than their armes, for that the rebels ſought not ſo much to come to a ſet battell, and to trie the matter by true valour, as by taking the aduantages of places, to delay the time and gaine purchaſe, the chiefe end of their rebellion. Theſe rebels the Haiduckes ſurpriſed, neere vnto a Caſtle called FERRE, where they meant to haue lodged, and charged them. Who ſo vpon the ſuddaine ouertaken, and ignorant of their enemies power, ſuppoſing them to haue beene more in number than indeed they were, made ſmall reſiſtance, but as a many of raſcalls, gathered by villanie, and without truſting of one another, by flight prouided euery man for himſelfe as hee might. In which flight, the greateſt number of them were ſlaine, and their chiefetaine with much adoe ſaued, to be at another time for his euill deſerts iuſtly executed.

New rebels in Tranſyluania diſcomfited.

Baſta by theſe good haps, and the aid of the Vayuod of VALACHIA, being again become maſter of the field, in very ſhort time after had again reduced all TRANSYLVANIA vnder the Emperours obeyſance; vnto whom, he together with the Vayuod, for an honorable preſent and a teſtimonie of their good ſeruice, ſent to VIENNA, and from thence to PRAGE, an hundred enſignes gained from the rebels. All which with ſome other rich ſpoils, the maſter of the Ceremonies in great pompe and triumph led, together with Moyſes the late rebels horſe, exceeding richly furniſhed with furniture of pure gold, and was for his paines by the Emperor rewarded with a chaine of gold, ſent vnto him by the Countie Fuſtenberg.

An honourable preſent by the L. Baſta ſent vnto the Emperour.

The troubles of TRANSYLVANIA thus once again quieted, Baſta reſoluing again to beſiege TEMESVVAR, with his power marched towards LIPPA, there to meet with the forces of the Vayuod of VALACHIA, the better to vndertake and perform the intended exploit. His army conſiſted of twenty thouſand men ſtrong, carrying with them fiue and twenty pieces of great ordnance, furniſhed with al things neceſſarie. And of the enterpriſe it ſelfe euery man had good hope, aſwell for the ſufficiencie of him the generall that had vndertaken it, as for the want of reliefe that was not any way like to be brought vnto the beſieged. But while hee ſo lay at the ſiege thereof, his ſouldiers too greedily and exceſſiuely feeding vpon fruit whereof (there was that yeare great ſtore) fell ſo into the bloudie flyx, and thereof in ſuch number died (although hee had giuen moſt ſtrait commaund, That none ſhould be eaten, or vpon great penalties be brought into the camp) that he was glad to riſe with his armie and be gone.

Whileſt this was in doing, the Countie Solmes lying in garriſon at CAROLSTAD, tooke vpon him to ſurpriſe WISCENBOVRG, and ſetting forth but with foure hundred ſoldiers of his garriſon, with wonderfull diligence ſurpriſed the place, and without any great reſiſtance reſiſtance became maſters therof. But the citizens ouer-grieued with the inſolent outrages of theſe men of war, opened the gates of their town vnto the rebels of TRANSILVANIA, euen then fled from the late ouerthrow: who full of reuenge, took the place, and beeing too ſtrong for the Countie & his ſoldiers, made ſuch ſlaughter of them in the ſtreets (they of the town out of their windows, and from the tops of their houſes helping them) that of al thoſe which the Countie brought with him, there were but 60 left aliue; who all taken, were together with the Countie thruſt into a ſtrong and loathſome priſon.

A great army of the chriſtians.

Now the bruit of the comming of the Turks great army into HVNGARIE had awaked the Chriſtian forces to aſſemble themſelues together, and to do their indeuour to withſtand the ſame; ſo that a number of companies were raiſed in GERMANIE, who came into HVNGARY marching towards STRIGONVM, where the army was to be aſſembled. The good ſucceſſe of things paſt, the opinion men had of the Turks troubles with his rebels, and the great promiſes of the emperor, drew many into theſe liſts of honor; in ſuch ſort, that there were come together an army of fiue and twenty thouſand foot, and tenne thouſand horſe; all good and braue companies, well appointed and well conducted. Of this braue and gallant armie the Lord Ruſſworm was for this yeare appointed Generall; who therewith marched within the ſight of STRIGONIVM, to aſſure the inhabitants of reliefe, if the enemie ſhould chance to beſiege them, as the newes then went. About three weeks this armie lay there by encamped, attending the comming of the reſt of the forces, which were to ſtrengthen and make vp the ſame; during which time the Generall diſpoſed of all things neceſſarie for the keeping of STRIGONIVM, and put into the fort of S. Andrew neere vnto it three thouſand Lanſquenets for reliefe of the citie: which done, he remooued with his armie toward PESTH, & encamped within a league therof toward the weſt, reſolued ſo to croſſe the deſignes of the enemie if he ſhould atempt to beſiege this place (as it was doubted he would) & in hope that the preſeruation thereof might in time be a cauſe for the winning of BVDA, and a mean to impeach the enemies forces.

The Turks army of 100000 men in field.

The Turks army within a few daies after vpon a contrary deſigne conducted for the winning of PESTH (& reſolued to raiſe the Chriſtians campe) in number an hundred thouſand men, came, & face to face incamped within the ſight of the Chriſtian army on the other ſide of the riuer Danubius. In the meane time whileſt they ſo lay, certaine cowardly ſoldiers, of PESTH, more in loue with their bellies than with their honour, by ſtealth fled out of their garriſon in PESTH to the Turks ouer againſt them in BVDA, ſhamefully crauing of them victuals; whom the Turks being themſelues almoſt in as great want, yet bounteouſly relieued.

The ſhameful flight of certain of the garriſon ſoldiers of Peſth vnto the Turks at Buda.

Beſides that, the Baſſa of BVDA to corrupt the reſt of their fellows, cauſed theſe renegate fugitiues to be entertained with double pay: who therefore gaue the Baſſa a thouſand thanks, extolling his bountie vnto the heauens, & from the walls inuited their companions to do as they had done, and ſo to become pertakers of ſuch bountie and pleaſure as they were. Howbeit theſe fugitiues nothing profited the Baſſa, either by their perſuaſion or example: for albeit that they from the mouth of the Baſſa promiſed vnto their companions plentie of victuals, good entertainment, & foure months pay more, yet was there not any of them which hearkened or gaue eare vnto their allurements: but rather the more to aſſure their commanders of their fidelitie, of themſelues offred to be ſworn again vnto their allegeance vnto the Emperour, and to dy in the place rather than to forſake it. Yet was the want of victuals then in PESTH great, and the garriſon therewith extreamely pinched, fed almoſt as much with hope, as with that little which was left them. Neither was it long after, but that according to their deſires the 15 of May a great ſhip arriued there, laded with wine and victuals ſufficient for the reliefe of their preſent neceſſities. Of the comming of which ſhip, the Turke hauing heard, attended the paſſage therof in the Iſle, to haue intercepted it. Of which their purpoſe the garriſon ſoldiers of PESTH hauing knowledge, & armed with neceſſitie, ſallied out vpon them, and killing a number of them, inforced the reſt to quit the place. This ſhip was but the forerunner of greater ſuccors; for ſhortly after followd a number of other ſhips: which arriuing at PESTH, laden with victuals and other neceſſaries, filled the place with as great plentie, as there had been before want. Which ſupply was conducted vnto PESTH by 500 harquebuſiers of STRIGONIVM, the Turks from BVDA looking on, but not daring or not able to ſtay the ſame.

A It fortuned at the ſelfeſame time, that a Captaine of the Turks fled from Alba-Regalis to Rab, ſhewed vnto the Chriſtians there the way and the meane how they might come to the ſuburbs of Alba-Regalis, and take the ſpoile of the ſame, yea and happily, as things might fall out, finde occaſion to ſurpriſe the towne it ſelfe alſo; offering himſelfe to be the guide in the ſame action. And albeit that this Turke was an enemy to be feared and diſtruſted, yet the Chriſtian ſouldiers as men deſirous both of honor and of prey, and induced alſo with the probabilitie of the attempt, gaue credit vnto him, and embraced the ſame. Neither failed he of his promiſe, neither the Chriſtians of their deuoire in performance of the exploit. For the two garriſons of Rab and Strigonium aſſembled together, by the leading of this Turke ſurpriſed the ſuburbs of Alba-Regalis, ſlew all them that made reſiſtance, rifled them on all hands, ſet them B on fire, and ſo laded with riches and ſpoile, returned home againe in ſafetie.

The ſuburbs of Alba Regalis by the Chriſtians ſacked and burnt.

At the ſame time alſo the Chriſtians on the other ſide Danubius gathered an head together to conduct another conuoy of victuals into Peſth, with a reſolution to march with the ſame through the plaine field at noone time of the day, euen in the eye of the enemie, ſo to braue him. And to this purpoſe the Lo. Nadaſti was there preſent with a good number of Hungarians, Colonell Mesbourg with a Regiment of Almaines, and the Countie Thurn with a number of Huſſars, all good ſouldiers and men of courage, deſirous to haue made proofe thereof vpon their enemies. This conuoy, with the trumpets gallantly ſounding, brauely marched ouer the plaine at mid day, the Turks from the wals of Buda beholding the ſame, but not daring to aduenture vpon it. And ſo Peſth for want of victuals before diſtreſſed, was now both by water C and by land plentifully relieued.

Another conuoy of victuals by land put into Peſth.

The Chriſtians the laſt yeare hauing left the ſiege of Buda for the reaſons before written, in their returne tooke the Caſtle of Adom, ſeated vpon the banke of Danubius, about two leagues from Buda, and for the keeping thereof, left therein a garriſon of Haiducks. This Caſtle was commodious for the annoying of the Turks in Buda, and for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in Peſth, for that it impeacheth the bringing of victuals vnto the one, and fauoured the victualling of the other. The good and faithfull defence of which place, theſe Haiducks vndertooke to the vttermoſt of their power, vpon their honor and credit, as they would be accounted valiant and couragious men: but yet refuſed to be bound by oath to render an account of the place, whatſoeuer might befall, a thing (as they truly ſaid) aboue their forces, & more than was in their power to performe. Theſe men now vpon the bruit of the comming of the Turks great army afraid of their ſhadowes, hauing before truſſed vp their baggage, ſet fire on the Caſtle, and ſo departed, retiring themſelues to Strigonium: where examined by the Gouernour Althem of the cauſe of their flight, and what enemies had chaſed them thence, and being not able to make therefore any excuſe, neither to yeeld thereof any reaſon more than their imaginarie feare, were by his commandement impriſoned, there to remaine, vntill order were taken by the Generall of the armie for their further puniſhment.

The caſtle of Adom vpon a vaine feare forſaken by the Haiducks, who had the keeping thereof.

Sultan Mahomet now wallowing amidſt his ſenſuall delights in Conſtantinople, yet found not therein ſo full contentment, but that his pleaſures had alſo their griefes fully mixt with them. In Conſtantinople, the ſtrong ſeat of his mightie Empire, hee was in the midſt of the inſolencies and mutinies of his proud Baſſaes and tumultuous Ianizaries, and abroad he was in warres both againſt his rebellious ſubiects in Aſia, and the Chriſtians in Europe. Vnto all which troubles hee ſaw not how to giue remedie at once, and therefore reſolued (if it were poſſible) firſt to appeaſe the troubles abroad with his rebellious ſubiects in Aſia, as more deſirous to be at peace with his owne ſubiects than with ſtrangers: howbeit, that the puniſhing of rebellion is more neceſſarie in a Prince for the maintenance of his State, than is warre againſt a ſtranger for the conquering of a new Countrie or Kingdome; the one preuenting the danger hanging ouer his head, the other ſeruing but his vaine and ambitious deſire: ſo hee preferring peace with the rebels his ſubiects before peace with the Chriſtians his enemies, reſolued (as I ſaid) to pacifie the firſt, the more eaſily to ruinate the other. But whether he vpon good faith or vpon policie entered into this reſolution, and whether indeed hee meant plainely with theſe Rebels, or but onely to deceiue them, is hard to ſay. Howbeit, as the ſequell of the matter ſhewed, falſhood and treacherie was the ground of all this buſineſſe both on the one ſide and the other. For theſe men reſpecting only the ſafety and aſſurance of their eſtate, held all other actions to them indifferent, whether they were good or bad, ſo that they ſerued to that effect:

Mahomet in vain ſeeketh to make peace with the rebels in Aſia.

Hhhhh and

and nouriſhed with the ſame milke of Infidelitie that their Prince was, trained vp in the ſame ſchoole, and foſtered with the ſame aire, feared in him againſt them, that which they felt in themſelues againſt him. An hard matter it is to aſſure minds fraught with like craft, ſubtiltie, and deceit, and poſſeſſed with like diſtruſt one of them of another. Howbeit Mahomet ſpared no kind of cunning to deceiue theſe craftie and ſubtill men; offering vnto them, together with his gracious pardon, great preferments, dignities, & honours, ſo that they would but yeeld to him their due obedience, lay downe their armes, and no more take vp the ſame but in his ſeruice. But theſe wily foxes knew right well, that the promiſes of faithleſſe Princes coſt them nothing but words, the honor & credit whereof they regarded not, ſo that thereby they might attaine vnto the effect of their deſires, which they eſteemed aboue all other things: ſo that for them to truſt vnto a thing of ſo ſmal value, with him that was ſo prodigall thereof, and for the ſame ſo eaſily to yeeld vp their liues and fortunes, which they eſteemed as their only treaſure, they thought right worthily to deſerue all ſhame and miſhap that might betide them. So that they not only refuſed to lay down armes, and to yeeld their obedience vnto him, as he deſired, but euen to haue peace with him vpon any conditions whatſoeuer, ſeeing them dangerous vnto themſelues, and good onely for him their enemie.

Mahomet ſeeing his offers reiected by the rebels of Aſia, couertly ſeeketh for peace with the Chriſtians.

Mahomet finding the Rebels ſo reſolutely ſet downe, as not by any meanes but by force to be appeaſed, thought it now beſt to turne his purpoſe vnto the Chriſtians, and to offer them that which the other had refuſed, in hope that peace made with the one, ſhould be the ruine and deſtruction of the other. Vpon which point hee beeing in himſelfe reſolued, ſought now but ſome honeſt meanes, not vnbeſeeming his greatneſſe, to ioyne vnto this his proiect, to giue him a way thereunto. For the eaſing him of which care, the French Embaſſadour, then Lieger at Conſtantinople, was verie fitly then entreating with the Viſier Baſſaes for the deliuerance of the Countie Yſolan, taken at Alba-Regalis the laſt yeare, and againſt all Law of armes detained priſoner at Conſtantinople. This noble Gentleman Mahomet thought fit as well for the ſufficiencie of himſelfe as with inſtructions to deale with the Emperor concerning an entreatie of peace to bee had. Whereupon hee commanded him to be ſet at libertie, with charge, That he ſhould both diſcreetly and faithfully deale with the Emperour concerning this matter of peace: which if hee ſhould by his induſtrie effect, to the good liking and contentment of Mahomet the great Sultan, that then hee ſhould become and remaine free, otherwiſe to returne againe into his former captiuitie and bondage; for whome the French Embaſſadour gaue his word, and became pledge. Vpon which barbarous conditions the Earle was forthwith deliuered, who by the Law of armes ſhould not at all haue beene detained. Beſides this plot laied for the negotiation of this peace, Achmet Baſſa to this purpoſe writ to Collonitz, then Commander of the Emperours armie in Hungarie. But ſee the copie of the Letters themſelues.

The letters of Achmet Baſſa to Collonitz concerning a treaty of peace to be had.

To thee our friend Collonitz health and greeting. I ſuppoſe that you yet remember the propoſitions concerning peace which our Soueraigne and moſt mightie Monarch not long agoe cauſed to be opened and propounded vnto you by certaine of his Baſſaes neere vnto Strigonium, which as then remained not reſolued. But if now it ſhall ſeeme vnto you good, that wee ſhould aſſemble our ſelues together into ſome place of aſſurance both to the one ſide and to the other, wee may againe conferre about that buſineſſe as hauing on my part full power and commandement from my Prince ſo to doe; yet with charge, that before all other things Strigonium ſhould be againe deliuered vnto vs. Which being done wee may eaſily afterward determine the other difficulties, and conclude a good and wholeſome peace. God which raigneth alone in the heauens aboue is witneſſe of our faithfull and iuſt deſire, to aſſure a quiet and firme peace betwixt vs, and that to auert theſe floods of warre from the poore people, and to giue them ſome repoſe and reſt after ſo great troubles. This is our intent and purpoſe, which God knoweth to be void of all fraud and guile; which we now declare vnto you, in hope to vnderſtand yours alſo. But if you bee not reſolued to render to vs Strigonium before we begin to intreat of any other matter, it is not needfull for you to trouble your ſelfe to giue any anſwere to theſe our letters. But if you ſhall reſolue to the contrarie, to deliuer the ſame, with as much ſpeed as you can let vs in few words vnderſtand your reſolution, the time, and the place fit for our aſſemblie and meeting, to the intent fully to determine of theſe affairs. You know alſo, that you haue beene of long time accuſtomed to pay tribute vnto our Prince: which if you ſhall continue to pay for the time to come, and diſcharge the arrerages for the time paſt, it ſhall be

A bee commodious for vs, and honourable for you, ſeeing that it is an honour vnto you to bee tributaries vnto the Grand Seigniour, it hauing alwayes in times paſt beene for your good and profit. Beſides that, peace ſhall likewiſe bee entreated of with the great Cham of Tartarie, who as commanded by our moſt mightie and gracious Emperour vpon iuſt and reaſonable conditions to entertaine the ſame, and neuer more but in peaceable manner to come into Hungarie. Now if that you ſhal neglect or reiect this treatie for peace, it is certaine that you ſhall bee the authour of the miſerie and ruine of the whole countrie, it beeing impoſſible that the townes and villages conſumed with fire ſhould euer recouer their former beautie or felicitie. God which raigneth in heauen is there witneſſe vnto mee, and my dread Emperour vpon earth, that I ſpeake franckely with you, and without diſſimulation concerning this matter. Now on your part, let vs vnderſtand if you haue a deſire to attend vnto this treaty of peace; according to
B the purport of our Letters: for if you ſhall reſolue to the contrarie, we proteſt vnto you to write no more concerning theſe affaires.

Collonitz hauing receiued theſe letters, ſent them forthwith vnto the Emperor, requeſting his Maieſtie to conſider what anſwer he would haue giuen vnto them. Whom the Emperour, deſirous of a good peace, commanded to embrace the occaſion, and by proofe to learne whether the Turkes deſire were indeed conformable to their words or not. Whereupon Collonitz taking vnto him certaine of the beſt commanders in the armie, vndertooke the buſineſſe, and entered into the treatie of peace with the Turks: wherein he found the vnreaſonableneſſe of their demands to tend ſo much vnto the hurt and diſhonour of the Emperor, as that they euen
C at the firſt entrance ſhut vp the way to al further or reaſonable conference; it being altogether impoſſible to bring to any conformitie minds ſet downe vpon reſolutions ſo far different. For the Turks (as if the Emperor would haue beene glad of peace vpon any condition) after their proud manner, vnreaſonably demanded to haue Tranſyluania, Strigonium, and Peſth reſtored vnto them; for which they offered to deliuer vnto the Emperour Agria and Caniſia, peble for pearles. So that vpon propoſitions ſo farre different, being able to conclude nothing, they departed on both ſides as they came, to trie by armes that which by talke and conference they could not agree vpon. But as all the Turkes treaties of peace with the Chriſtians are indeed but falſe ſhewes to abuſe the facilitie of the Chriſtians by, euen ſo now alſo it was knowne, that they in the meane time, whileſt this treatie of peace was in hand, gathered to-
D gether great ſtore both of men and munition at Belgrade, wherewith to arme a great conuoy of victuals, which they had thought during this interparley for peace to haue put into Buda. But Collonitz vnderſtanding thereof, ceaſed further to entreat of peace, which with the falſe ſhew thereof did but hurt and deceiue the Chriſtians, and betooke himſelfe againe to his arms (his and their ſafeſt and ſureſt refuge) reſoluing with the other Captains and Commanders of the armie to doe what they might for the croſſing and hindering of the Turkes in their purpoſe for the putting of victuals into Buda: whereof there was now ſuch want, that the Turkes in garriſon there hauing alreadie eaten all their horſes, and for victuals rifled the Gouernors houſe, were reſolued to abandon the citie, if they ſhould not be within ſome few daies relieued.

The Emperor aduertiſed of the Turkes motion for peace, giueth order to Collonitz for the entertaining thereof.

The Turks vnreaſonable demands breake off all the treatie of peace.

E Now vpon this reſolution for the keeping of the Turks from the victualling of Buda, the Chriſtians for the more aſſurance of their purpoſe, prepared therefore both by water and by land, embarking their footmen vpon the riuer, vnder the conduct of Colonell Altmeine and Sultze, the one the Gouernour of Strigonium, and the other of Peſth; whileſt that Collonitz with the horſemen ſcouring alongſt the bankes of the riuer of Danubius, tooke the charge by land. And ſo it fortuned, that vpon the 22 day of Auguſt he with his horſemen neere vnto the village of Moharſch (famous for the death of King Lewis) fell vpon the head of the Turks armie, led by the Baſſa Murat, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Turkes, two thouſand of them being Ianizaries: who altogether lay encamped vpon an euen plaine, verie commodious for our horſemen, who let ſlip neither the time nor the opportunitie of ſo great an aduantage offered them, but forthwith charged them: where after a number of notable charges both giuen and receiued, which ſtill abated both the number and courage of the Turkes, they at laſt retired toward the bodie of their armie, and that in ſuch haſt, as that their retreat little differed from a ſpeedie flight. After whome Collonitz followed, with like heate as hee had charged them; but euill followed by his friends, who euill performed their charge, ſeeking after the ſpoyle in ſtead of purſuing of their enemies; the Turkes perceiuing the ſmall number that purſued them, turned vpon them, and ſo began againe not onely to make ſtrong reſiſtance, G but euen right hardly to charge them. Who ſo by them preſſed with no leſſe courage than power, were now glad themſelues to retire in ſtead of purſuing of the victorie, but yet ſo, as that the retreat was made without any great loſſe therein receiued. Howbeit, the Turkes not a little encouraged with this change of Fortune, and perceiuing themſelues too ſtrong for their enemies that charged them, came on ſo faſt and ſo couragiouſly, as that in fine they had defeated the Chriſtians, had not the Haiduckes out of their boats from the Riuer in good time come reſolutely to their reliefe. Which cloud the Turkes perceiuing, readie to poure forth a great tempeſt vpon their heads, and not daring to abide the ſame, againe retired, leauing the Chriſtians victors both in the firſt and laſt charge: who not content with the H retreat of the Turks, furiouſly charged them, and purſued them euen vnto their great campe, and ſo returned, carrying backe with them both the glorie of the field, and the ſpoile of their enemies.

Collonitz in good time relieued by the Haiduckes.

The Turkes affaires and deſignes made knowne vnto the Chriſtians by Saxar Beg, by them taken priſoner.

In this conflict the red cornet of Murat Baſſa, the cogniſance of his great command, was taken, with two field-pieces, ſeuen hundred Turkes were left dead vpon the place, and ſixſcore moe taken priſoners; amongſt whome was Saxar Beg: who being a man of vnderſtanding, and by the Chriſtians examined, confeſſed, That Haſſan Baſſa the day before this conflict came into the campe, and there honourably dined with the great Cham: with whom after their great cheere he entring into diſcourſe of many great matters, and among the reſt, concerning his returne into his countrey; was much againſt the ſame, vntill ſuch time as they had new victualled I Buda, whereunto he was (as hee ſaid) both in honour and in duetie bound to giue his aſſiſtance, the loſſe of this good place being of ſo great importance vnto the great Sultan. That otherwiſe his aid had beene to him rather hurtfull than profitable, his people hauing deuoured ſo much victuals and performed nothing, if he ſhould now at this time faile to doe his Prince ſeruice, who could neuer thinke either valour or fidelitie to be in him, if hee ſhould faile in ſuch actions as wherein his valour and fidelitie ſhould appeare; all things hauing no other credit and reputation, but according vnto their effects. And that therefore he ſhould reſolue to ſee the end of this exploit, which required euery mans helping hand for the performance thereof, conſidering the forces of the enemie in readineſſe to hinder the ſame. Moreouer, hee aſſured them, that the Baſſaes purpoſe was to new fortifie Haſwar, Pax, and Kaletſch K frontier caſtles, and neceſſarie for this action, and ſo to goe to the ſiege of Peſth; and that done, to beſiege Strigonium, which for all that he doubted to win this yeare, as well by reaſon of the approch of Winter, as for that a great part of his forces were far off, and not eaſily in a little time to be aſſembled together. That the Tarters were yet a great way from the campe, where the Baſſaes of Aſia and Caramania were within a few daies expected; the one of them leading with him the reconciled Rebels of Aſia, and the other ſix thouſand Ianizaries. Which his confeſſion although it were not altogether true, yet carried it ſhew of ſome probability, as time by proofe afterward declared.

The negligence of certain Chriſtian ſouldiers forgetful of diuers duties.

Some of our men were in this charge ſlaine alſo, but few in compariſon of the Turks, who there loſt ſome of their beſt men. It was noted, that in this conflict the ſouldiers of Colonell L Sultze had euill behaued themſelues, refuſing to purſue the enemie being in flight, whether it were for that they feared ſome ambuſh laid for them, or for that they diſdained to follow the Generall Collonitz: the reaſons perhaps for which their Colonell ſtayed them from the purſuit of the enemie, but to euill purpoſe: for being out of order at ſuch time as the Turkes turning backe, renewed the fight, they had beene all ſlaine and cut in pieces, had not the Haiduckes in good time (as wee ſaid) come on to their reſcue. As for Collonitz, hee moſt brauely bare himſelfe in this conflict, ſo much as in him was vrging his good fortune, for the obtaining of a full victorie; ſometime performing the part of a good Captaine, and ſometime of a valiant ſouldier; ſometime forcing the charge, and againe ſtaying his men in their retreat: inſomuch, M that oftentimes loſt amongſt his enemies, and againe returning by the grace of God, hee eſcaped death as it were by myracle, and from beeing taken priſoner, by chance. Into neither of which dangers hee could haue fallen, without the danger of the whole armie; which, next vnto God, was for the ſafetie thereof beholding vnto the valour of him their ſo braue a Leader. But God in his wiſedome createth not ſuch worthie men, but by his pro-

A uidence alſo to preſerue them: wonder it were otherwiſe, that euer ſuch worthie men ſhould returne from amongſt the midſt of ſo many deſperat dangers, death as it were enuying at their liues, and their enemies for their glory chuſing them out to triumph of their ſpoiles and ouerthrow. And without doubt, had the reſt of the Chriſtians after his example proſecuted their good fortune, and done what good ſouldiers ſhould of duty haue done, their enemies had bin quite ouerthrowne, and they themſelues had beene both victorious and rich; where now for lacke of good reſolution, the victory was almoſt equall. For beſide the ſpoiles by them gotten, they might haue carried away with them a whole yeres pay, due to the gariſon of Buda, which the Turks (put into a feare, and carefull onely of their liues) had left in their camp; which they afterward againe recouered, vpon the recouerie of their force and courage. This money, with
B much more, was all appointed as a prey vnto the good fortune of our men, had their valor had the courage to haue gone to fetch it; but failing of their endeauour in ſo glorious an action, Fortune failed them alſo of her bountie.

A great & rich bootie loſt through the negligence of the Chriſtians.

Now at length the armie of the Chriſtians was met together, about the fourth of September, wherein the Lord Ruſſworm commanded as Generall: who deſirous to vnderſtand of the Turks affaires and deſignes, ſent forth two of his moſt truſty and expert ſouldiers to performe that piece of ſeruice: who in Turkes apparell beeing got into the Turkes armie, were there eight daies vndiſcouered or ſuſpected of any. Where, after that they roaming vp and downe, had taken a full view of the Turkes armie, and in what they might diſcouered their deſignes, they returning backe, declared vnto the Generall what they had both there heard and ſeene:
C as, That the Turks armie was verie great, but yet not ſuch, as that which the laſt yeare had beſieged Peſth: That the Turkes lay encamped at large, and not cloſe together, which cauſed their armie to ſeeme the greater, taking vp for the lodgement thereof halfe a league, beeing well prouided of cannon and other field pieces: That Haſſan Baſſa commanded therein as Generall, hauing brought with him twelue thouſand Ianizaries, beſide his horſemen, and the reconciled Rebels of Aſia, which were dayly looked for, the leader of whome was not knowne: ſome thinking it to be him who had alwayes commanded them, being a moſt valiant man, and expert Commander; but ſome other deeming him to bee but one of his Captaines that had forſaken him (as indeed hee was) a right valiant man alſo, but not of ſo great experience as hee: That the great Tartar Han, come to aid the Turkes in their warres in Hun-D garie, was (to the great diſcontentment of Haſſan Baſſa the Turkes Generall) now alreadie returned towards his own countrie (with ſuch bootie and priſoners as he had got from the poore Chriſtians) to appeaſe a rebellion there raiſed by a young Tartar Prince his Nephew, who by his Vncle the great Han, giuen in hoſtage vnto Sultan Mahomet, and kept at Conſtantinople as in priſon, hauing found meanes to make an eſcape, and to returne into Tartarie, was about to trouble his Vncles affaires, in hope now in his abſence to mount vnto the Throne of his eſtate: and that the Tartar beeing come to the banke of Danubius, and by the Turkes denied boats to paſſe ouer the Riuer in, and with many railing and opprobrious ſpeeches by them charged for his departure as a coward, had found meanes to make a flaoting bridge of great faggots, whereby hee paſſed his footmen ouer the Riuer, his horſemen ſwimming ouer the E ſame; and ſo was by great iournies returning home, boaſting by the way as he went, that hee had reiected and troden vnder foot all the prayers and requeſts of Haſſan Baſſa, entreating him yet to ſtay a while in Hungarie for the ſeruice of the great Sultan his Maſter. Beſides that, That they had ſeene ſix great veſſels vpon the riuer of Danubius, with ten leſſer veſſels following of them, manned with three thouſand ſouldiers well armed, and men of good ſort, three hundred of them being Ianizaries, appointed to ſafe conduct the munition to be brought vp the riuer, and to ſerue for a conuoy vnto the other veſſels that were to follow them with victuals, if happily the Chriſtians ſhould attempt to doe any thing againſt them. And in fine, That the Turkes army could not this yeare poſſibly be great, by reaſon of many great lets wherewith the great Sultan was this yeare troubled: which much abated both the courage and hope of his Captains, who hanging their heads came, vnwillingly to theſe wars, accounting themſelues happy, if they might in this expedition but take Peſth, that they might not returne ſo much diſhonoured, as they came danted and diſcouraged. With which newes the Chriſtians were ſo much encouraged to encounter with the Turks, as if they had been aſſured to fight with men already diſcouraged and out of heart.

The Lord Ruſſworm Generall of the Chriſtian army, by his eſpials certainly enformed of the eſtate of the Turkes armie.

The Turks ouerthrowne by the garriſon of Strigonium.

The Turkes defeated by Colonel Sultze.

In the meane time the Huſſars of Strigonium, alwaies readie for fight, by good fortune going foorth, met with foure hundred Turkes ſeeking for forrage: who encountering together, at the firſt made a moſt braue and gallant fight, euerie one of them wiſhing, That their priuate ſucceſſe might bee the beginning of their generall victorie. But the Huſſars being both more skilfull in that manner of skirmiſhing and ſudden encounter, and alſo of greater courage, at length brake the Turks rankes: of whome; ſix ſcore lay dead vpon the ground moſt of the reſt were taken priſoners, with an hundred and thirtie good and ſeruiceable horſes, wherewith both the glorie and the profit of their victorie was encreaſed. Colonell Sultze alſo with three hundred men marching out from the campe, chanced to diſcouer an hundred of thoſe braue] horſemen which but newly came out of Aſia with Zellaly the Rebell; who hauing neuer ſeene the armie of the Chriſtians, nor yet felt of their forces, were with three hundred Ianizaries vpon a brauerie come ouer the riuer of Danubius, to take a view of the Chriſtian campe: for the drawing on of whome, the politique Colonell had ſent forth fiftie of his horſemen a great way from the reſt of his troupe, as it were to diſcouer the countrey thereabout. Theſe forerunners fayled not to meet with the Turkes, as if it had been by chance, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking to haue had a great hand ouer that ſo ſmall a number; when vpon the ſudden Sultze with the reſt of his companie comming on, and hotly charging them, encouraged his owne men, and diſcouraged the Turkes: who ſurpriſed with feare, thinking the Chriſtians to bee more in number than indeed they were, hauing left ſome fiftie of their men dead vpon the place, as men diſmayed and void of vnderſtanding, fled. In which flight, ſuch as were not by the Chriſtians ſlaine, were in the riuer of Danubius drowned, whereinto they for feare all headlong plunged themſelues.

All theſe little conflicts ſerued but as ſparkes to kindle the great fire by the Baſſa entended; his firſt purpoſe beeing to put a conuoy of victuals into Buda, which the Chriſtians thought by all meanes to hinder; which ſo contrarie intentions were not but by force and policie to be decided. The Chriſtian Generall wiſely doubting leſt the Baſſa ſhould come and lodge his armie betwixt Vicegrade and Buda, and ſo victuall the citie at his pleaſure, raiſed a ſtrong fort of an old Church betwixt the ſaid two places, and therein lodged a Regiment of Lanſquenets. Beſide which fort, called the fort of Saint Andrew, he built another at the head thereof in the Iſle of Vicegrade, in ſuch order and proportion, that theſe two forts might one of them defend the other, and annoy them that ſhould attempt to force either of them. Together with this commodiouſneſſe, the fort in the Iſle kept the paſſage vpon Danubius free and open for the bringing of victuals and other neceſſaries to the campe of the Chriſtians; and was but a league and an halfe from Buda: into which fort was put a Regiment of foure thouſand Italians, beeing all verie well armed. Which done, he made a bridge of boats vpon the Riuer, which began in the campe, and ended at the Iſle, for the relieuing of the fort; and ſo from thence paſſed quite ouer the riuer to Vacia, a little towne, which it was needfull for the Chriſtians to keepe.

A great ambuſh laid for the intercepting of the Turkes.

Theſe forts finiſhed according to the neceſſitie of the time, it was not long after, but that the Baſſa ſent ten thouſand Turkes both horſe and foot to take the firſt of them, which they ſuppoſed to haue beene but weakely fortified. Who comming thither, were with ſuch courage receiued by the Lanſquenets with their harquebuſes, as that the whole fort ſeemed to haue beene on fire. Wherewith the Turkes diſmayed, as men in their expectation deceiued, and in approching of the ſame hauing ſome of their men ſlaine, and moe hurt, they ſounded a retreat, and hauing done nothing, but loſt a number of their men, returned to their campe from whence they came. In which enterpriſe they failing, they reſolued vpon another, and began to make a bridge ouer Danubius, in hope thereby to paſſe ouer, and to annoy the Chriſtians on the other ſide of the riuer. Whereof the Generall of the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, ſuffered them without any interruption to ſpend the time in performing of the ſame. But certainely enformed by his eſpials, both of the day and houre wherein they were about to paſſe ouer, he layed an ambuſh of foure thouſand Lanſquenets and two thouſand Reiſters for them, in ſuch place as from whence they might without danger doe great harme vnto the enemie, and aſſure the bodie of the Chriſtian armie. The riuer of Danubius had growing vpon the bankes thereof, and eſpecially in the deſolate and vnfrequented places, great ſtore of flags

and

A and reeds; which were now thicke, and high enough to couer theſe footmen in, hauing with them foure culuerins readie charged. Behinde this ambuſh lay Colonel Collonitz with his regiment, and in the head of it the Prince Ioinuille with a certaine number of French gentlemen, who vpon a braue courage, and a deſire they had to ſee ſeruice, had followed him into thoſe wars. There was alſo the Lord of Baſſomperre another French Lord, with his own priuat followers, in number few, but in valor great. Vpon the flanks lay foure troups of Carabins French men, Loranoiſes, and Wallons, moſt expert and reſolute ſouldiers.

The Turks hauing made their bridge, began now to paſſe ouer the ſame, being charged by ſome few ſtragling and looſe forerunners of the Chriſtians, ſent before for that purpoſe: whom the Turks not much regarding, ſtill preſſed on, in hope to ouertake them, and to cut B them in pieces, not aware of the ambuſh laid for them, nor of their enemies counter-deſignes. The footmen in the meane time lying ſtil cloſe in the reeds in ambuſh, beholding how and in what order they paſſed, and expecting but the time when they were to begin their charge. But hauing perceiued ten thouſand of the Turks to be now come ouer, and making head toward them; the Wallons vpon the banke of the riuer (as was before appointed) firſt diſcharged their pieces vpon them and ſlew ſome few of them. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ſtill paſſing on by them, ſlew of them alſo about foure and twentie, and ſo keeping their way, marched directly toward the Chriſtians. But this their forwardneſſe was quickely ſtayed, and their courage abated: for in paſſing by they were vpon the ſudden aſſailed by the Lanſquenets & Reiſters, now riſen out of ambuſh, and by them hardly laid vnto on euery ſide; as alſo by the C horſemen, who now come in, had put them into ſome diſorder before they were well aware of them. The Wallons alſo at the firſt by the Turks ſcattered, but now againe rallied, and deſirous to reuenge the death of their friends and fellowes, now played their parts, and on another ſide right furiouſly charged their enemies. During all which fight the culuerins ceaſed not to open the flanks of the Turks battell, with the loſſe of a number of their men by the furie of them rent in pieces. Neither did Collonitz foreſlow ſo faire an opportunitie, but afront charging this diſmaied companie, by plaine force cauſed them to giue ground; the Carabins in the meane time charging them vpon their flanks, and the Wallons behinde. Who thus on euerie ſide beſet and hardly layd vnto; as men diſcouraged, and out of hope to be relieued, turned their backs and fled amaine, to haue recouered the bridge whereby they came ouer. In which D fight and flight two thouſand of them being ſlaine, and the reſt not able to recouer the bridge, driuen headlong into the riuer, were therein drowned and ſlaine to the number of fiue thouſand of them, thoſe which remained aliue being all taken priſoners. Amongſt the reſt, one of the Baſſa's, a man of great account amongſt the Turks, was ſlaine, with many other Captaines and Commanders of great note, and fifteene hundred Ianizaries. There were alſo foure field pieces taken, with thirtie enſignes and two cornets, beſide a very rich prey of braue and couragious horſes, with much faire armour, rich apparel, and good ſcimiters, weapons of no ſmall account and price among the Turks. This ouerthrow much abated the courage and hope of the reſt of the Turks for comming to the effect of their deſignes; and increaſed the courage and hope of the Chriſtians, reaſonably wel hereby aſſured of the good ſucceſſe of their affaires E for this yeare in Hungarie.

About this time Sultan Mahomet hauing put a Fleet of Gallies to ſea, to haue gone againſt the King of Fez, was certainly informed, how that the ſame with tempeſt ſore beaten, to auoid ſhipwrecke, was againe returned vnto the ſame port from whence it looſed, bringing backe with it nothing for all his great charges, but ſickeneſſe and great loſſes at ſea receiued. The like euill hap or worſe hauing at the ſame time alſo betided another Fleet by him ſet out into the Euxine or blacke ſea, to defend thoſe ſea coaſts from being rifled and ſpoyled by the Rebels in Aſia, who with their dayly incurſions did there ſtill great harme. For albeit that Zelaly one of the Captaines of the Rebels, allured with Mahomet his faire promiſes, was by the ſtrait of the Dardanelli (called in antient time the ſtrait of Helleſpont) come with twelue thouſand good ſouldiours out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo marching through Macedonia, was come into Hungarie, there to doe his Lord and Maſter ſeruice; yet the chiefe Rebell held ſtill out, and both now and for diuers yeares after maintained a moſt cruell and dangerous warre, to the great trouble of the Graund Seigniour, and the hindering of his affaires. And euen now the craftie Rebell hauing made ſhew as if he would haue ſubmitted himſelfe,

The doings of the Rebels in Aſia.

and come ouer into Europe as Zellaly did; and had therefore certaine gallies ſent vnto him G from Mahomet, to haue tranſported him and his ſouldiors in: he now of them poſſeſſed, ſlew all them that were ſent therein, and kept the gallies to himſelfe. So that ſo far from was it, that the rebellion was extinguiſhed in Aſia, and the Rebels ſuppreſſed, as that they were now vp in greater number than euer, and ſo did alſo more harme. Whereunto they were alſo the more encouraged by the example of Haſſan Baſſa (not him the General in Hungarie, but another Baſſa of the ſame name) who by the Great Sultan ſent againſt theſe Rebels, had for a time kept them vnder, and ſomewhat repreſſed their inſolencie: but now by Mahomet diſplaced, and another being ſent to ſucceed him; he therewith diſcontented, ſo animated and incenſed his ſouldiers againſt him, as that comming to haue taken vpon him his charge, he found moſt part of the ſouldiers readie to turne their weapons vpon him: ſo that at length they fell toge- H ther by the eares about the matter, ſome taking part with the old General, and ſome with the new. In which tumultuous quarrell a number of ſouldiers were ſlaine, all they of the richer ſort ſpoiled, and the Great Sultans ſeruice and authoritie neglected. But the new General armed with his Princes authoritie, and ſome of the old ſouldiers alſo taking his part, at laſt pre-uailing, Haſſan the old Generall with his partakers were glad to flie and ſhift for themſelues:
who for all that, hauing afterward gathered together the diſperſed ſouldiers, and joining with the reſt of the Rebels, held ſtill the bodie of a good armie on foot; by his example ſtirring vp the people to rebellion, croſſing the ſeruice of his Soueraign, and doing what harme he could, ſo to ſeeme vnto his followers the more valiant. The Perſian King on the other ſide taking the aduantage of theſe the Turks troubles at home, as alſo of his wars with the Chriſtians; at I the ſame time with a great armie beſieged the great citie of Tauris, as then kept by the Turks with a moſt ſtrong garriſon. In which ſiege he for batterie vſed the helpe of the cannon, an engine of long time by the Perſians ſcorned, as not beſeeming valiant men; vntil that by their owne harmes taught, he was now content to vſe it; being with the ſame, as alſo with skilfull cannoniers furniſhed by the Portugals: by which means he in ſhort time after againe recouered this great citie from the Turks, being before by Sultan Amurath taken from Mahomet the Perſian King, but now againe reſtored vnto the Perſian Kingdome.

The great citie of Tauris beſieged and taken by the Perſian King.

Sultan Mahomet perplexed with the euill ſucceſſe of his affaires, falleth to his ſuperſtitious deuotions

Sultan Mahomet thus on euery ſide beſet with troubles, and not well knowing which way to turne himſelfe for to remedie the ſame, being in minde much troubled and perplexed, began to enter into conſideration of the vanitie of theſe earthly things, & of the frailtie of his eſtate; K and ſo ſtrucke as it were with a remorſe of conſcience, and a firme beleefe that God did thus chaſtiſe and puniſh him for his offences, conſidering that his aunceſtors had neuer bin troubled with any ſuch attaints or diſgraces, he conuerted all his thoughts vnto prayers towards God:
and therefore gaue commandement for publike prayers to be continually ſaid in all the Moſquies or churches throughout all his dominions, giuing himſelf wholly alſo vnto ſuch deuout exerciſes and works of charitie: and withall ſent two of his moſt reuerend Prieſts bare headed and bare footed on pilgrimage to Mecha (where the chiefe Temple of their great Prophet is, and wherein they vainly beleeue their ſuperſtitious praiers to be of him moſt ſpeedily heard) there to pray vnto him for the health and proſperitie of him their Prince and Soueraigne.

A great fight of a Flemiſh ſhip with the gallies of Amurat Rais

At the ſame time, Amurat Rais an old pyrat the Turks Admiral for the Weſt part of the Me- L diterranian, roaming there vp and down, and doing what harme he could, chanced to light vp-on a great Flemiſh ſhip, which he with his gallies forthwith encloſed, the calmeneſſe of the weather then fauouring him, and hindring the Flemings, their ſhip being able to make no way.
Who ſo beſet, and hauing made a great fight againſt the whole fleet, and ſlain a number of the Turks, and ſore rent diuers of their gallies, though not without loſſe of many of their own men alſo; being not able longer to fight, and now ſeeing themſelues boorded by as many Turks as could well ſtand vpon the hatches of the ſhip, & their gallies hanging round about her; as men of inuincible courage, and reſolued to die, and yet to ſell their liues at as deere a rate as they could, laid all the pouder they had left in the ſhip on an heape together, & thereunto vpon the ſudden put fire, by force whereof the Turks with the hatches were al blown vp, the Flemings M with their ſhip rent in pieces, together with diuers of the gallies that were faſt grapled vnto her, and an incredible harme done vnto ſuch other of the gallies as were neere vnto her. Men worthie alwayes to vanquiſh, ſeeing that they feare nothing more than to be themſelues van-quiſhed: and more worthie to haue liued for the glorie of men, than by their crueltie to haue

A haue periſhed to the diſhonor of men. The old pyrat aſtonied at ſo great and deſperat a reſolution, hauing in this exploit loſt much, and gained nothing, haſted to the ſhore to repaire his rent gallies, and ſo to put to ſea againe: Where he had not long beene, but that he by chance (and that full ſore againſt his will) met with the great Duke of Florence his gallies, accounted the beſt gallies in the world, and ſuch as now at this preſent moſt troubled the Turkes deſignes. At which meeting, after many a thundering cannon ſhot on both ſides diſcharged, not without the apparant loſſe on the Turks behalfe, when they ſhould haue come to haue grapled together, and to haue fought hand to hand, a thing which the Florentines moſt deſired, as in hope to haue made that famous pyrat the prize of their victorie; he not willing ſo to do, ſuddenly turned about and fled; after whom the Florentines followed amaine, and in the chaſe B ſunke ſome of his gallies, and tooke other ſome full of great riches: and ſo brake the credit of this old and renowned Pyrat, as that for a great while after he was little by the Chriſtians feared vpon that coaſt. But leauing Mahomet to his deuotions, & the old pyrat to bewaile his loſſes, let vs againe returne to ſee what the great armies of the Turks and of the Chriſtians did more in Hungarie.

The Turkes in a skirmiſh by the Chriſtians ouerthrowne.

While theſe armies lay encamped the one attending vpon the other, many an hot skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them, moſt whereof ſorted vnto the hurt and loſſe of the Turks. Among others it fortuned, that a troupe of aduenturers going out of the Chriſtian army to ſeeke after booty, fell vpon a like troup of the Turks, come out for the like purpoſe: where after a ſharp encounter on both ſides giuen and receiued, the Turks at length put to the worſe & defeated, betook C themſelues to flight, hauing left a number of their fellowes dead vpon the place, and loſt two of their enſignes, with an hundred and thirty horſes of ſeruice. In which chaſe the Chriſtians hardly purſuing them, draue a number moe of them into the Danubius, wherein they moſt miſerably periſhed; and tooke a great many moe priſoners, amongſt whom were found aboue fourescore Italian renegates, who brought into the camp, were as enemies vnto God, in a martiall court all condemned to be hanged, and ſo accordingly executed, ſauing the Captain himſelfe, who for the regard of his place was beheaded.

Eighty Italian renegates hanged.

The Turkes army greatly diminiſhed and diſcouraged.

Shortly after, the great Baſſa ariſing with his armie, came in the beginning of October and encamped neere Buda, both for the preſeruation of the place, and the ſafetie of his armie, now greatly diminiſhed both in number and courage. For it was certainely knowne by diuers fugi- D tiues from the Turkes, that in theſe many conflicts they had loſt a number of their beſt ſouldiers, but eſpecially of their Ianizaries. So that the Baſſa for the ſupplying of that defect, was glad to make choice of 6000 of his beſt ſoldiers, whom armed with muskets and ſcimitars, the proper armes of the Ianizaries, he entertained into the roomes and pay of the Ianizaries that were dead and ſlaine: the reſt of his armie for the moſt part conſiſting of bare and feeble baſe raw ſouldiers. Beſides this, that all the army was full of mourning and lamentation, the ſouldiers in all places bewailing the loſſe of their brethren, their friends, and companions: ſo that in ſtead of their wonted threats and brauerie, nothing was to be heard but ſighing and complaining. And moreouer, that the generall opinion conceiued of the greatneſſe of the Chriſtian army (imagined to bee much greater and ſtronger than indeed it was) had ſtrucke ſuch a feare into the E mindes of the Turks, as that they were reſolued, Buda being once victualled, to returne home, all their other proud deſignes for this yeare ſet apart: which was the cauſe that they had diſlodged with their army, and drawne neere vnto the city, the better to attend to the new victualling thereof, and ſo to be gone; accounting themſelues right happie, if they might but performe that good piece of ſeruice and ſaue themſelues.

The Chriſtians before in doubt leſt the Turkes ſhould haue beſieged Peſth, as they had before giuen it forth they would, and ſeeing them now to be riſen with their armie and encamped neere vnto Buda, reſolued to follow them, and in what they might to croſſe their deſignes: and thereupon leauing Peſth, as now out of danger, they roſe alſo, and came and encamped before the fort in the Iſle of Vicegrade, betwixt the ſaid fort and Vacia, where they ſtayed foure dayes, and then by a bridge which they made vpon the Danubie, whereby to paſſe from the Iſle where the Italians lay in garriſon, vnto the fort of S. Andrew, kept by the Lanſquenets, they with the whole armie paſſed the riuer, and ſo came and encamped before the fort of Saint Andrew, in the face of the enemie. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two armies was plaine and open, without woods, buſhes, or riuers, to hinder the ioining of a ſet battell. In which ſo fit a place, the Chriſtians incouraged with the feare of their enemies, and the diminiſhing of their number and courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous riſing, as by other aduertiſements) were deſirous in ſo fauourable occaſions, to haue giuen them battell; and for the deſire they had thereof, were come thither to ſeeke it: which the Turkes on the other ſide ſought as much to ſhun, not daring to aduenture themſelues vnto the fortune of a generall battell, for all the bragges they had made. Neuertheleſſe, very ſhame arming them with ſome reſolution, they put forth into the field a battalion of fiue thouſand men, fiue daies after that the Chriſtians were encamped on that ſide of the Riuer. This battell of the Turkes came marching on, within halfe a quarter of a league of the Chriſtians; which they would not haue done but vpon the confidence of a greater number following of them, hauing behinde them ten thouſand men both horſe and foot layed as cloſe as they poſſibly could a little out of the way. Now the Chriſtians thinking of no other forces ready to fight, but thoſe which appeared in their ſight, ſent forth twelue hundred men againſt theſe fiue thouſand Turkes, to skirmiſh with them, vntill the whole armie were put into order, euen for a generall battell that day to haue beene fought, if the Turkes ſhould accept thereof; whereunto the Generall, the Colonels, Captaines, and ſouldiers in generall, were fully enclined, the whole armie with great cheerefulneſſe marching on foot, at this loud alarme of their common deſire.

The Chriſtians reſolue to giue the Turks battell.

Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turkes beene likewiſe diſpoſed for the producing of the ſame. But they bee the extraordinarie fauours of Fortune, when fit occaſions ioyne themſelues with braue reſolutions, and ſuch reſolutions with meanes to effect the ſame. This is the let of many moſt noble trophies, which moſt commonly faile, either for lacke of fit occaſion, or for lacke of good reſolution for the performance of them. But as moſt men iudge of other mens conceits by their owne inclination, ſo the Chriſtians themſelues, reſolued to giue battell, thought the Turkes their enemies to haue beene of the ſame reſolution: and thoſe fiue thouſand men to haue beene the head of the auantguard, followed with the whole armie, comming to draw them out to skirmiſh vntill the comming on of the reſt of their forces.

Howbeit their deſigne was quite contrarie to this the Chriſtians hope, for their purpoſe was onely to traine them out into their ambuſhes, ſo without danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpoſe they gaue ſufficient teſtimonie, and cauſe of ſuſpect; for that the skirmiſh hauing continued three houres, with ſome loſſe on both ſides, the Turkes armie appeared not: and theſe fiue thouſand Turkes now in skirmiſh, by little and little retiring, ſought ſo to haue drawne the Chriſtians into the danger of their ambuſh. Which their manner of fight cauſed the Chriſtians to ſuſpect the matter: for it was not like, that fiue thouſand men ſhould giue ground to twelue hundred, if they had not had ſome ſecret meaning therein, which they ſought to effect to their more aduantage. Which cauſed the Chriſtian Carabins which followed them, not to bee too earneſt in purſuing of them, and more cloſely to ſerre themſelues together, the better to endure the ſhocke of their enemies, if they ſhould charge them. Neither were they in that their prouident feare deceiued: for the Turkes ſeeing their purpoſe diſcouered, and themſelues now out of hope to effect the ſame, vpon the ſudden made a ſtand, and ſo preſently comming on, hardly charged the formoſt of our Carabins: who as men halfe ſurpriſed, to ſee themſelues ſo readily and reſolutely charged, by men who but now made ſhew as if they would haue fled, were not able ſo valiantly to receiue the charge (conſidering the great number of them by whome they were charged) but that ſome few of them were ouerthrowne and ſlaine, with ſome of the Hungarians amongſt them.

A conflict betwixt the Turkes and the Chriſtians.

Howbeit they made good reſiſtance, and right valiantly repulſed their enemies, of whom they ſlew a good number alſo. The preaſe in this conflict was great, euerie one deſiring to ſhew himſelfe braue and couragious in the head of his owne armie. But new ſupplies ſtill comming in, the Turkes in fine ſhrunke backe and retired, hauing left three hundred of their fellowes dead vpon the place, accompanied with an hundred of the Chriſtians there ſlaine likewiſe. Now vpon the retreat on both ſides, euery man in his conceit appointed the next day for the generall day of battell: the bragging ſpeeches of the Turkes giuing the Chriſtians occaſion ſo to thinke; for why, they ſeldome or neuer refuſe battell being offered them by the Chriſtians, as wel for the confidence they commonly haue in their multitude, as for the fooliſh opinion they haue of the ineuitable predeſtination of men to life or death: accounting it amongſt them an eternall infamie, A famie, to refuſe any combat againſt the Chriſtians; which howſoeuer it fall out, ſhould ſort to their aduantage, by vanquiſhing gaining the fruits of their victory; and by loſing their liues in battell, to gaine the joyes of heauen: being vainly perſuaded, no mens ſoules to go more readily vnto heauen, than the ſoules of ſuch as die in battell againſt the Chriſtians. Such effects old ſuperſtitious opinions are able to worke in the mindes of men, euen to the deſperat aduenturing and ſpending of their liues. Howbeit that this effect for this time witneſſeth, that theſe men with all theſe aduantages as much feared the danger as any other poore faint hearted men; and that a ſtrong apprehenſion of feare is able to preuaile againſt all cuſtoms and perſuaſions, be they neuer ſo old, as alſo againſt all other accidents whatſoeuer. For why, the Turks contenting themſelues with their great bragges and vaine threats, came not forth according to B their promiſe, neither could by any meanes be drawne to aduenture themſelues vnto the hazard of a general battell. The loſſe of their great and choiceſt men diſcouraged and deterred them from aduenturing all to the hazard of ſo great a perill. For (as I haue ſaid) almoſt all their Ianizaries and moſt valiant ſouldiours were dead or ſlaine, and the reſt, men of ſmall ſpirit or courage, reſerued that little which was in them, for the ſafegard of themſelues, and not for the gaining of any notable victorie. They had alſo in theſe often conflicts loſt all their Erasbles, which are a deſperate kinde of ſouldiours fighting on horſebacke without ſaddles, hauing onely a little piece of tapeſtrie vpon their horſes backes, and by the readineſſe of their horſes do for a long time in one ſort maintaine their fight. They carry light darts made of ſtrait and faire canes, excellently wel made, and ſtrongly armed; and their handie weapons C are good ſables, or broad and ſharpe curtleaſſes. Theſe men a great while fought moſt valiantly in the laſt combats, but in fine were all ſlaine, except ſome few which caſt themſelues into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loſſe of which men much diſcouraged the Turks; for why, their ſeruice ſtood them in great ſtead in receiuing the enemies charges, and with their bodies couering of the Turks ſquadrons in their greateſt perils and combats. Howbeit the Turks receiued not theſe loſſes without returning of ſome part thereof to vs againe: For Collonitz had a little before fallen into great danger of his perſon, and loſt ſome of his followers in an enterpriſe of great moment, had the effect anſwered vnto the proiect thereof. While the Turkes yet lodged in the Iſle of Vicegrade, he cauſed eight great field pieces to be ſo placed, as that therewith he ſo much annoyed the Turks, that they were about to haue forſaken the place. And the more to force them ſo to do, the ſecond of October he embarqued himſelfe with ſix hundred Haiducks vpon the Danubius, and ſo by night with great ſilence landed neere vnto the enemies, thinking ſo vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed them. Which for all that could not ſo ſecretly be done, by reaſon of the comming on of the day, but that the Turks were thereof aware; who thereupon with great preiſe iſſued out of their trenches, and with all their force and power charged him. Againſt whom he made head, rather vpon a braue and conſtant reſolution, than vpon any confidence he had in his owne forces, not hauing men ynow to withſtand the leaſt part of his enemies. Which his ſo great reſolution ſo abated the Turks fury, as that they ſtood a good while in doubt to charge men ſo reſolued. The field pieces which he had brought ouer with him into the Iſle, then ſerued him to good purpoſe, beating them backe with their murthering bullets, who with their number thought to haue ouerwhelmed him. Which good helpe oppoſed againſt the number of the enemies, for a time ballanced the victorie, and wrought the death of many on both ſides. This manner of fight endured the ſpace of two houres, maintained more by reſolution than by ſtrength and power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number preuailing, the Chriſtians therewith rather oppreſſed than vanquiſhed, forſaking their field pieces, diſorderly retired toward their boats. After whom the Turks eagerly following, in that purſuit ſlew 400 of the Haiducks, the reſt with much ado recouering their boats, carrying with them their General, by them hardly defended from the furie of the enemie. Which loſſe happened not ſo vnto the Chriſtians, but that it was mingled with ſome loſſe of the Turks alſo, of whom the moſt forward and couragious were in that fight ſlaine, as was afterwards knowne by certaine priſoners of theirs afterward taken, who made report of the loſſes by them there receiued. The Turks by this ſo deſperat & dangerous an attempt warned to preuent the like for the time to come, caſt vp great trenches in the Iſle alongſt the banke of Danubius, therein placing certaine Ianizaries and other their beſt ſoldiers, who there lay vntil the diſlodgement of the camp to go to lie before Buda.

The Turkes refuſe to come to a general battell with the Chriſtians.

Erasbles what manner of ſoldiers they be amõg the Turks.

Collonitz in going about to ſurpriſe the Turkes, with loſſe repulſed, and himſelf indangered.

The bridge of Lamaſcin taken & broken by the Gouernor of Stiria.

The Turkes had before built a bridge of boats at Lamaſcin, which gaue them paſſage into Stiria, where they did great harme; for the ſtrengthening whereof they had built at both ends thereof a ſtrong fort, well furniſhed both with men and munition. This bridge ſo commodious for the Turks, and hurtfull to the Chriſtians, Trantmeſtorf Gouernor of Stiria, and a great Commander in thoſe parts, with his Stirian troupes and ſome good aid brought vnto him by the Countie Serin, vndertooke to breake. Vpon which reſolution he vpon the ſudden approched one of the aforeſaid forts, and ſo right furiouſly aſſailed the ſame before they in the fort were well aware of his comming. In which doing he cauſed the greateſt noiſe and ſtirre that was poſſible to be made with trumpets, drummes, and clattering of armour, as if it had been ſome great armie employed in that action, the more to terrifie the beſieged. Which ſo great and dreadfull a noiſe, joyned vnto ſo braue an attempt, with ſo great courage begun, ſtrucke ſuch a terror into the mindes of the Turks, that they without any great reſiſtance quitted the place, and fled ouer the bridge to the other fort. Of which forſaken fort the Chriſtians became maſters, and with all ſpeed proſecuting their good fortune, preſently drew out thereof three cannons, and therewith battered the other Fort. In which the Turks, hauing no other place of refuge to flee vnto, nor hope of ſafetie but in their laſt valour, ſo well behaued themſelues, as that the Chriſtians had much ado to force them. Howbeit a breach being made by the furie of the canon, and ſcaling ladders ſet vp, the fort was on euery ſide aſſaulted; which the Turks for the ſpace of fiue houres ſo valiantly endured, as that it was hard to ſay who ſhould preuaile or haue the better. In this aſſault were many on both ſides ſlaine; the Turkes not being to be ouercome but with the loſſe both of their liues and honour; nor the Chriſtians able to retyre without loſing the fruit of that their ſo great and rich an enterpriſe: So that the aſſault was with great reſolution on both ſides maintained, the Turkes fighting for their liues, and the Chriſtians for their honour; vntill that at laſt the Turkes with much ſlaughter ouercome, the fort was by the Chriſtians taken, and moſt of the Turks therein being ſlain, and the reſt taken priſoners, both the forts were forthwith raſed, and the bridge broken, which before had ſerued for an ordinarie paſſage for the Turks to forrage and ſpoile the Chriſtian territories by. The boats whereof the bridge was made were all burnt, and ſome great ordnance therein found broken in pieces and caſt into the riuer.

Lugaze a ſtrōg place deliuered to Baſta.

At the ſame time Lugaze a place of great importance for the ſeruice of the Emperour, and ſo neere vnto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing thereabouts, but that it might from thence be diſcouered and knowne, was by the Tranſyluanians deliuered to Baſta General for the Emperor in that country. From which place he ſending out certain ſcouts toward Belgrade, they brought in with them certaine priſoners; who being examined, ſaid, that Haſſan Baſſa the Turks General in Hungarie, had writ to Giaffer Baſſa the Gouernor of Temeſwar, That he ſhould only attend to the preſeruation of his owne, without attempting any thing further againſt the Chriſtians, the preſent eſtate of their affaires ſo requiring: And that hauing reuictualled Buda, his purpoſe was for this yeare to returne, in hope of ſome good peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor.

The two armies of the Turkes and the Chriſtians lay ſtill neere the one of them vnto the other, the Turkes carefull for the reuictualling of Buda, and the Chriſtians ſtill intentiue to their doings, and deſirous in what they might to hinder and fruſtrate the ſame. Which becauſe they could no way better do than by offering of them battell; they thereupon generally reſolued, vpon a Friday being the ſeuenteenth of October, the day by them aſſigned for the battell (hauing by the ſhooting off of three great cannons giuen warning vnto the ſouldiours throughout the campe, for the preparing of themſelues firſt toward God, and then to the ſeruice of their Prince) after they had well refreſhed themſelues, in good order tooke the field, and ſo ſtood readie ranged there, either to giue or to accept of battel. Before whom the Countie Ringraue was ſent forth with his regiment, about halfe the way betwixt the two armies, to diſcouer the mouing of the enemie, and to receiue his firſt charge if occaſion ſhould ſo require. Whoſe Scouts before ſent forth, about noone diſcouered a troupe of horſemen come out of the Turks campe, about ſome buſineſſe they had to do, but to them vnknowne: whome the Scouts ſuppoſing to haue beene the forerunners of the Turks armie, and by them almoſt ſurpriſed, haſtily retyred back again, and by their haſtie retreat put the whole armie in an alarme, which came brauely marching on, in hope now to haue come to trie the matter by true va-

A lour, and by the fortune of a generall battell to haue made that day for euer famous by their victory and the ouerthrow of their proud enemies. And in the heat of their ſo great courage like enough as it was for them to haue performed the ſame, had the Turkes had but ſo much courage in them as to haue met them in the field, as was wel hoped they now would. But they with their former loſſes diſcouraged, and reſolued only vpon the ſafegard of themſelues, and the victualling of Buda, had no minde to enter into theſe honorable liſts, but kept themſelues cloſe within the couert of their tents and the ſtrength of their trenches. And ſo the Chriſtians with a falſe alarme moued, and hauing for the moſt part of the day in vaine expected the comming forth of their enemies, returned into their campe deceiued of their expectation.

The ſame day there was an eſpie taken, whom they which tooke him thought to haue beene B a Turke, howbeit he was found to be one of their owne men; by whom they were better enformed of the cowardiſe of the Turks, of their purpoſe for the ſhunning of battel, and of their reſolution for the keeping of themſelues within the ſafegard of their trenches, and that they ſo did, as wel for the loſſes they had before receiued, as for diuers other vnlucky accidents, which cauſed them to miſdoubt ſome euill ſucceſſe in the end & winding vp of this their expedition. Neuertheleſſe, the Chriſtians not greatly truſting to theſe reports, ſtill kept their armie in readines, to giue their enemies battell vpon the leaſt occaſion offered them. Howbeit, that indeed they had no great cauſe of feare, the Turkes hauing no deſire at all to come to a generall battell: ſo that in ſtead of great effects that were expected, the time paſſed but in light skirmiſhes and vaine alarmes betwixt the two armies; vntill that at length the Turks hauing by the C riuer ſufficiently ſtored the citie of Buda with victuals, the great Baſſa ſecretly by night roſe with his army, and ſo retired toward Belgrade. Which ſo baſe a retreat differed not much from a cowardly flight, being with ſuch ſilence made vnder the darke couert of the night, as that the Chriſtians had thereof no perceiuing vntill that they were quite departed and gone. This victualling of Buda and of ſome other few places of the Turks in Hungarie, was all that the great Baſſa did this yere with his great armie; whereas at his firſt comming it was giuen out, that he would therewith take both Strigonium and Peſth from the Chriſtians.

The next day the haſtie and ſudden departure of the enemie being perceiued, the Generall of the Chriſtians called together the Colonels and other great Commanders of the armie, to conſult with them, what were beſt to be done in ſo vnexpected an occurrent? Of whom, ſome D were of opinion, That it was beſt forthwith in all haſte to purſue their fearfull enemies: otherſome for many reaſons diſſuading the ſame, and otherſome withall propounding ſome other notable exploits to bee taken in hand. But in concluſion, the ſafeſt point was reſolued vpon, which was, not to hazard any their troupes in purſuing of their flying enemies, who were hardly to be ouertaken; but now immediatly after their departure to attempt the taking in of ſome one of their ſtrong holds: where, amongſt others that were propounded, Hatwan was thought to be the moſt neceſſarie place, being ſo ſeated, as that beſide the great harme it did to the Chriſtians thereabout, it much hindered both aduertiſements and victuals to be brought vnto Peſth. Which exploit reſolued vpon, they forthwith raſed the fort of S. Andrew, and the fort bẏ them built in the Iſle of Vicegade, becauſe they ſhould not ſtand the Turks in any E ſtead after their departure, and ſo with all their power ſet forward toward Hatwan. This towne is ſeated beyond the riuer of Danubius toward the North, about eight leagues from Buda, croſſing the way to Tranſyluania and Caſſoua, vpon a faire and euen plaine, neere vnto a great and deepe mariſh, and was ſometime defended with good and ſtrong wals, with a caſtle, and three large and deepe ditches, for a long time in the power of the Turks, and which without loſſe a great while held out againſt the valiant Baron Teuffenbach, by whom it was moſt ſtraitly in vaine beſieged: vntill that afterward it was againe beſieged by Maximilian the Archduke, the Emperours brother, then Generall of his armie in Hungarie in the yeare 1594, vnto whom it was by compoſition ſurrendered, after it had for a certaine ſpace beene by the Turkes notably defended: who conſidering the harme this place did vnto the Emperors territories, by reaſon of the ſcituation thereof, wherein a great and ſtrong garriſon of the Turkes alwaies lying, forraged all the Chriſtian territories as farre as the riuer Vague, yea and oftentimes tooke booties as far as Strigonium, and by ſpoiling of all that ſide of Hungarie, cauſed the countrey to pay contribution as farre as Ternauie, ſtanding within foure leagues of the mountaines which ſeperat Hungarie and Morauia: all irreparable loſſes to the Chriſtians, and hardly to be auoided : for which reaſons he cauſed it then to be diſmantled, and to be made vnſeruiceable for the wars. After which time for all that, the Turks for the commodiouſneſſe G of the place, had with great labour againe new fortified the ſame, with wals made with great piles of wood and faggots, with earth rammed in betwixt them; a ſtronger kind of fortification, and better able to withſtand the fury of the cannon, than are walls of ſtone : in which ſort

the Turks vſe moſt commonly to fortifie ſuch places as they meane to defend, and which oftentimes coſt much for the Chriſtians to gaine the ſame from them.

Hatwan beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Graſold Generall of the Italians ſlaine.

The Turkes in Hatwan craue parley.

This place thus fortified, and both with men and munition well furniſhed, and with all things needfull ſtored, was able to endure a great and long ſiege; whereunto the garriſon therein was as reſolutely ſet downe, as were the Chriſtians to attempt it : where now, at their firſt comming vnto it, a part of the Italian Regiment, aſſiſted with 300 Lanſquenets, vnder the leading H of Countie Sultze, and Graſold Generall of the Italians, were appointed to go before the reſt of the armie, and to begin to make the approches : which they did by forcing of a watermill, driuen by the water of the mariſh, not paſt a musket ſhot from the town. Wherein while they were buſied, the Turkes ſallying out of the towne, came to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians, and had with them a ſharpe combat, the Turkes fighting for the defending of the place and of their liues, and the Chriſtians for the gaining of the ſame, and for their honour.
Which ſo contrarie a reſolution in that conflict coſt the liues of many; and amongſt others, the life of Graſold, Generall of the Italians, there ſlaine with a harquebuſe ſhot, vnto the great hurt of the whole armie, but eſpecially of the Italians, now depriued of ſo great and expert a Commander.
At laſt for all that, the Turks were enforced confuſedly to retire again into the towne, I hauing in this ſallie loſt a number of their men alſo. The Chriſtians neuertheleſſe hauing driuen the Turks backe into the towne, went forward with their buſineſſe in making their approches, and placing their gabions to couer their cannon : wherein the Turks with their great & ſmall ſhot did them great harme, but eſpecially with their murthering pieces, charged with nailes and other ſmall pieces of yron. Howbeit, by the comming of the Lord Roſſworm with the reſt of the armie, the approches were the next day brought on, and the batterie planted ſo neere vnto the towne, as that the Turks could not without moſt manifeſt danger and loſſe, any more ſally out to trouble the Chriſtians in their workes. The firſt inconuenience the beſieged felt, was the want of water, which through the diligence of our men was ſoone taken from them, the cannon right furiouſly battering the wals in the mean ſpace. Wherewith the Turks K diſcouraged, and now out of hope to be relieued, thought it not beſt for them to expect either whileſt a breach were made, or an aſſault giuen, but by parly to preuent theſe dangers, in hope ſo to come to ſome eaſier compoſition, while yet they ſtood in their whole ſtrength. And ſo parley by the Turkes demanded, and by the Chriſtians granted, and hoſtages for the ſuretie thereof on both ſides giuen, they ſent two of the chiefe men amongſt them to entreat of the ſame : who at the firſt demanded, That their liues and libertie ſaued, they might with bag and baggage depart. Whereunto anſwer was giuen them, That they ſhould onely with their liues and libertie be gone, with ſome few hundreds of their worſt horſes of courteſie giuen them, to carry them to ſuch place as they meant to retire themſelues vnto, and to deliuer into the hands of the Chriſtians all ſuch renegats as were in the towne. I

Hatwan yeelded vnto the Chriſtians.

Now the beſieged Turks carrying yet the markes of the crueltie by the Wallons exerciſed vpon them in the former ſiege, when as the ſame town was by force taken, and filled with dead bodies of all ages & ſex, and doubting now this ſecond ſhipwreck, with like miſery threatned vnto them by the Chriſtian Generall, if they ſhould expect the dreadfull euent of a generall aſſault; accepted of theſe hard conditions, ſeeing no better could be obtained; and ſo couenanting, that they with their families, their liues and liberties ſaued, might with a ſafe conuoy be conducted vnto ſome place of ſurety within their own territory, they promiſed to giue vp the town. Which agreement on both parties reſolued vpon, they ful of ſorrow and heauines, with their families departing out of the town the 29 of Nouember, were by Colonel Andaſi with certain Huſſars ſafely conducted to Solnoc. The Chriſtians entring the towne, found therein M great ſtore of victuals & munition, the houſes ful of corne and other neceſſaries, and the ſhops ſtored with weapons, ſhot & pouder, with 24 pieces of great ordnance ready mounted, which might haue well ſufficed for the defence of the place. But all theſe things are but acceſſories vnto one principall, that is to ſay, to reſolution, without which they are but of ſmall force, and with-

A with which they are able to do much. Beſide that, the place it ſelfe thus furniſhed well conſidered, ſeemed almoſt impoſſible to haue bin forced, but eſpecially now that Winter was come on, which might haue brought a thouſand ſtormes and difficulties, by the Chriſtians not to haue been endured: ſo that euery man beholding the ſame, with his eies caſt vp towards heauen, gaue God the praiſe, for taking away the Turks courages in their ſo great aduantages, and encreaſing of the Chriſtians in their no leſſe difficulties: vnto whom the glory of this victory was wholly attributed, ſeeing that contrary to all apparance and mans forces, he had giuen to the Chriſtians the victorie, no way able by their owne forces to haue been gained. But God, which in his prouidence from heauen beholdeth all things vpon earth, diſpoſeth of the ſame as he ſeeth beſt for his glorie, and the welfare of his: ſo that in this action he was the only pilot B which brought this our ſhip into the hauen of health; for the haires of our head are of him numbred, and euen the leaſt creatures vpon earth are by him regarded.

Into this new gained town the Chriſtian Generall put a good and ſtrong garriſon of a thouſand Lanſquenets and fiue hundred Hungarians, part horſemen, and part footmen, for the keeping of the place and of the countrey thereabout: which done, he retired with his armie toward Peſth, which he relieued with victuals, and ſtrengthened with the troupes of the Colonels Collonitz, Geisberg, and Rouer, who were there bilited to paſſe the Winter, and to preſerue the place againſt the deuiſes and enterpriſes of the Turks of Buda, who were ſtill deuiſing and practiſing for the regaining thereof.

The time of the yeare for ſouldiers any longer to keep the field now paſt, and the great armie of C the Turks riſen and gone, the Lord Ruſſworm breaking vp his armie neere vnto Strigonium, cauſed all the Enſignes by him this yere gained from the Turks, euen 64 in number, to be gathered together, all very braue and gallant, all which he ſent with great pomp & triumph to Vienna, for a Preſent to the Archduke Matthias; who receiued them with great thanks giuen both vnto the Generall that ſent them, and the ſouldiers that had gained them, and bountifully rewarding them that had brought them. They of Vienna at the ſame time highly commending the Generall, and not a little reioycing to ſee thoſe ſame Enſignes now in their power within the citie, which not long before had proudly braued them in the field.

The Lord Ruſſworm breaketh vp his army, & ſendeth the enſignes gained from the Turke for a preſent to the Archduke Matthias.

Now after the breaking vp of the Chriſtian armie, a great number of inſolent and ſeditious ſouldiers, eſpecially of the Regiment of Colonel Altmein, roming vp and downe the country, D to ſeeke for bootie, moſt cruelly rifled and ſpoiled the countrey villages, with the inhabitants therein, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, ſparing no more the one than the other, whoſe outrage not otherwiſe to be ſtayed, they were by commandement from the Emperor, by force charged at Widhof, and two hundred and thirty of them being brought in priſoners to Vienna, foure and thirtie of them were there for example hanged, and the reſt as men not worthy of entertainment caſhiered.

The time of the yeare hauing (as we ſaid) broken vp the armie of the Chriſtians, the Regiment of the Countie Reingraue was put in garriſon into the villages of Chiante and Ternauie, alwaies at hand with the enemies, as fitteſt to repulſe them. Theſe ſouldiers were alwaies kept in doings, ſtil fighting whileſt others were at peace, and mannaging their armes, whileſt others hanged theirs by the wals. For beſide the troubles they had with the Turks, their nigh but bad neighbours, the very inhabitants of the countrey (who held all that might hurt them, for enemies, were they neuer ſo much their friends) oftentimes, and that for little or no occaſion at al, tooke vp armes, and right furiouſly charged them as their mortal enemies. Of which combats there was no end, the countrey peaſants ſtill ſtriuing to rid themſelues of ſuch gheſts. So that theſe valiant men ſtill enforced to buy their bread with the price of their bloud, as men become deſperat, vſed the Chriſtians as they did the Turks, diuiding all things with them by the ſword. But in theſe ſmall and often fights moe men were ſlaine & loſt than would haue bin in a generall battel, ſome good number either on the one ſide or the other being euery day ſlain: which daily inconueniences cauſed theſe ſouldiers to reſolue to goe to ſeeke their liuing elſewhere, rather than in the midſt of the graues of their fellows. Whereunto they were the rather enduced, for that but a little before, the troupe of Captaine Clinchampe, the beſt and braueſt of the whole Regiment, was one night right furiouſly aſſailed, and almoſt ſurpriſed by the countrey peaſants. Wherfore they departed out of Hungarie into Auſtria without victuals, apparel, or money, their pay due vnto them for 17 months being kept from them. A crueltie full of couetouſneſſe, and a couetouſneſſe full of crueltie, by wrong and hard dealing to leaue thoſe men to the deſperat extreamitie of hunger, who for our ſafetie had expoſed themſelues to all G manner of danger. For if the Prince (as he may of right) demand the liues of his ſubiects in his ſeruice, as bound vnto their loyaltie; they may alſo of right require due prouiſion for their maintenance: of which two offices where one faileth, the whole ſtate muſt needs fall. For prouiding wherefore, great was the wiſdome of Auguſtus, who laid vp the publique reuenue apart by it ſelfe, to defray the publique charge; and that which was his owne priuat, to ſerue his owne priuat vſes.

Theſe poore ſouldiers thus reſolued, craued leaue of the Biſhop of Preſbourg to paſſe by the ſuburbs of his towne, without doing therein any harme: which their requeſt he courteouſly granted; and ſo according to their word they indeed paſſed, not ſo much as once wiſhing H for that they durſt not once touch. Which their ſo quiet paſſage cauſed the Biſhop to furniſh them with boats, whereby to paſſe ouer the riuer which diuideth Hungarie from Auſtria.
Which once knowne vnto the peaſants of Auſtria, they aſſembled themſelues together, to the number of 1500 men, and caſt vp a fort vpon the banke of the riuer, with three faulconers in it, reſolutely ſet downe to keepe them from comming ouer into their countrey. Which their ſo forward a reſolution for a while ſtaid theſe men of warre: who to auoid further trouble, courteouſly requeſted paſſage of theſe men, promiſing all their good behauiour in paſſing quietly through their country: which the carles in moſt churliſh manner refuſed to grant, with proud threats of the danger of their liues, if they ſhould by force attempt the paſſage, and not with quietneſſe returne. With which brauadoes of the countrey churles theſe troupes of martiall I men prouoked, reſolued by force to remoue theſe lets, and by the ſword to open themſelues a way: ſo turning the head of their bagages toward the fort, as if they would haue there paſſed;
while the peaſants ſtood gazing vpon them, Camgaillard with his troupe of horſemen vnperceiued of them tooke the riuer a little higher vp, and by ſwimming gained the farther banke:
after whom captaine Clinchamp with his troupes immediatly followed alſo. In which paſſage they were much troubled with great flakes of yce, with the great deepneſſe of the riuer, with the ſteepneſſe of the bankes where they were to land, and many other difficulties: all which they regarded not, to be reuenged of their enemies. Theſe valiant men being got ouer, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſing theſe rude country churles, & furiouſly charging of them, quickly ouerthrew them, and cut them in pieces: of whom 300 were left dead vpon the place, as many K moe hurt, and the reſt put to flight. Which was no ſooner done, but that the reſt of the troups of the regiment without let paſſed the riuer, and ſo ioyned themſelues vnto their victorious companions. Seuen weekes this Regiment ſtaied in Auſtria; and ſo longer had, but that vpon the complaint and requeſt of the nobilitie and of the people of the countrie, they hauing for 17 months pay due vnto them receiued nine months pay, were licenſed to depart. Which was a great ouerſight in them that had to do therewith, at once to diſband ſo many good men, as had not their like amongſt all the reſt of the Emperours garriſons; and who being ſtaid with a little money, might with their good ſeruice haue ſtood the Emperour in great ſtead: as by proofe afterward appeared; when as the Emperour by neceſſitie forced to call them together againe, could not of all that ſtrong regiment raiſe but three companies; the reſt being ſome of L them returned into their owne countries, other ſome of them gone to ſerue in other places, or elſe otherwiſe diſperſed. Of which three companies, the firſt was giuen to Camgaillard, the ſecond to Baltazar Marades, a Spaniard, and the laſt to Iohn Paul an Italian: Which three Captaines had before commanded in the Reingraues regiment, and don the Emperor good ſeruice as they did afterward alſo.

The peſants of Auſtria ſeek by force to ſtay the paſſage of the ſouldiers of the Reingraues regiment into their country.

The churles of Auſtria ouerthrowne.

The reſt of this yeare ended in Hungarie, with diuers other encounters and combats, Fortune therein ſtill fauouring the Chriſtians. As, 300 Haiducks, going forth to ſeeke for bootie, by good hap chanced to meet with a companie of the Turkes being very rich, and diuers of them men of good account; amongſt whom, the Gouernour of Mohatz was one: all whome theſe Haiducks cut in pieces, to be borne withall, for ſhewing no fauor vnto them, who moſt M cruelly had before ſpoiled them of their parents, lands, and goods. Beſides that, they tooke the Gouernor of Copan, with his ſonne, and 24 other very rich Turks, with 170 horſes of ſeruice, and eight fat Oxen prepared for their prouiſion. Which fat booties drew forth other ſouldiers alſo to ſeeke out for the like: of whom, certain troups of the Chriſtians going forth toward

Diuers happie conflicts of the Chriſtians with the Turkes and Tartars.

A toward Batſwar, a towne of the enemies, met the Gouernor of the towne and of the territorie thereabout come out with his garriſon againſt them; where betwixt them was made a right hot and ſharpe fight: wherein at the firſt encounter the Turks ſeemed to haue the better, but in the end the Chriſtians taking courage, ouerthrew them and cut them in pieces. In this conflict diuers priſoners were taken, with three Enſignes, and many other rich ſpoiles. This happy exploit was ſeconded with newes agreeable thereunto out of Moldauia, whereof the Vayuod by a Curror ſent of purpoſe, gaue our men to vnderſtand; which was, of the general ouerthrow of the Tartars: who hauing with all manner of crueltie waſted the countrey, had in the end made the inhabitants ſo deſperat, that repoſing more comfort in a ſpeedie death (the end of all miſeries) than in a lingring life, turmoiled with ſo many intollerable calamities, they generally B arming themſelues, ioyned themſelues with their Vayuod, ſo to trie their laſt fortune. With which reſolution they in battell encountering with the Tartars, gaue them a great ouerthrow, a number of them beeing left dead vpon the field, and the reſt put to flight, and chaſed out of the countrey, the Moldauians notably reuenging their former loſſes, and in their owne territories burying their enemies.

Neither were the Turks in this cold and hard time of the yeare on their parts idle, but ſtill plotting of their great and notable deſignes, euen through the middeſt of the froſt and ſnow to haue beene performed. The Baſſa Beged hearing that the Lord Baſta lay with his troupes diſperſed in the country about Lippa, in great ſecurity by reaſon of the extremity of the time, altogether vnfit for men to keepe the field: and therefore imagining it to be no great matter, C now amidſt the froſt and the ſnow to ſurprize him; acquainted three other of the Turks Captaines and Commanders threabout with the matter: who liking well thereof, with 5000 men all together ſet forward, in hope to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed him. But he an old expert Captaine, and not ſo careleſſe as they ſuppoſed, had his ſecret ſpies ſtill abroad among them: by whom, he aduertiſed both of their purpoſe and of their comming, reſolued in both to preuent them; and to that end hauing called together his forces, ſet forward to meet them in the mid way, and ſo before they were aware to intercept them; neither failed he of his purpoſe: for meeting with the Turkes fearing no ſuch matter in place of diſaduantage, and vpon the ſudden charging them round, they, deceiued of their expectation for the eaſineſſe of the victorie promiſed them, as men diſmaied, after ſome ſmal reſiſtance fled; aboue eleuen hundred D of them beeing in this conflict ſlaine, and the reſt put in rout, and driuen into the riuer Maruze, there periſhing; ſome few onely by ſpeedie flight with the Baſſa eſcaping. Twentie of the Turkes Captaines were heere taken, with ſome few other priſoners, and a great and rich bootie.

Much about the ſame time George Barbell, one of the chiefe of the Rebels in Tranſyluania, acknowledging his fault, came to Claudionople, to take the oath for his alleageance vnto the Emperor: by whoſe example a great number of others moued, came in and ſubmitted themſelues alſo: and happily he being a good and valiant Captaine, had done much more for the ſeruice of the Emperor, had he not bin by death preuented; for ſhortly after he ſuddenly died. The other Rebels mooued neither by his example, nor by the comming in of ſome others of E their companions, made choice of one Bethlin Habor (a moſt renowned Captaine, and of great reputation amongſt the ſouldiers) for their Chiefetaine: who proud of ſuch a choice, immediatly after ſent an Herauld vnto Baſta, to will him forthwith to deliuer vnto him all the countrie of Tranſyluania, as to him that was of late choſen Prince thereof, or elſe to denounce vnto him moſt cruell war: and to tell him further, That if he refuſed ſo to do, he was in good hope by his owne forces, without any aid from the Turke, to driue him out, beeing well aſſured of the faithful deuoire of the Tranſyluanians. At whoſe proud threats Baſta ſmiling, only ſhewed him his open hand in ſigne that hee accepted of his proud threates, not vouchſafing him any other anſwer at all. This glorious boaſter bare himſelfe the higher, for that he had maried the widow of Moyſes the chiefe Rebell, wherby he had gained both great riches, and much credit and reputation among the common people: both which he enioyed but a while; for the fourth day after that he was married, he died, and ſo was buried. Baſta neuertheleſſe, for the better aſſuring of the ſtrong places of Tranſyluania, put into them garriſons of his moſt faithfull Germanes, and diſpatched Cranſenich away toward the Emperour, to requeſt of him a ſupplie of a thouſand horſemen and foure thouſand foot, without which hee thought it impoſſible to preſerue and keepe the Prouince troubled with ſo great factions, and ſo earneſtly ſought after by the Turkes: and further to certifie him, That the little forces he had left was not ſufficient G for the keeping of the places beſet with ſo many enemies, and all lying as it were in their mouthes: That the Prouince ſwarmed with ſeditious people, one thruſting another forward in miſchiefe and rebellion, as the eares of wheat driuen with the winde doe one another in the field: that the Turkes were alwayes making of new incurſions, which hee was not able to repreſſe without greater forces, which he expected from his Maieſty with al ſpeed poſſible: proteſting, for want of ſuch ſupply to bee in time ſent vnto him, to lay the loſſe of the Prouince vpon the negligence of them which might and ought to haue ſent the ſame; acquitting himſelfe for the loſſe thereof, ſeeing that he durſt not to repoſe any truſt or confidence in the faith of the citiſens and inhabitants of the townes, although they were diſarmed, for hauing ſo often falſified their faith, and put their Prouince in danger of vtter ruine and deſtruction. But H leauing theſe troubles of Tranſyluania and Hungarie, let vs a little ſtep backe to ſee what happened among the Turkes themſelues, after the departure of the great Baſſa with his armie out of Hungarie.

Mahomet the great Sultan had (as is before declared) by great promiſes made vnto his Rebels, ſought to appeaſe the rebellion in Aſia, and by that meanes drawne Zellaly, one of the chiefe Rebels, with twelue thouſand good ſouldiers out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo into his warres in Hungarie, vpon an aſſured promiſe made vnto him of the gouernment of Boſna: the hope whereof, as it had drawne him into theſe late warres, ſo had it alſo encouraged him with his gallant troupes of moſt braue horſemen to doe the beſt ſeruice he could, ſo to ſhew himſelfe worthie of ſo honourable a preferment: which hee right notably performed during all I the time of the Baſſaes abode in Hungarie, to his owne great commendation, and the furthering of his Lord and Maſters ſeruice. But the Baſſa with his weake armie retired out of Hungarie, and the Baſſa himſelfe returned toward Conſtantinople; Zellaly with three thouſand horſe withdrew himſelfe into his promiſed gouernment of Boſna, to poſſeſſe himſelfe thereof: and beeing come neere to Bagualue, the chiefe towne of that Prouince, hee there encamped in a faire large medow, within ſight of the citie. Now Zeffer Baſſa, then Gouernour of the Prouince, and not as yet thereof diſcharged, ſeeing this Rebell thus to encroach vpon his charge, as if he would euen by force intrude himſelfe thereinto; with all ſpeed called together his garriſons and men of warre (euer readie at his becke) and ſo went forth againſt K Zellaly, with a purpoſe to haue quickely, and without any great trouble, cut him with his ſo ſmall a company all in pieces. But the old Rebell not ignorant either of his owne weakneſſe, or of the Baſſaes ſtrength, hauing himſelfe loſt the beſt part of his forces before in Hungarie; as he was a man of no leſſe wiſedome than courage, reſolued now to attempt by policie that which hee well knew hee could not by force effect. Wherefore he as a great Prince, vpon ſome braue reſolution, began to encampe himſelfe as if hee had meant there to haue lyen, when as immediatly after vpon a faire night hauing cauſed diuers great fires to be made in his tents, as if it had been to beguile the enemie with, he ſuddenly roſe and departed. Of whoſe flight (for ſo it was like) the Baſſa vnderſtanding, and that hee had forſaken his campe, haſted L thither with all ſpeed with his ſouldiers to take and pillage the ſame; not making any other account of him that was ſo fled and gone, but as of a baſe and faint-hearted coward, who for feare and want of courage had left both his campe and honour as a prey vnto his enemies; the ſpoyle whereof the Baſſa (being poſſeſſed of the campe) gaue vnto his ſouldiers; who glad of ſuch a morſell, greedily ſwallowed it vp, which by and by after became their bane and vtter deſtruction: for whileſt that they were charging themſelues with booties, and euery man was thinking of his prey, nothing carefull of their common ſafetie, Zellaly with his three thouſand horſe, all valiant and reſolute men, ſuddenly the ſame night returning, ſurpriſed the Turks being faſt on ſleepe, as buried in ſecuritie, and cut them in pieces. Some of greater courage than the reſt, began to make head, and to giue ſome ſhew of their valor, but ouercome with the generall feare, out of order, and not reſolued what to do, they were quickly with the reſt forced, M ouerthrown, and ſlaine. In this ſurpriſe there were of the Baſſaes men ſix thouſand found dead vpon the place: a verie great ſlaughter to be made by ſo few men. But what cannot valiant reſolution do againſt carelesneſſe, lulled aſleep in the lap of ſecuritie? The Baſſa himſelfe eſcaped by flight, with ſuch as could get out of the campe to follow him.

By pollicy ouerthroweth Zeffer Baſſa the Gouernour, and poſſeſſeth it himſelfe.

Now Zellaly well knowing how to vſe his victorie, marched in haſte to all the chiefe places of the Prouince, and with his forces, more feared for their victorie than for their number, cauſed all the inhabitants of thoſe places, with moſt part of the reſt of the people of the countrey, to ſweare vnto him their obedience and fidelitie. In which doing he gathered together great ſtore of wealth, with a great number of braue horſes for ſeruice: all which hee put into Balnaluc, a ſtrong towne, whereinto he in triumphant manner entred, with a crowne of laurell vpon his head, and his ſouldiers ſinging his praiſes amiddeſt the ſmoke of a thouſand pieces of great ordnance, which he cauſed inceſſantly to be ſhot off for the ſpace of two daies together; giuing it out withall (amongſt all the ioyfull feaſts and triumphs, made for the magnifying and ſetting forth of his praiſe and glorie) That his reſolution was, to take part with the Chriſtian Emperor, if the great Baſſa's, or other his enemies in great place in court, ſhould ſeeke to croſſe his deſires, or to formalize his actions or proceedings in this manner of the obtaining of his gouernment.

Sultan Mahomet ſendeth for Zellaly to come vnto him to Conſtantinople.

Now Mahomet doubting what this man, ſo well acquainted with rebellion, would do, had by diuers meſſengers ſent for him to Conſtantinople, after the breaking vp of the armie in Hungarie, there of his Imperiall and infinit bountie, to receiue the honorable rewards of his good ſeruice and valor, the greatneſſe whereof he had (as he ſaid) alreadie vnderſtood by Haſſan Baſſa the Generall: which ſo bound him to the reward thereof, as that his deſire and pleaſure was, to grace him in court with his owne hands, for the greater teſtimonie of the loue he bare him, and of the eſteeme he had of him. But the craftie and miſtruſtfull Rebell, doubting that theſe faire words were all but baits to draw him into his power, to the endangering or aſſured loſſe both of his life and libertie, ſhut his eares againſt theſe ſo ſweet charmes, and as a man well aduiſed, and one which knew that the hand of a Prince iuſtly offended, is alwayes open for to puniſh his rebellious ſubiects, being once in his power, with as great iuſtice in puniſhing him, as he with wrong and diſloyaltie offended him; would in no wiſe accept of the offer: but ciuilly anſwered, That hee moſt humbly thanked the great Sultan, for his ſo great and honorable offers, and that he was ſo mindfull of him: but that he for his part deſired not any greater reward for the ſeruices by him done, more than the gouernment which his Maieſtie had before promiſed him, whereof (according to which promiſe, which hee could not thinke, but to be agreeable to his good liking) he was now poſſeſſed, with a reſolution to hold and keepe the ſame for his Maieſties ſeruice. Which was as much in effect, as for a diſloyall ſubiect to talke with his angrie Soueraigne, with his hand vpon his ſword: but with this ſlie anſwer, ſuch as it was, Sultan Mahomet for all his greatneſſe, muſt as yet content himſelfe, for feare leſt if he ſhould haue ſought to haue by force remoued him, hee might ſo haue raiſed a more dangerous rebellion in Europe, than was alreadie in Aſia. Zellaly ſo politique and reſolute a man, and not to ſeeke what to doe in ſuch matters, being poſſeſſed of ſo great a gouernement, and the Chriſtian Emperour at hand readie to haue backed him, if hee ſhould vpon any diſcontentment haue reuolted.

The troubles of this yeare 1603 thus ouerpaſt, the beginning of the next was like vnto a faire blooming tree, which promiſing great ſtore of fruit, but afterward blaſted with the extremitie of the weather, proueth in effect as barren, as it before ſeemed in hope fruitfull. For beginning with the ſweet Weſterne windes of peace, it ended with the ſterne Northren blaſts of warre. The Turkes had oftentimes the laſt yeare made motion of peace, but eſpecially toward the end thereof; outwardly making ſhew of a great deſire and forwardneſſe in themſelues thereunto. Which buſineſſe the laſt yeare begun, was euen with the beginning of this yeare alſo effectually continued, that Commiſſioners were on both ſides appointed to conferre and conclude vpon the ſame. Among theſe Commiſſioners Colonell Althem was one; who to performe his charge, hauing taken with him the other Commiſſioners deputed with him for this purpoſe, with certaine other Captaines, embarqued himſelfe with them in thirteene ſhips from Strigonium, and from thence ſayling downe the Riuer, landed with his traine in the Iland betwixt Buda and Peſth. Of whoſe arriuall there, the Turkes of Buda aduertiſed, and on their part readie, came forthwith thither alſo, with all the outward ſhewes that might be, of their moſt earneſt deſire for the concluding of peace: whereas our men, who by a thouſand effects were aſſured of the vnfaithfulneſſe of the Turkes, and that neceſſitie, and not the deſire of any quietneſſe, had drawne them to ſeeke for peace, to the contrarie ſhewed themſelues verie backward in this buſineſſe. For why, they knew right well, that the Turkes had not taken this matter in hand, but to ouertake them, and by this time of peace to gaine a time of war more commodious and fit for their ambitious and cruell deſignes. They had the yere before made ſufficient proofe of our forces, accompanied with good fortune, which cauſed them to deſpaire by ſtrong hand to vanquiſh and ouercome vs: beſides that, they ſtill euerie houre in one place or other receiued a thouſand loſſes and croſſes from our garriſons, who diſtreſſed and annoyed them both with their forces, and with driuing of them vnto the extremitie of wants. Our men knew moreouer alſo, that the troubles of Aſia as well from the Rebels as from the Perſian which lay ſo heauie vpon the great Sultan, drew them to this neceſſitie, to ſeeke for a breathing time of peace, wherein to repaire that which was in their forces and ſtrength by wars impaired. And euen yet alſo the manner of the Turkes demeaning of themſelues in this action, their delaies, their excuſes, & deferring from day to day to conclude vpon ſome point of this treatie, gaue our men good cauſe to ſuſpect them of euill meaning, as men reſpecting their profit, more than their faith: and more ſubtill and cruell in all their actions, than honorable and valorous. The fifth of Ianuarie was the day by our men expected for the treaty; for as then the Baſſa of Buda had appointed with the reſt of the commiſſioners to come into the Iſle, to heare what our commiſſioners ſhould demand, & to entreat of the peace. But he was too true an Infidell to faile of his Infidelitie, and ſo came not at all, but deceiued our men both of their hope & expectation. At length in ſtead of himſelf, letters were brought from him to Colonell Althem; wherby he excuſed himſelfe for not comming, requeſting him with the reſt of the commiſſioners, to come ouer the riuer to Buda, the more commodiouſly for them to confer together, & ſo the better to conclude their negotiation. Now though Althem for the maieſtie of his Prince, and the honor of the State, ought not at the requeſt of theſe his enemies to haue put himſelfe into their power, but to haue ſtood faſt vpon the tearmes of honor, yet to the end that the countrey of Hungarie, ſo miſerably ſpoiled with warres, ſhould not take occaſion to complaine of his negligence in this negotiation of peace, hee reſolued to go to Buda, as the Baſſa had requeſted: deeming euery action tending to the hinderance of the common good, to be but in ſhew honorable, and in deed hurtfull. Vpon which reſolution hee ſent before the Gentleman of his ſtable, and his Cooke, with a Gentleman of the Turkes, ſent but the day before from the Baſſa: which men going aboord together, were aſſailed with ſuch a cruell tempeſt vpon the riuer, that neither the skill of the watermen, nor goodneſſe of the veſſell was able to reſiſt the force thereof, ſo that the boat was ſunke, and the men drowned. An euill preſage of the peace to be made, the raging waterr as it were foreſhewing the troubles to come. But this tempeſt by the ſacrifice of thoſe poore drowned men appeaſed, Althem and Geiſberg, two of the chiefe commiſſioners, embarked themſelues, and ſo paſſed ouer the riuer to Buda. At whoſe arriuall the Turks gaue in ſhew a thouſand teſtimonies of their ioy for their comming. Neither did the Germans refuſe their kind offered courteſies, but largely fed of the good cheere, and filled themſelues with the good wines, whereof the Turks had giuen them plentie: and they againe vſing them as kindly, as if they had been their brethren, & conuerſing with them as with their owne countrymen. Amidſt this carowſing and platters full of good cheere, the propoſition of peace, which the Turks meant to demand, were ſerued in alſo, and a truce for twelue daies demanded to conſider of the matter: during which time it ſhould be lawfull for euerie man without let freely to come and goe whither they would: which was forthwith on both ſides agreed vpon. And for better teſtimony of the Turkes true meaning in this their negotiation of peace, the Baſſa in the preſence of our commiſſioners diſpatched a Curror toward the great Sultan, to aduertiſe him of this buſineſſe, and of the proceeding therein, according to the commandement by him before giuen. Which he did, to cauſe our men to beleeue, that the great Sultan himſelfe was deſirous of peace, and that his Captaines well affected thereunto, were willing to further the ſame. Which done, the Baſſa preſented vnto Colonell Althem two caſes full of Turkes armes, of all manner of faſhions, verie rich, and cunningly wrought; both carried by a mule, with furniture for an horſe, embroydered with gold and pearle, verie ſumptuous and rich, as a Preſent from the great Sultan his Lord and Maſter, to the Emperour. And for the Archduke Matthias, hee preſented vnto the Colonell, a robe of purple veluet, with ſleeues cunningly embroydered with gold and pearle, emboſſed with fine and curious figures cunningly wrought with the needle:

A for the rareneſſe thereof as admirable to behold, as for the richneſſe thereof to haue been deſired: which was by euery man wondered at, when as ſhortly after it was by Althem preſented vnto the Archduke, together with other preſents from the Turks. Beſides that, the ſame Baſſa in token of friendſhip, preſented vnto Althem himſelfe another verie faire and rich robe: all the reſt of the Commiſſioners receiuing alſo from the Baſſa other robes of leſſe value, but yet all very rich and ſumptuous.

This buſineſſe for this time thus ended, and the truce for twelue days concluded, the Chriſtian Commiſſioners loded with Preſents tooke their leaue of the Turks, with the ſhewes of their good wils, and ſo returned backe againe to Peſth. Howbeit theſe the enemies faire preſents ſtill ſauoured but of enmitie, being indeed but like to the Preſents of Hector and Ajax, B tending rather to war than to peace.

Now the death of the moſt valiant and renowned Lord Nadaſta, which at this time happened, was another euil preſage of the bad ſucceſſe of this treatie of peace now at hand: who hauing of long beene a barre vnto the Turks rage in that part of Hungarie where he dwelt, they now after his death, with the violence of their forces, as with an headie ſtreame, bare downe before them all our good fortune in that prouince. This worthie man of great fame and deſert, had ſpent both his yeares and fortune in the moſt honourable warres againſt the Turkes: wherein he was ſo skilfull and expert, that he was of them feared as another Huniades, and of the Chriſtians honoured as another Matthias. He had a thouſand times moſt valiantly fought againſt theſe miſcreants, and as many times foiled them, to the great benefit of the Chriſtian C Commonweale, the aduancement of the Emperours ſeruice, and the reliefe of his diſtreſſed Countrey. Theſe his heroical deeds of armes were engrauen vpon the gates of the Townes and Cities of Hungarie, and within the rockes of Tranſyluania, hauing both in the one countrey and the other right happily defeated theſe Infidels. He had the honour to haue receiued the firſt incurſions and attempts of the Turkes, at ſuch time as Amurath the third hauing perfidiouſly broken the League made with Maximilian the Emperour, with his Forces inuaded Hungarie; and was the firſt of all the Chriſtian Chiefetaines that made head againſt them; and being by their ſudden comming in by them almoſt ſurpriſed, performed yet great and worthie exploits and ſeruice againſt theſe faithleſſe men. It ſhould ſeeme that good fortune fauoured the Countrey of Hungarie, but onely in reſpect of him: for he being dead, it died alſo, burying it ſelfe as it were in his graue, and him in glorie; not ſuffering him to grow old, and ſo to languiſh in the ruines of his natiue Countrey. He died of a natural death, about fiftie and foure yeares old, moſt part whereof he liued in armes, ſtill charged with the burthen of his armour, and euen at the yeelding vp of the ghoſt yet breathing wars againſt theſe the enemies of the Chriſtian Faith. His death was much lamented for of many faithfull Chriſtians, but eſpecially of his owne tenants and ſubiects, whom he had alwayes kept and preſerued in ſafetie, and ſtill maintained them in all peace and tranquilitie during all theſe former warres; the Turkes not daring once to aſſaile them, nor to enter into their territorie, being ſtayd from ſo doing by the bulwarke of his valour, right dreadfull to their attempts. Neuer Turke was buried in his Territorie, no more than were the Barbarians vpon the bankes of the riuer Eurotas, his wiſedome had ſo wiſely prouided for the preſeruation of his people; and his valour ſo worthily aſſured them of their health and ſafetie. He was for his Countrey another Epiminondas, who made his town not only free from the armes and inuaſions of their enemies, but alſo dreadfull to their forces ſo long as he liued. The Turks on the contrarie part no leſſe reioyced for his death; but accounting his country now rich & plentiful (for that it had neuer been by them ſpoiled) for their moſt aſſured prey came now thither on all ſides, to haue taken the ſpoile thereof, and therewith to haue enriched themſelues. But as they were about ſo to haue done, the valiant Collonitz honoring the remembrance of the Lord Nadaſti his late fellow and companion in armes, and holding that for his owne which he had left, oppoſed himſelfe with his forces againſt theſe rauening wolues. So that they were no ſooner entered into this his territorie, but that contrarie to their expectation, they were encountered by this new Nadaſti, and by him ſo ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, that for a good while after they durſt no more attempt the like.

The death of the Lord Nadaſti.

This ſo great a loſſe of ſo worthie a man was a little eaſed by the victorie about the ſame time gained by the Vayuod of Valachia againſt the Turkes ſpoyling of his countrey. This valiant champion not able longer to endure the proud inſolencie and tyrannie of thoſe barbarous people, gathered together his troupes of horſemen, with ſuch other ſmall forces as hee had; whereof the Turks hauing made ſmall reckoning, and therefore without order pillaging and ranſacking his countrie, were when they leaſt feared, by him vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed and ouerthrowne, many of them being cut in pieces, a number moe taken priſoners, withall the ſpoiles they had got, and the reſt with ſuch feare chaſed out of his countrey, as that being glad to haue eſcaped, they tooke no pleaſure for a great while after, to looke into that his prouince againe.

The ſmall time of Truce yeeldeth great contentment both vnto the Chriſtians & Turks in Hungarie.

The death of the great Sultan Mahomet.

But to returne againe to the Commiſſioners for the peace to be made betwixt the Great Sultan and the Emperour, the Baſſa of Buda, to the end that the Captaines and Gouernours of the Turks and Caſtles belonging to the Turks, being ignorant of the truce, ſhould not continue their warlike actions, to the preiudice of his faith giuen; immediately after the departure of the Chriſtian Commiſſioners from Buda, diſpatched diuers courrours towards them, to giue them knowledge thereof, and eſpecially to the Gouernor of Agria, commanding them from thenceforth to abſtain from their ordinarie incurſions into their enemies territories, and from all other actions of hoſtilitie, and ſo to keep themſelues quiet vntil they were from him otherwiſe commanded. This little time of reſpite and breathing from warre, gaue great contentment vnto the poore Countrey-people, now with warres almoſt exhauſted and ſpent. And now our ſouldiours during this time of truce laying their armes aſide, ranne by heapes with ſpades and ſhouels vnto the places where our armies had ſometime lyen encamped, there to delve and ſearch to finde ſuch things as the Armies riſing in haſte had haply left there buried. In which action they ſo buſied themſelues as if they had beene Labourers in harueſt, ſo that nothing was in the fields to be ſeene, but men digging and remoouing of ſtones and earth. A right fooliſh buſineſſe, and yet ſo exceedingly pleaſing the greedie mindes of theſe couetous men, as that amiddeſt their ſuch moiling labour they accounted themſelues at great eaſe. The Turks alſo did the like, mingled together with our men, and our men with them, without any iniurie doing one to another either by word or deed. And no doubt it is, but that there they found more trauell than wealth, the greedie deſire which drew them into this worke, deceiuing them in effect. And in this mad labour both the parties ſpent many dayes without any let or iniurie doing either on the one ſide or the other. The Chriſtians of Peſth alſo paſſing ouer the Danubie, went into the victualling houſes of the Turks at Buda, whereinto they were ſuffered to enter, and at libertie to walke vp and downe the Towne at their pleaſure. And ſo the Turks of Buda likewiſe came ouer the riuer vnto Peſth, and there walked at their pleaſure, no man letting of them. Which manner of liuing was verie commodious and pleaſing both for the one ſide and the other, the Chriſtians buying of the Turks ſuch things as they needed, and the Turks of them likewiſe. Through which quiet and peaceable intercourſe and traffique, the people in general ſeemed euen in that ſhort time to haue forgotten a great part of their forepaſſed miſeries, this little time of peace, joyned with ſecurity, hauing well aſſuaged the ſame. But while theſe mutual and vnwonted courteſies thus paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, and the mindes of moſt men were filled with the expectation of an aſſured peace to haue beene euen forthwith concluded, the Great Sultan Mahomet in the middeſt of all his pleaſures and delights died in his Imperial Palace at Conſtantinople: the newes whereof being in the euening brought to Buda by a courrour of purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople, the Baſſa forthwith ſent the Captaine of the Sentinels of Buda, to Colonell Geisberg at Peſth, to aſſure him of the death of the Great Sultan Mahomet, and of the ſucceſſion of his yong ſon Achmet into his Empire, now alreadie both at Conſtantinople and other places thereabout proclaimed Emperour. By which meſſenger he alſo wrote vnto Colonel Althem, to certifie him both of the death of the Great Sultan, and of the ſucceſſion of his ſonne, as alſo that he was by him commanded to continue the negotiation of the peace, and ſo if he could to conclude the ſame. For the more euidence whereof, behold the copie of the letters themſelues:

Our due commendations remembered, noble Lord Gouernour, our deere friend and right honourable neighbour, A neighbour. Wee haue thought good to aduertiſe you, that the fourth day after your departure from this citie wee receiued Letters from Conſtantinople, giuing vs certainely to vnderſtand of the death of our moſt mightie Emperour Mahomet, and of the ſucceſsion of his ſonne Sultan Achmat, into all his dominions and Empires: whereby we were, as his moſt humble ſubiects, ſummoned to yeeld vnto him our oath of faithfull obedience, as vnto our rightfull Lord, and lawfull ſucceſſor of his father into all his eſtates and dominions. Moreouer, he particularly commandeth vs, to giue him certaine aduice and knowledge concerning the negotiation of the peace begun betwixt vs and you, by the commandement of his deceaſed father: promiſing to confirme and ratifie all that whatſoeuer he ſhall finde done and agreed vpon concerning that buſineſſe, without any qualification at all. And that if the treatie be not yet concluded and ended, that his will and deſire was, that it ſhould be ſo, according to the iuſt meanes and aſſurances B that we ſhould faithfully and carefully together deuiſe. Whereof I ſhould readily giue him aduice and anſwer; which I haue deferred to do, vntill I haue receiued your anſwer, which may inſtruct me what to reſolue vpon. Which your anſwer I attending, haue ſtaied the Curror of Conſtantinople, to the intent he may carry backe word vnto our Emperor, what he is to hope for concerning this buſineſſe, by the anſwer that you ſhall giue vs. Theſe are now therefore to aduiſe you, as our deere friend, and a moſt valiant Gouernor, to ſet downe that which you ſhall thinke to be moſt fit and neceſſarie in this buſineſſe: giuing you withall to vnderſtand, that our new Emperour is a man of reſolution euen in theſe his young yeares, wherein hee now flouriſheth, hating idleneſſe, deeming no loſſe greater, and altogether irrepairable, than the loſſe of time. If then you be ſtill deſirous, that the peace betwixt our Emperors ſhould be made and confirmed, I hope you will employ your whole endeuor with ſpeed to determine this moſt happie negotiation, and ſo ne- C ceſſarie for euery mans good. As alſo to auert farre from our owne heads, the curſes of the common people, for whom it is moſt needfull that the peace ſhould for their good and quietneſſe bee concluded, ſeeing that the fruit thereof is expected to be vnto them happie, and the glorie thereof for euer ours, for hauing by our diligence and true endeauour concluded the ſame. Which maketh me to hope, that when you ſhall finde your ſelfe readie to conclude this treatie, you will not bring with you men enemies vnto peace, or ſuch as ſhal diſſuade the ſame; but rather wiſe and graue men, which to the vttermoſt of their power may aduance the ſame, and finde out good and reaſonable meanes to aſſure an eternall and faithfull peace betwixt our Emperors, vnto which ſo generall a good euery one of vs is in dutie bound to imploy the vttermoſt of his ſufficiencie and power. And this is that I haue of truth to write vnto you at this time, and And ſo I bid you farewell.

Now theſe Letters although they moſt concerned the continuation of the treatie of peace, alreadie begun, and were too friendly from an enemie, to haue in them any good meaning, yet did they well aſſure the Colonell to whom they were written, of the death of the great and late Sultan Mahomet, and of the ſucceſſion of his ſonne Achmat into his Empire, to which end they are here ſet downe.

This late mightie Monarch, and now nothing but a loathſome lump of dead fleſh, the great Sultan Mahomet, departed this life about the latter end of Ianuarie, in the yere of Grace 1604, (according to their computation which begin the yeare at Chriſtmas) when hee had liued about 44 yeares, and thereof raigned eight. He was a man of no great ſpirit, and yet exceeding proud; which was the cauſe that he was both the leſſe beloued and feared of his ſubiects in generall, but eſpecially of the Ianizaries and other his ſouldiers and men of warre, who ſcorning his looſe gouernment, and grieued to ſee euen the greateſt affaires of his State not onely imparted to women, but by them mannaged and ouerruled alſo (as by his mother, the Sultaneſſe his wife, and others) not onely rebelled againſt him, but were oftentimes in their rages about to haue depoſed him. Hee was altogether giuen to ſenſualitie and voluptuous pleaſure, the marks whereof he ſtill carried about with him, a foule ſwolne, vnwealdy, & ouergrown body, vnfit for any princely office or function: and a minde thereto anſwerable, wholly giuen ouer vnto idleneſſe, pleaſure, and exceſſe, no ſmall meanes for the ſhortening of his daies, which he ended with obloquie, vnregarded of his ſubiects, and but of few or none of them lamented.

Mahomet, why he was not regarded of his men of warre.

He had iſſue foure ſonnes, and three daughters married vnto three of the great Baſſaes.

Mahomets his iſſue.

His firſt and eldeſt ſonne was called Mahomet (after his owne name) whom he cauſed to be ſtrangled in his owne ſight, vpon ſuſpition of aſpiring to the Empire, and conſpiring with the Rebels in Aſia: but afterward finding him guiltleſſe, cauſed his bodie to be buried in his own Sepulchre, and hanged the Baſſa that had miſinformed him.

His ſecond ſonne died a naturall death, being yet verie young:

His third ſonne was Sultan Achmat, who ſucceeded his father, and came to the Empire by the vntimely death of Mahomet his eldeſt brother. G

His fourth ſonne being then a youth of about ſixteene yeares old, was carefully kept within the Seraglio, with ſuch a ſtrait guard ſet ouer him, as that his name was not to be learned, euen by a good vnderſtanding friend of mine, of late lying aboue three moneths together at Conſtantinople, who moſt curiouſly enquired after the ſame, hauing verie good meanes to haue learned it. He was reported to haue been long ſince murthered, howbeit that he of late liued, but looking euery day to be by his brothers cruel commandement ſtrangled, which is accounted but a matter of courſe, and a death hereditarie to all the yonger male children of the Othoman Emperours: the policie for the maintenance of their great Empire entire and whole, ſo requiring. H

His dead body lyeth buried at Conſtantinople, in a faire Chappell of white Marble (neere vnto the moſt famous and beautifull Church of S. Sophia) for that onely purpoſe by himſelfe moſt ſumptuouſly built about fifty foot ſquare, with foure high ſmall round towers, about the which are certain ſmall round galleries of ſtone: from which the Turkiſh prieſts and churchmen, at certain houres, vſe to call the people euery day to Church: for they vſe no bels themſelues, neither will they ſuffer the Chriſtians to vſe any. But the top of this Chappell is built round, like vnto the antient Temples of the heathen gods in Rome. In the midſt of this Chappell (being indeed nothing elſe but this great Sultans Sepulchre) ſtandeth his tombe, which is nothing elſe but a great vrne or coffin of faire white Marble, wherein lieth his bodie, couered with a great couering of the ſame ſtone ouer it, made riſing in the midſt, and ſtooping on each ſide: not much vnlike to the coffins of the antient tombes of the Saxon kings, which are to be ſeen on the North ſide of the Quire of S. Pauls Church, and in other places of this land: but that this coffin of the great Sultan is much greater and more ſtately than are thoſe of the Saxon kings; it being aboue fiue foot high at the end thereof, and by little and little falling toward the feet, couered with a rich hearſe of cloth of gold downe to the ground: his turbant ſtanding at his head, and two exceeding great candles of white waxe, about three or foure yards long, ſtanding in great braſſe or ſiluer candleſtickes gilded, the one at his head, the other at his feet, which neuer burne, but there ſtand for ſhew onely. All the flore of the Chappell being couered with mats, and faire Turkie carpets vpon them. And round about this his tomb, euen in the ſame Chappell, are the like tombes for his wiues and children, but nothing ſo great and faire. Into this Chappell, or any other the Turks Churches or Chappels, it is not lawfull for either Turke or Chriſtian to enter, but firſt he muſt put off his ſhooes, leauing them at the church or chappell gate, or carrying them in his hand. Neere vnto this chappell, and the great Temple of Sophia, are diuers other chappels of the other great Turks; as of Sultan Selim, this mans grandfather, with his ſeuen and thirty children about him: of Sultan Amurath, this mans father, with his fiue and fortie children entombed about him. And in other places not far from them, are the chappels and ſepulchres of the reſt of the great Sultans; as of Sultan Mahomet the Great, of Sultan Baiazet, Sultan Selym the firſt, Sultan Solyman: all by theſe great Mahometane Emperors built, whoſe names they beare. And being all of almoſt one forme and faſhion, haue euery one of them a faire hoſpitall adioyning vnto them, wherein a great multitude of poore people are daily ſtill relieued. I K L

Some others of the great Baſſaes haue their Chappels and Sepulchres, with their great and ſtately almes-houſes alſo, not much inferiour vnto thoſe of the great Sultans; as namely Ibrahim Baſſa, of all the Baſſaes that euer were amongſt the Turkes the moſt magnificent, hath his ſtately chappell, ſepulchre, and almes-houſes, neere both in place and beautie, vnto that of Solymans. The Turkes burie not at all within their churches, neither are any at all buried within the walls of the citie, but the great Turkiſh Emperours themſelues, with their wiues and children about them, and ſome few other of their great Baſſaes, and thoſe onely in Chappels by themſelues built for that purpoſe. Al the reſt of the Turks are buried in the fields; ſome of the better ſort in tombes of marble; but the reſt with tombe ſtones laied vpon them, or with two great ſtones, the one ſet vp at the head, and the other at the feet of euerie graue, the greateſt part of them being of white Marble, brought from the Iſle of Marmora. They will not bury any man where another hath beene buried, accounting it impietie to digge vp another mans bones. M

A bones. By reaſon whereof they couer all the beſt ground about the city with ſuch great white ſtones: which for the infinit number of them, are thought ſufficient to make another wal about the citie. But not to ſtand longer vpon the manner of the Turks burials, leauing this great Sultan to reſt with his anceſtors, let vs now proſecute the courſe of our Hiſtorie.

ACHMAT, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR OCTAVVS, QVI NVNC REGNAT, ANNO 1610 *
ÆTATIS SVÆ XXII *

Non tua te virtus, non ingens copia rerum
Te faciunt magnum, non tua dextra potens:
Maximus eſt ſuperûm, nutu qui territat orbem,
Hinc Achmate tibi gloria tota manat.
Hic tibi tunc tenero regalia ſceptra parauit,
Hic tibi nunc iuveni maxima quæque dedit.
Non quod ſis alijs melior, multumue beatus,
Sed quò ſis alijs terror & ira Dei.
Quid turges igitur, faſtuve ſuperbis inani?
Sic te cum miſeris numinis ira premat.
Pone modum magnis, ni vis ſuccumbere magnus:
Maxima quæque ſuo pondere preſſa ruunt.
Nec tibi promittes regnandi tempora longa
Te tua fata vocant, te tua fata premunt.

RICH. KNOLLES.

The ſame in Engliſh.

Thy vertue doth not make the great,
  nor yet thy ſtore of pelfe:
Nor is it thine owne mightie arme,
  that doth exalt thy ſelfe.
But God aboue, who with a becke doth ſhake the World from hie;
From him all glorie doth proceed,
  that doth belong to thee.
He gaue to thee, then but a childe,
  thine Empire large and wide;
And giues to thee now growne a man,
  all worldly bliſſe beſide:
Not that thou better art, or bleſt,
  more than ſome others be;
But that to plague the World for ſinne,
  he hath appointed thee.
Why doeſt thou therefore ſwell with pride,
  ſtill ſeeking after more,
Sith that there is for thee by God, vengeance laid vp in ſtore?
Vnto thy greatneſſe bounds prefix,
  leſt thou be cruſht withall:
The greateſt things with their owne weight
  haue oft the greateſt fall.
Nor promiſe to thy ſelfe, that thou ſhalt long time liue and raigne:
Thy Deſtinies doe call thee hence,
  and thruſt thee on amaine.

THE LIFE OF ACHMAT, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, EIGHTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

MAhomet the late Sultan in the middeſt of his exceſſiue pleaſures by vntimely death taken away, Achmat the elder of his two ſonnes yet liuing, who was to ſucceed him in the Empire, to preuent the vſuall and inſolent tumults of the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court at the change of the Emperours, and to take from them all occaſions of diſcontentment; by the counſell of the great Baſſaes (before he tooke vpon him the gouernment) cauſed an exceeding great ſumme of money (viz. two millions and an halfe) as a token of his bountie, to bee diſtributed amongſt them: the Spahi and Silictars his chiefe horſemen receiuing thereof 10 crowns a man, with 5 aſpers a day more to encreaſe their pay; and the Ianizaries 30 crownes a man, and one aſper a day more of ordinarie pay: they of his court, but eſpecially the chiefe officers, taſting of this his bounteous liberality alſo. With which ſo great a larges all men well contented, he in a moſt rich and ſtately chariot, ſo placed as that all men might well ſee him, was in great maieſtie carried through all the chiefe ſtreets of Conſtantinople, the people on euery ſide gazing vpon him, and ſtill as he paſſed by them, proſecuting him with their moſt ioyfull and happy acclamations. Some wiſhing that he being but yong, might as another Solyman begin his raign with the conqueſt of Malta, as had the other with the conqueſt of the Rhodes: and other ſome as heartily praying, that with glorious & victorious conqueſts he might be like Mahomet vnto the Great, whom he was then reported much to reſemble. In which ſo great and publique magnificence, he being about 15 yeares old, was with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities openly crowned, euery man wiſhing vnto him a moſt long and happie raigne. And albeit that no great fruit was for the preſent from ſo young and tender a plant to be expected, yet neuertheleſſe by his authoritie and in his name, many good orders were taken for the reliefe of his ſubiects, with moſt heauy grieuances generally oppreſſed, during the looſe and careleſſe raigne of his father. His grandmother alſo a moſt proud, ambitious, and imperious woman, and withall exceeding rich, who with great authoritie at her pleaſure ouerruled all in the time of the raigne of her ſonne Mahomet, hee now remooued from the State, as not fit for her to haue to doe therein, and ſo depriued her of all her former power and command. The Perſian Embaſſadour, whome his father in his diſpleaſure had cloſe ſhut vp, hee ſet at libertie, and with him ſent the Baſſa of Alepo to intreat of peace with the great Shaugh of Perſia, who not long before (as was reported) had recouered the great citie of Tauris, and was then preparing himſelfe for new conqueſts. Which report for the motion of peace with the Perſian, diſcouered in his ſubiects their diuers opinions concerning himſelfe; ſome condemning his patience, as not beſeeming the Othoman Emperours, vnto whome furie and rage had alwayes made them a way vnto their great and dreadfull conqueſts, euen againſt the moſt puiſſant armies and ſtrongeſt townes and fortreſſes of their enemies: and ſome other to the contrarie prayſing therein his wiſedome, in ſeeking by faire meanes (now in the beginning of his raigne) to diſarme his enemies when they might moſt hurt him; at his better opportunitie, in his ſetled eſtate, to oppreſſe them for

The treatie for peace alſo in Hungarie was notwithſtanding the death of Mahomet, by the Baſſa of Buda ſtill continued, who (as hee ſayd) by the new Sultan authoriſed, by letters incited the Gouernour of Strigonium to repaire vnto ſome ſuch conuenient place as wherein the matter might be ſafely concluded. Vpon which motion the Gouernour with the reſt of the Commiſſioners departing from Strigonium, the fourth of Februarie came to Collonitz his Campe, from whence they were by the ſouldiers moſt brauely conducted along the bankes of Danubius, vnto the ſhips which lay readie for them, to carrie them downe the Riuer to Peſth: during which time of their paſſage nothing was to bee ſeene or heard but fire and ſmoake, and the thundering of the great artillerie both from Peſth and Buda, the Chriſtians and the Turks both ſtriuing to excell each other in theſe their ſhewes of ioy and triumph. The Gouernour with the reſt of his companie beeing happily arriued at Peſth, met there with a number of the better ſort of the Turkes ſent thither by the Baſſa to meet him, and in his name to greet him: who with a thouſand honours, againe receiued and ſaluted them. All ſhewes of kindneſſe, and ſignes of the happie ſucceſſe of the negotiation begun. And now the Chriſtians deſirous to excell the Turks, as well in courteſie as in valor, appointed a number of them the next day to goe to Buda, to inuite certaine of the chiefeſt and moſt honourable men amongſt the Turkes, vnto a banquet at Peſth: Who willingly accepted of the offer, and ſo came ſix hundred of the better ſort of them ouer the Danubie to Peſth, where the feaſt was moſt ſumptuouſly and magnificently prepared for them. There were ten faire and rich pauillions, ſet vp for the entertainement of them a little diſtant from Peſth, in a faire place, and fit for this purpoſe. In the firſt whereof were placed three verie proud and ſtately tables. At the firſt of which tables, on the right hand, were ſet the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, with the two Baſſaes, and one Mufti or Arch-Prieſt, with a Mytre vpon his head, a long furred gowne vpon his backe, and vnder that, a robe of moſt fine and exceeding rich ſilke. Vpon the left hand, at the ſame table were placed certaine of the Turkes Lords, and other great men. At the other two tables were ſet other of the beſt ſort of the Turkes mingled with the Chriſtians: and ſo at all the other tables in like order were ſet a Chriſtian and a Turke, vntill that the ſix hundred Turkes were placed, with as many Chriſtians among them: who by their good countenance and behauiour one of them to another, might haue ſeemed to haue beene all of one and the ſame Beliefe, Nation, and Countrey. The Turkes after the manner of their ſuperſtition, would not ſit downe before the ſetting of the Sunne, which beeing ſet, they with a thouſand Ceremonies, to the imitation of their Archprieſt, ſet themſelues downe at the tables in order as is aforeſaid, and there merrily repoſed themſelues vntill nine of the clocke at night. At which time the tables with great reuerence taken away, the Turkes as men well contented, and full of ioy, returned to Buda, the inſtruments of muſicke, trumpets, and Drummes, on euerie ſide ſounding about them with much glee, and as it were witneſſing vnto heauen and earth the great contentment they had receiued. And yet was all this faire ſhew nothing elſe but deepe diſſimulation mixt with moſt foule treacherie. For a little before their departure, they of Peſth were aduertiſed, That the Turkes in great number well appointed, were come out from Buda to ſurpriſe Peſth, during the time of the feaſt; beeing in hope that the Chriſtians all buſied in this action, had left the walls of the towne vnfurniſhed of defence. But they too well acquainted with their treacheries, to put any truſt or confidence in their faire ſhewes, had as well prouided for the defence and ſafetie of the towne, as for the magnificence of the feaſt abroad. By which meanes the Turkes diſappointed of their intended purpoſe, were in the attempting thereof repulſed, and ſo glad to returne as they came, backe againe to Buda.

The Turks honorably feaſted by the Chriſtians neere Peſth.

The Turkes by treachery ſeek to ſurpriſe Peſth.

The Turks commiſſioners diſauow the practiſe for the ſurpriſing of Peſth.

The next day after, the Commiſſioners for the Emperour complained vnto the Baſſa and the reſt of the Turkes Commiſſioners, of this ſo treacherous dealing: who excuſed themſelues as altogether ignorant thereof, diſauowing the action for want of ſucceſſe, which had it beene effected, they would to the vttermoſt haue ſhamefully maintained. An ordinarie courſe

A courſe among the Great, with ſpeech and countenance in ſhew to condemne that for want of effect, which they in heart and minde could for their owne profit haue wiſhed to haue beene performed.

The commiſſioners for the emperor refuſe any more to go to Buda.

Neuertheleſſe the Turkes the next day (as if no ſuch thing had beene meant) requeſted the Chriſtian Commiſſioners to come to Buda, as they had done to Peſth: but they, as well by proofe, as by report, perceiuing the euill meaning of the Turkes, excuſing themſelues, returned to Strigonium, as loth any more to aduenture themſelues into the power of their faithleſſe enemies; yet left they Geuberg at Peſth, with commiſſion to continue the negotiation for peace with the Baſſa of Buda, if he ſhould finde him thereunto diſpoſed, or any hope of bringing the treatie to good effect or iſſue.

The meſſage of Countie Yſolan from the great Sultan to the Emperour.

B Mahomet the late Sultan had a little before his death (as is before declared) ſet at libertie the Countie Yſolan (carried away priſoner to Conſtantinople after the taking of Alba Regalis, and ſent him with letters of credence to intreat of a peace to bee made with the Emperor, with promiſe to yeeld himſelfe againe priſoner, if he failed to obtaine the ſame: for whome the French Embaſſadour became pledge. Hee hauing now deliuered his letters of credence vnto the Emperour, and commaunded to ſay what hee had further in charge, declared, That the great Sultan offered to deliuer vnto his Maieſtie the ſtrong Townes of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Caniſia, in exchange of Tranſyluania and Valachia, whereunto he layed claime, promiſing on his part to make a moſt firme and ſure peace with the Emperour for the time to come, and to giue thereof ſuch aſſurance as ſhould of him reaſonably be demaunded.

The Turkes in al the negotiation for peace did nothing but diſſemble with the Emperours Commiſſioners.

C The Baſſa of Buda alſo amongſt other the faire remonſtrances of peace, had offered vnto the Emperours Commiſſioners to reſtore Caniſia and Agria for Peſth, Hatwan, and Vacia, together with the remiſſion of all ſuch payments and tributes as were by the Emperour due vnto the Great Sultan for the Kingdome of Hungarie. All which faire ſhewes and offers, though much vnreaſonable, were nothing but windie wordes to delay the time, and ſubtill baits to deceiue the Chriſtians: for the euent and iſſue, which giueth life to all actions, with a forme vnto them agreeable, hath by experience taught the Chriſtians, That all the glorious and glozing proceedings of the Turkes in this buſineſſe of the peace, ſo much wiſhed and expected of the Chriſtians, were but nets and ſnares wherewith to entangle them with the vaine hope thereof, vntill that they in the meane time might forD tifie their townes with new ſupplies of men, munition, victuals, and whatſoeuer elſe was needfull, the more eaſily afterward to annoy them at their pleaſure, and ſo to laugh at their ſimplicitie and light beleefe: For Mahomet being dead, and Achmat his ſonne (yet by reaſon of his minoritie vnder the tuition of his mother and other the great Baſſaes) ſucceeding in his place, the Turkes aggrauated the conditions of the peace, and propounded them ſo farre from reaſon, as that any man might ſee them now to haue no more deſire or regard of peace, after that they had diſpatched that for which they ſeemed before deſirous thereof; inſomuch, that they ſent a meſſenger in poſt from Conſtantinople vnto the Baſſa of Buda, to forbid him vpon the paine of his head any further to continue the treatie of peace, but forthwith to renew the warre. So this peace ſo much expected, and now of the people generally holden E for as good as concluded, ſuddenly vaniſhed into ſmoake, nothing remaining of that bodie, compoſed of ſo many wiſhes, more than a vaine expectation, now diſperſed with the winde of the Turkiſh treacherie. And yet during the time of this negotiation for peace ſought for by the Turkes both by often letters and meſſengers, many a ſolemne oath had paſſed both from the Sultan Mahomet and from the Viſier Baſſa, for their faithfull and ſincere dealing in the treatie thereof; as, By the God of heauen and earth; By the bookes of Moyſes; By the Pſalmes of Dauid; and By the holy Euangeliſts; oathes much vſed of Turks, and reſerued for their greateſt ſolemnities, and ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their leagues and promiſes: all which for all that hauing ſerued but as baits and traines to beguile the ſimple and well meaning men, lay now neglected and vnregarded: ſuch is the faith and aſſurance which men haue from faithleſſe and vntruſtie men.

The treatie for peace with the Turks commeth to nothing.

Diuers reports concerning the Turkes great preparations and deſignes.

The treatie of peace thus broken off, it was foorthwith by ſome bruited, That Achmat the great Sultan, vnder the conduct of the Viſier Baſſa his Gouernour, was himſelfe in perſon with a moſt huge armie about to come into Hungarie: Some others in the meane time reporting, that he was letted ſo to do by reaſon of the Perſian warres, whereunto he was of neceſſitie to ſend the greateſt part of his forces: ſo that hee would but onely ſend one of his great Baſſaes with the remainder of his ſo great an armie againſt the Chriſtians in Hungarie, being before G ſworne neuer to returne againe vnto Conſtantinople, vntill he had brought the countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia, with the remainder of Hungarie, vnder the obeyſance of the great Sultan, together with the countrey of Auſtria, and eſpecially the ſtrong citie of Vienna, the end of the Turkiſh Emperors conqueſts: and that to this purpoſe the Grand Seignior had with great rigour in all places leuied great ſummes of money vpon his ſubiects for the maintenance of his ſo great an armie. It was by others reported alſo, That onely the preparations for ſo great an armie ſhould bee made this yeare, the Turkes beeing reſolued to doe much therewith the next yeare, and therefore willing to beſtow much, in hope with ſo great and puiſſant an armie as they were about to raiſe, to make an end of the warres in Hungarie, H and not to returne vntill they had conquered all the reſt of that Kingdome, in the rent reliques whereof the fortune of the Othoman Emperours had ſtayed: ſo that all handycrafts men were ſet to worke by day and night, not onely to forge weapons, to caſt great ordnance, and to make pouder, but to prepare all other things neceſſarie alſo for ſo great an exploit.

All theſe great preparations were made for the ſeruice of the Viſier Baſſa for the warre in Hungarie, and of Cicala Baſſa in Perſia, whereof hee was appointed Generall, hauing before preſumptuouſly promiſed, vtterly to ruinate the Perſians eſtate, and with ſo great a power euen to ſwallow him vp. And indeed theſe Eaſterne warres greatly troubled the Turkes; newes comming ſtill concerning the conqueſts of the Perſian vpon his territories; and that I euen of late the Perſian King proſecuting his victories, had taken Babylon, with all the countrey thereabout: and that diuers other townes and cities, more mooued with feare than with the faith wherewith they had bound themſelues vnto the Turks, now yeelded themſelues vnto the Perſian, as wearie of the Turkes ſeruitude, and deſirous of their antient libertie. And yet for all that, the Turkes (as they are wiſe to diſſemble their loſſes, and to ſtrike a feare into their enemies) had giuen it out in Conſtantinople, That the Perſian King was neere vnto Babylon diſcomfited, all his armie ouerthrowne, and hee himſelfe taken priſoner; ſo that the Turks forces before diſtracted, ſhould now wholly ioyne together, to the vtter ruine and deſtruction of the Chriſtians in Hungarie. And the more to confirme this euill newes, it was reported, That the Beglerbeg of Græcia had rayſed a great power to ioyne with the K Viſier Baſſa his forces, to the intent to leaue nothing vnconquered in Hungarie. For the better effecting whereof, it was ſaid alſo, That the Viſier Baſſa had cauſed a great number of veſſels loded with pouder and other warlike prouiſion to bee brought by water out of Ægypt to Belgrade, to ruinate the eſtate of the Chriſtians. All which reports were by the Turks giuen out, to couer their owne miſhaps, and to terrifie their enemies: as knowing right well, warres to depend much vpon reports, and that a falſe bruit beleeued, worketh oftentimes the effect of a thing in deed done. Howſoeuer it was, thoſe ſo dreadfull reports might well haue ſerued to haue ſtirred vp the ſpirits of the Chriſtians to haue prouided for their owne defence, and to haue ſtood vpon their guard: for hee that fayleth to prouide againſt the preparations of his enemie, well deſerueth either bondage or death, which ſoeuer ſhall befall L him, for hauing by his negligence betrayed his owne abilitie and power to haue withſtood him.

Babylon reported to haue bin taken by the Perſian king.

The Turkes wiſely diſſemble their loſſes.

The great opinion the Turks haue of the power of their great Sultan.

The great report of the Turks preparations and forces had now daſht all the talke of peace at Conſtantinople, and the hot fire of ambition had quite ſcortched the ſweet flowers appearing vpon the ouerture of the late hope of the common repoſe; ſome perſuading the Great Sultan, that hee was able with his power at the ſame time both to ſubdue the Perſian King, and to confound the forces of the Chriſtian Emperour, hauing ſo many Kingdomes within his Empire, ſo many armouries ſtored for his ſeruice, and ſuch ſtore of treaſure readie for his deſignes, promiſing vnto him moſt happie and eaſie ſucceſſe both in the one and other expedition, euen at one and the ſelfe ſame time: ſo that hee might vanquiſh the Perſian by Cicala, M Chiefetaine of his armie in Perſia, and conquer the remainder of Hungarie, with the Countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia, by the Viſier Baſſa, Generall of his forces againſt the Chriſtians; it beeing (as they ſayd) a thing both honourable and profitable for a Prince to beſtow both men and money, thereby to gaine men, honour, and Empire: So that

A things which with great charge might be done all at once, were more profitable than were thoſe which with leſſe charge were done at diuers times: for that things ſo done at once,yeelded preſent profit,as being in our power,and recompenſing our charge;the other in long time putting vs to great charge,and yeelding little or no profit at all. And indeed men ſtand in great feare of this the Turks young Emperour, being by nature fierce, haſtie, vigilant, cruell, ambitious, and proud; and who in his behauior and actions much reſembleth Mahomet the ſecond, he which tooke from the Chriſtians ſo many kingdoms,townes,and cities,and amongſt the reſt, the Imperiall citie of Conſtantinople. He like vnto a young Alexander, occupieth himſelfe in all the exerciſes of war, hateth idleneſſe, his fathers greateſt pleaſure: he cauſeth armes to be made,cannons to be caſt,ſhips and gallies to be built, and taketh a pleaſure to diſcourſe, B how the ſame are to be employed againſt his enemies: ſo that it is greatly to be feared, that he being but a child in Conſtantinople,will prooue a man growne in Chriſtendome, in bringing the ſame vnder his power and obeiſance.He ſpareth no perſon nor meanes which may ſerue to ſatisfie his deſire. So that ſtrangers are to expect ſmall courteſies at his hands, when as they ſee him to vſe ſuch bloudie crueltie againſt his Noblemen and domeſticall ſeruants, of the chiefeſt of whome ſince he was Emperour hee hath alreadie put diuers to death, with one of his Baſſaes alſo,who was the Gouernour of Peſth when as our men woon it. But as iuſtice and clemencie vnto good Princes are the ſureſt bonds to keepe their ſubiects faſt bound vnto them in their obedience and duties, ſo are crueltie and rage bridles wherewith the Turkiſh Emperours keepe their ſubiects in awe and ſubiection vnto them,and themſelues
C in their eſtate.

The diſpoſition of the yong Turkiſh Emperour

Fury and tiranie the chiefe means whereby the Turkiſh emperors comand their ſubiects.

But leauing the Turkes buſie about their preparations for the acompliſhing of their young Emperours high deſignes, let vs returne into Hungarie, taking Tranſyluania in our way, the wofull miſeries of which countrey my minde abhorreth to thinke vpon, and my pen thereof to write. This Prouince, ſometime much renowned for the great victories obtained againſt the Turkes by the inhabitants thereof,vnder the leading of their Prince Sigiſmund Bator, and others,and abounding with plenty of all things,was now not by any inuaſion of the Turkes, but by ciuill diſcord amongſt themſelues,and rebellion againſt the Emperor, now their Soueraigne, ſo waſted and ſpoyled by the ſouldiers on all ſides, that many of the poore inhabitants for want of food fell downe dead as they went in the ſtreets and fields: miſerable wretches,alwaies D ſowing,but neuer reaping; alwaies labouring, but nothing profiting,the mercileſſe and greedie ſouldier ſtill ſpoiling or deuouring all. By long continuance of which daily outrages the fields at length lay now vntilled, the paſtures vnſtored and neglected, and all things elſe vnmanured and quite out of courſe: by means wherof, the famine ſo encreaſed,that the poore peaſants of the countrie hauing eaten vp for great dainties all the dogs and cats,mice and rats, that they could get, fell to eating of dead horſes, and the lothſome carrion of other hungerſtarued beaſts. It is reported alſo, That one man ſhould eat another: and that at Hermanſtat a woman hauing ſix children,did among them eat one another,vntill they were at length all ſix deuoured: and to the contrarie, that two men did eat their owne mother: yea theeues, and other malefactors hanged for their villanies, were by the poore and miſerable hungrie people E cut downe from the gallowes, and deuoured, the people generally liuing vpon nothing but vpon the roots of weeds,greene hearbs,and the leaues of trees. For remedie of which ſo extreme miſeries,it was on all parts agreed,that a generall aſſembly of the States of the whole Prouince ſhould be holden at Dewa: wherein it was accorded, That all hoſtilitie ſet apart, the Gentlemen of Tranſyluania hauing by their rebellion forfeited both their liues and lands, ſhould be pardoned their liues,with three fourth parts of their lands reſerued vnto them, and that for ready mony they might of the Emperor redeeme the fourth part alſo. But concerning the moueables of ſuch as were dead in the time of theſe troubles, and alreadie confiſcat vnto the Emperour,they ſhould ſo remaine; and that they ſhould pay their diſmes, or tenth part of their wine and fruits, vnto the Emperour. And further, That there ſhould be no further exerciſe of Religion permitted vnto them, but onely the Romiſh Religion: and that the townes of Cronſtadt and Clauſenburg ſhould within the ſpace of three weekes, pay the one twentie thouſand dollars, and the other eight thouſand; and the magiſtrates of thoſe townes ſhould deliuer the keyes of their townes, with all their power, into the hands of the Emperours

rours Lieutenant: and that the Gentlemen of theſe townes which would not be accounted G in the number of the Rebels, ſhould for the ſafetie of their perſons take letters of pardon for their rebellion, of the Generall of the armie. This pacification gaue ſome little time of breathing vnto this poore diſtreſſed country, which bared of all ſtrength, and as it were vpon the graues brinke, had now but euen the laſt gaſpe to giue; and the country people began againe to giue themſelues vnto their wonted labors, in hope at length to reape the profit thereof themſelues; but alas all in vaine: for why, the rauening ſouldiers inured to prey, after their woonted manner made hauocke and ſpoile of all things, leauing nothing vnto the poore countreyman, but his labour for his paine, and time enough to bewaile his manifold and remedileſſe miſeries: the cauſes whereof were the Nobilitie and Gentlemen themſelues; who not liking to be gouerned, or rather (as they tooke it) oppreſſed by the Germanes, and hauing not vpon H any deſire they had of peace, but rather by neceſſitie inforced, yeelded vnto the pacification aforeſaid, ceaſed not ſtill vnderhand to incite the ſouldiers (ready enough of themſelues to do miſchiefe) and in what they might to trouble the gouernment of the State by the Germans, being vnto them (as they accounted of them) but ſtrangers. All which their doings Baſſa the Emperours Lieutenant well perceiuing, cauſed three of the greateſt of the Gentlemen of the countrey, and whome hee moſt ſuſpected to bee the authours of theſe troubles, to bee apprehended and faſt mured vp betwixt two ſtrong wals in an old ruinous monaſterie; whither their friends afterwards comming to haue viſited them, and finding them ſtarued to death, were therewith much abaſhed, as were alſo other their complices, as ſoone as they heard thereof. But leauing them to worke themſelues further troubles, let vs againe returne vnto I the Turkes affaires.

The troubles of Tranſyluania ſecretly maintained by the Nobilitie of the Countrey.

A ſeuere and miſerable kind of puniſhment.

The treatie of peace betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks quite broken off, & the war againe begun.

Now was all the hope of peace betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks become deſperate, the Turks making thereof no more account, ſeeing that according to their deſire they had prouided Alba-Regalis, Agria, and Buda, of their neceſſarie prouiſions. They had in foure wagons put into Agria the pay due vnto their garriſons; ſo that their affaires being now in good eſtate, and their courages reuiued, they began to ſcoffe and jeſt at our credulitie, to beleeue that they had had any purpoſe to conclude vpon any thing that was not agreeing with their profit, how far ſoeuer it were differing from their honor or from their faith: So that now theſe faithleſſe men began againe to renew their wonted incurſions and pillages vpon the Chriſtians, with all other manner of hoſtilitie, and that in more cruell manner than euer before: and our Huſſars K on the other ſide well requited them with the like, being as well contented as they with theſe manner of doings, their whole fortune depending vpon the points of their weapons, and euer ready to the ſeruice of their prince for their pay. Now it fortuned that fourſcore of the Turks going forth to ſeeke for bootie, chanced to meet with certaine of theſe Huſſars, who finding themſelues too weake to encounter with our men, and betaking themſelues to flight, were certaine of them taken priſoners, and ſo brought vnto the Generall; vnto whom they vpon examination confeſſed, That the Turkes much maruelled at the ſimpſicitie and fooliſhneſſe of the Chriſtians, to beleeue that they were deſirous of peace, and not to haue diſcouered their ſo manifeſt intentions to the contrary, tending onely to the pleaſuring of themſelues, and the annoying of them their enemies, to the ſtrengthning of themſelues, and deſtruction of the Chri- L ſtians, as by proofe it appeared, ſo ſoon as their deſires were accompliſhed, vnto the preiudice of their enemies: and that their yong Emperor was alwaies againſt this treatie of peace, whatſoeuer ſhew hee had made to the contrarie, conſtrained thereunto by the victories and conqueſts of the Perſian King; all his wiſhes and deſires aiming at no other marke, than at the generall ruine of Chriſtendome. Our garriſons alſo ſeeing themſelues charged by the Turks, tooke vp arms likewiſe, and requited them with like outrages, as they did. They of Pappa, and Veſprinium, were the firſt which began theſe broiles after the treatie of the peace, who hauing joyned their forces together, and making head toward Alba-Regalis, met with a number of Turkes, driuing of ſheepe and cattell thither, whome they ſurpriſed, and together with their cattell carried them away with them priſoners. Which good hap was ſecon- M ded with the libertie of twentie Chriſtian priſoners from Buda, who one night ſeeing their keepers oppreſſed with ſleep and with wine, cut their throats, and ſo happily eſcaped ouer the riuer to Peſth.

The Chriſtians by the Turk[illegible] priſoners informed of their euill meaning in the treatie of the peace.

A Now while theſe troubles betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks (after the treatie of peace broken off) thus began againe in Hungarie, the Turkes, beſide the rebellion in Aſia, were together by the eares in the prouince of Boſna. Zellaly hauing by force ioyned with policie, driuen Zeffer Baſſa (as is aforeſaid) out of Boſna, and poſſeſſed himſelfe of that Prouince, thought himſelfe now ſure enough within the ſtrength of his gouernment, although he being by the Great Sultan ſent for to Conſtantinople, had refuſed to come, as knowing right well himſelfe to hold that ſo great a gouernment much againſt his will and pleaſure. But Zeffer Baſſa now ſupported with the authoritie of the Great Sultan, and deſirous to be reuenged of the great diſhonour and loſſe he had before receiued from Zellaly his enemie, with a great armie ſuddenly entered into Boſna, and ſo comming vnto Zellaly, fearing as then no ſuch matter, B ouerthrew him with all his power, and neuer left purſuing of him, vntill he had chaſed him quite out of the Prouince, and ſo againe recouered the gouernment thereof. But ſhort was the ioy the Baſſa receiued of this ſo pleaſing a victorie; for within few dayes after he died, comforting himſelfe onely in this, that he died not vnreuenged. Of all which things the great Baſſa's of the Court vnderſtanding, and loth to loſe ſo great a ſouldier as was Zellaly (who as a man diſtreſſed, was now making ſhift for himſelfe, or by vſing of him hardly, to deterre the other Aſian rebels from comming in, and yet not willing to truſt him with ſo great a gouernment as was the prouince of Boſna; they to prouide for all euents, appointed him to be gouernor of Temeſwar; and Begedes Baſſa (before gouernor there) to ſucceed Zeffer Baſſa in the gouernment of Boſna: ſo contenting all parties, to keepe their forces whole and entire againſt C the Chriſtians.

Zellaly made gouernour of Temeſwar.

But as the Turks were troubled with their affaires in Boſna, ſo the Chriſtians were no leſſe, but rather more buſied with theirs both in Tranſyluania and Hungarie. The Eſtates of Hungarie had appointed a general meeting at Poſſonium, wherein the Archduke Matthias was to ſit as Preſident, there to conſult of the means for the maintenance of this yeres wars againſt the Turks. But as the Archduke was about to haue entred into the citie in the midſt of his ſoldiers ſuch a fire vpon the ſudden aroſe in the citie, as conſumed the greateſt part thereof: an euill preſage of the action then in hand, and a wofull ſpectacle to behold, with the terror whereof all mens mindes poſſeſſed, turned them from the magnificent entertaining of the Archduke, (as was before determined) to the quenching of the raging fire, as more neceſſarie and concerning D them than the other. Beſides that, the miſeries then to be ſeene in the other parts of Hungarie yet holden by the Chriſtians, were both great and lamentable: for beſide the harmes therein done by the Turks, the regiment of Colonel Althem had made ſuch ſpoile and hauock all ouer the countrey where it lay, that the townes and people in generall ſo grieuouſly complained thereof vnto the Emperour, that he mooued with their iuſt complaints, cauſed the authors of theſe ſo great outrages to be apprehended and brought priſoners to Vienna, where ſome of them were beheaded, and ſome others of them hanged: Beſide whom ſo condemned and executed, there were ſome other Captaines and lieutenants, of whom ſome denying the fact, and other ſome ſtanding vpon the iuſtifying of that they had done, as thereunto by extreme neceſſitie enforced, were for their further triall ſent priſoners vnto Prague, where they were committed vnto priſon into the caſtle, vntill their cauſes might be heard. Among which captains and lieutenants, and other ſuch great officers, was one Genderot Colonel Althem his Antient, who moſt wickedly but a little before had ſlaine Nudercy a gentleman of good ſort and his fellow-companion in armes: for which murther he was committed priſoner into a very high and ſtrong tower within the caſtle (wherein Countie Paradiſer, who ſould Caniſia vnto the Turks, lay ſometime priſoner) vntill his trial might within a few dayes after be made. The horror of which criminal place, together with the guilt of conſcience, ſo troubled and wounded the minde of Genderot, as that all the hope now to ſaue his life, was by making an eſcape, & ſo to auoid the ſtroke of iuſtice. Which he happily brought to paſſe by the helpe of one of his lacquies, who had found means to bring vnto him a long cord, where by ſtraining himſelfe out at a little window (whereby it was thought almoſt impoſſible for any man to haue got out) he in ſafetie got down to the ground, and there hauing two good horſes readie for him, he with his man fled amain, and ſo eſcaped, his keepers drunken ouer night, being in the morning found yet ſleeping, without perceiuing of any thing, whoſe drunkennes & fauor toward the priſoner had giuen him means to eſcape. The reſt of the Captaines and Lieutenants in priſon at Prague G were ſome of them beheaded, and ſome of them hanged, and the reſt at the interceſſion of the Nobilitie of Auſtria, and of other great men, pardoned, yet with condition, That they ſhould pay the fines ſet vpon them, and ſerue the Emperor in his warres three moneths of their owne charge without pay: ſome few of the common ſouldiers, to the terrour of others, had two of the fore-fingers of their right hands cut off, and afterward faſt nailed vnto gibbets ſet vp by the high waies ſide.

In like manner alſo the regiment of Colonell Meysberg roſe in mutinie for their pay & came, and encamped at Sneche, about a league from Vienna; threatning to deſtroy the countrey, and to kill the chiefe men therein, if they were not paied their pay. Which rebellious mutinie the Captaines did what they might to appeaſe; they beſought them, but in vaine; they entreated them, but to no purpoſe; they promiſed them pay, but preuailed not; yea, the Colonell him- H ſelfe thruſt himſelfe into the midſt of them, with moſt earneſt prayers, and his hands caſt vp, putting them in mind of their duty, and laying before them the danger of moſt aſſured death and diſhonour, if they continued further to proceed in that their diſloyaltie, whereunto their headſtrong furie ſo diſorderedly led them. But they as men enraged, carried headlong with their furie, breathing nothing but threats and deſtruction, and by no prayers or perſwaſion to be moued, preſently made choice of another Chiefetaine, vnder whoſe conduct and leading they reſolued to rifle the ſuburbs of Vienna, and with the ſpoile of them to pay themſelues. Vpon which reſolution they marched on, and ſo drew neere vnto the city: with which their ſo great and dangerous an inſolencie the Gouernors of the citie moued (the ſufferance whereof they ac- I counted to be vnto themſelues both diſhonorable & harmfull) they on the other ſide reſolued by plaine force to repreſſe them, and by iuſt armes to chaſtiſe them, who were not otherwiſe to be reclaimed. But ſuch be the miſerable calamities of warre, where violent remedies muſt purge out of the body of the commonweale the good humors together with the bad, ſo to recouer the health thereof: which remedies, not but vpon neceſſitie to be vſed, are ſo quicke and violent in their working, as that they affoord not leiſure to diſcern the whole and ſound from the ſicke and infected, to ſaue the one, and to ſpill the other; but that they muſt altogether run the ſelfeſame way. For albeit that the whole Regiment was in this mutinous action, and ſo all in like danger, yet were they not therof all alike guilty, many of them being euen againſt their wils and good liking carried away headlong, as with the violent courſe of an headie riuer. K

Now the Captaines of the towne with their troupes and companies, ſtrengthened with ſome other ſupplie ſent from other places, were to ſet forward againſt theſe rebellious mutiners, and to fruſtrate their deſignes: for the greater ſtrenthening of whom, diuers of the burgeſſes of the towne were enforced to enter into this action alſo: amongſt whome, there were two accounted very honeſt religious men, who by all meanes ſought to excuſe themſelues from going, labouring both by liuely reaſons, and by the word of God, to prooue, that they neither might nor ought of right to enter into armes againſt their Chriſtian brethren, enforced with extreamities, for want of their due pay, to forget their duetie, and to doe that beſeemed them not. But what auaileth it to alleadge either reaſon or law amongſt the clattering of armes; the noiſe whereof is ſo great, as that Reaſon and Law cannot there bee heard. Theſe I two men ſeeing themſelues enforced to goe, and much grieued in conſcience to doe that they were enioyned to doe, and to helpe to ſhed the guiltleſſe bloud of their innocent brethren (as they accounted them) entered both of them into a moſt ſtrange and wofull reſolution, which was to die themſelues; rather than to embrue their hands with the bloud of the guiltleſſe: whereupon one of them hauing oftentimes called vpon the name of Ieſus, with his owne ſword thruſt himſelfe through the body, and ſo died: the other vpon the like reſolution threw himſelfe into the riuer, and ſo periſhed alſo: men worthie to be pittied for their conſcience ſake, but iuſtly to be condemned for their ſo weake and deſperat a reſolution. In fine, the rebellious mutiners ſeeing in what perill they were, being euen now readie to be charged, and withall conſidering the weakeneſſe of their power in compariſon of them that came againſt L them, thought it beſt vpon the ſight of ſo great a tempeſt to ſtrike ſayle, and ſo changing their former determination, and laying downe their armes, craued pardon of the Archduke, who graciouſly granted it them, and ſo tooke them to his mercie; yet with condition, that they ſhould againe returne vnto their garriſons, and deliuer into his hands the ringleaders & chiefe authors of that mutinie to be puniſhed according to their deſerts, as afterwards they were; the ordinarie end of ſuch inſolent and diſordered actions, which haue nothing aſſured vnto them but death, which (all things elſe failing) attendeth onely vpon them.

The Turkes in vaine ſeeke to ſurprize Lippa

But while the Chriſtians thus diuided were at variance among themſelues, the Turks were readie enough to take aduantage of ſuch their dangerous diſcord. And firſt of all, Zellaly the old Rebell, but now Gouernour of Temeſwar, hauing in his craftie head plotted the taking of the citie of Lippa by ſurprize, and to that purpoſe gathering the greateſt power that hee was able to make, in the euening ſet forward from Temeſwar, and ſo trauelling by night, came to Lippa, vnto the wals whereof he planted ſcaling ladders, and at the ſame time labored to haue forced the gates, in hope ſo to haue gained the towne: which was done with ſuch a terrible noyſe and outcrie as was poſſible by the Turkes to bee made, after that they were once diſcouered, thereby to haue diſmayed the Chriſtians within the towne; who well acquainted with ſuch ſtratagemes of their enemies, and now therewith awaked, came readily to the walls, and there ſo well defended themſelues and their Towne, that the Turkes repulſed, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and hauing loſt a number of their men, with all ſpeed to retire; vpon whome the Chriſtians ſallying out, ſlew many of them in that their diſordered retreat, little differing from plaine flight, and tooke many moe of them priſoners: yea Zellaly, who not many houres before had thought to haue ſurpriſed Lippa, was now glad himſelfe to haue recouered the walls of Temeſwar. Some of the Turkes that were there taken priſoners beeing examined, reported, That the armie that was this yeare to come into Hungarie, was like to bee verie great, and that a part thereof was now come to Belgrade, expecting there the comming of the Tartars, who were together with them to enter into Hungarie: and that by reaſon of the warres with the Perſian, which deuoured almoſt all the ſouldiers in Conſtantinople, and yet could not bee therewith ſatiſfied, the great Sultan had commanded, That all ſuch as were able to beare armes, as well in Boſna, as in that part of Hungarie which was ſubiect vnto him, and in the other Prouinces thereunto adioyning, ſhould be ready to ioyne with his armie in Hungarie, for the furthering of his conqueſts there: And that the Perſian King proſecuting the courſe of his victories, had ouerthrowne Cicala Baſſa with his armie, and taken his ſonne priſoner, almoſt ſlaine all his troupes, and entered into confederacie with Caracaſe, chiefe of the Rebels in Aſia, a man of great power, who had following of him a great number of valiant men, all reſolutely ſet downe for the troubling of the great Sultans eſtate.

Caſſoua in danger to haue beene burnt by the Turkes.

About the ſame time the Gouernour of Caſſouia (a great and ſtrong citie in the vpper part of Hungarie) going forth with ſome good part of his garriſon to appeaſe the ſouldiers lying about in the countrey (but now vp in mutinie for their pay) and there ſpending ſome few dayes about this buſineſſe, in ſhewing of them the danger of their inſolencie, and perſuading them by the euill ſucceſſe and end of ſuch like actions to returne againe vnto their dueties; and they againe to the contrarie obſtinatly vrging the payment of their pay, or elſe to haue leaue to depart, as being not able longer to continue without the one or the other: and ſo the time paſſing, it fortuned that certaine Turks, then priſoners in Caſſouia, encouraged by the abſence of the Gouernour and of the garriſon ſouldiers, to attempt the gaining of their libertie, brake their yrons, and ſlew their keepers, in hope ſo to haue eſcaped: but being in the doing thereof diſcouered, and ſo againe ſurpriſed before they could doe any further harme, and vpon torture examined, by what meanes they thought to haue eſcaped out of the citie, the wals thereof beeing kept with continuall ſentinels: they confeſſed, That their purpoſe was, the ſame night to haue ſet fire vpon diuers places of the citie (ſo to haue drawne the people to the quenching thereof) and at the ſame time to haue ſlaine the ſentinels vpon the walls, and ſo to haue made their eſcape: for which their ſo miſchieuous a fact and purpoſe, they were ſome of them executed, and the reſt againe committed to priſon, and more ſtraitly kept and looked vnto than before.

Now as Caſſouia had by the prouidence of God eſcaped ſo great an intended miſchiefe, Caniſia at the ſame time alone felt the euill hap by the Turkes entended both to Caſſouia and Lippa: for a ſouldier of the garriſon in the citadell there hauing through negligence or miſhap caſt fire into the pouder prouided for the ſtore of the Caſtle, the pouder taking fire, blew vp the citadell, the towers, the houſes, and walls; and to be briefe, made this poore place like vnto another Rome burnt by Nero. So that had any of the Chriſtian forces been then neere vnto the place, it had been an eaſie matter to haue woon the ſame, as well for the ſmall reſiſtance that was therein to haue been found in ſo great an aſtoniſhment of the men, and deſtruction of the place. But ſuch accidents haue no certaine houres limited to their beginnings, nor aſſurance of their comming, ſo that they oftentimes chance, without any man to make vſe of them; and againe flie away, when men make their greateſt preparations to obtaine them. The Turks of Buda ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians of Peſth.

At the ſame time the Turks of Buda ſent two hundred of the ſouldiers of their garriſon to fetch in forrage a little from Peſth, who as they were in the doing thereof too preſumptuous, ſo were they well puniſhed for their pride: For the Chriſtians in Peſth hauing diſcouered them in this action, ſallied out vpon them and charged them; againſt whome they for a while right valiantly defended themſelues, but at length oppreſſed with number, and ouerthrowne, they were moſt of them ſlaine, and the reſt taken priſoners: Wherewith the Baſſa of Buda was ſo much offended, that in reuenge thereof, he in his rage threatened with fire and ſword to do what harme he might vnto the Chriſtians. But as the common prouerbe ſaith, Men warned are halfe armed; and enemies threats bring this comfort with them, That in receiuing of the threatned harmes, we are in hope to be thereof reuenged, as therefore before prouided. New tumults in Tranſyluania.

The rebels in Tranſyluania ſurpriſed and ſlaine.

Vnto theſe wofull troubles of Hungarie, proceeding as well from the inſolencies of the Chriſtian ſouldiers themſelues, as from the furie of the Turkes, who were their antient and mortall enemies, were ioyned the like or rather worſe calamities in Tranſyluania, I extreame famine and want of all things ſore raging in both countries; ſo that hardly hath any miſerie or extreamitie beene ſeene or read of, euen in Countries by the iuſt and heauie iudgements of the Almightie God appointed to deſtruction, which were not in thoſe two Countries to bee found, and of many felt. For remedie whereof, George Baſſa the Emperours Lieutenant in Tranſyluania, had there done what hee might for the appeaſing of the tumults and troubles of that Prouince, and now of late brought the ſame into ſome good tearmes, as was thought, and as is before declared. Howbeit, that in proofe it fell out farre otherwiſe, and that the more he therein laboured, the farther hee was off from his intent and purpoſe: for the Nobilitie of that Prouince, who were generally enclined vnto K rebellion, and deteſting the Germanes, together with their gouernement, reiected the decrees and orders which were agreed vpon in their late meeting together for the concluding of peace; inſomuch, that aſſiſted by the Turkes, they had taken certaine Caſtles and ſtrong places in that Prouince: and the better to ſupport their rebellion and inſolencie, they had appointed a certaine place to meet at, where the Turkes and they might conferre together of the meanes which they intended for the effecting of their deſignes. Whereof Baſſa hauing by ſecret meanes got vnderſtanding, to remedie this pretended miſchiefe, hee ſent away a great number of Haiduckes, to lye in wait to ſurpriſe them vpon the way. Which men, who were skilfull in the paſſages of the Countrey, fayled not in this action, but lay cloſe in ambuſh, verie conueniently for the ſurpriſing of their enemies: who proceeding in their intended purpoſe, and thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which was entended againſt them, L were ſuddenly, before they were aware, Turks and Tranſyluanians, altogether ſurpriſed and ſlaine. Which exploit beeing performed, theſe Haiduckes and other ſouldiers deſtitute of their pay, and enraged with furie, fell vpon the Prouince, vſing therein all hoſtilitie, as if they had beene mortall enemies vnto it; puniſhing the guiltleſſe for the guiltie, and ſeiſing vpon all mens goods in common, to pay themſelues that which was by ſome few in priuat kept from them. All the whole Prouince was ſubiect vnto the rage and furie of thoſe and other ſuch mercileſſe men of warre, who without any remorſe at all indifferently ſlew and maſſacred all of them that came in their way; but eſpecially the poore and weake innocent people, who called vpon the Almighty God for remedy and redreſſe of theſe euils which they ſuſtained, and M cried out vnto him for reuenge of their ſo great and cruell wrongs. The high waies were euerie where ſo full of theeues, that no man could trauell from place to place, but that hee was in great danger to be ſet vpon, and ſpoiled. For the Haiducks (being men that liue altogether by prey, and roaming vp and downe the Countrey) made good priſe and bootie of whatſoeuer

A came in their way, ſparing neither Turkes nor Chriſtians : inſomuch, that they hearing, how that the Zeeclers with a good conuoy were bringing a number of waggons laden with victuals, and a great many of Oxen and other cattell to Claudionople, although they were of the ſame partie, beleefe, and Nation, yet they lay in wait for them to ſurpriſe them : againſt whome the Zeeclers ſeeking to defend themſelues, were by them cruelly maſſacred, and their waggons, with their Beeues and other cattell, all carried quite away. But what ſhould wee ſay ? Hunger breaketh euen the ſtone walls, and forceth men vnto all extremities : and now the famine in that Prouince was ſuch, as that the people were for the moſt part glad to liue by feeding vpon the roots of hearbs and weeds, and ſuch other vnwholſome things, whereof great mortalitie afterward enſued amongſt them : Which was the B cauſe that Horwat, Captaine of theſe Haiduckes, beeing reprooued for the outrages by them committed, and charged to take order, that no more ſuch like ſhould afterward bee done; anſwered, That it was not poſſible to keepe ſouldiers in any order amiddeſt the extreamitie of famine; for that the bellie was an inexorable vſurer, which tooke pittie vpon nothing, but with great rage exacting that which it thought due for the nouriſhment of it ſelfe.

Amideſt theſe troubles of Tranſyluania and Hungarie, there were two of the Turkes ſpyes of Buda diſcouered and taken; who at Vienna, had obſerued all the actions and proceedings of the Chriſtians, and to the vttermoſt of their power had informed themſelues of their deſignes, as alſo of their preparations and forces to bee raiſed and C leuied for this yeares warres : of which two ſpyes, the one was empayled, and the other kept in cloſe and ſtraight priſon, vntill that further matter might be drawne out from him.

Two of the Turks ſpies of Buda taken.

The forces of the Chriſtians were now beginning to gather themſelues together and to make an head in Hungarie; a riſe report at that time going, That they would forthwith take the field : whereof the Baſſa of Buda vnderſtanding, and deſirous in what he might to hinder that their forwardneſſe (whereof hee doubted the effects) thought it beſt to betake himſelfe to his old and cunning practiſe, for the treatie and concluding of a peace with the Chriſtians, whereof hee now made ſhew himſelfe, together with the reſt of the Turkes, to bee verie deſirous : ſo by putting the Chriſtians in hope thereof, D to make them the more remiſſe and negligent in their doings, and to gaine time of them, vntill that the Turkes great armie (then in preparing) might bee brought downe into Hungarie. To which purpoſe hee in moſt friendly manner thus writ vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium.

Wee know right well (Noble Gouernour) that you are not ignorant, how that your brother the Gouernour of Strigonium before you, hath moſt earneſtly embraced the negotiation of peace, in ſuch ſort, as that wee cannot ſo much yeeld vnto our ordinarie quarrels and diſſention, but that wee muſt giue you to vnderſtand the cauſes which haue croſſed and hindered the concluding of ſo great a good the laſt yeare now paſſed. The firſt let come by reaſon of the time, choſen too late to bee employed in that treatie for peace, when as now both the armies were alreadie on foot, and euen in readineſſe to ioyne battell, and could not bee then ſtayed by that entreatie, nor bee ſent backe againe without ſome exploit dong : Each part had reſolued vpon their proper deſignes, and euen choſen their ground for battell, and were then hardly to bee turned from that whereupon they were before reſolued. And albeit, that during this laſt Winter, the treatie for the peace was againe begun, and that the men of warre on both ſides in hope thereof, reſted vnarmed, and free from all hoſtilitie; a moſt fit time to haue begun and ended this treatie of peace, which hath beene ſo much wiſhed for of our Soueraigne Emperour, deſired of his ſubiects, and requeſted by thoſe of your Emperours, with whome ym dread Soueraigne would confirme and contract a firme and continuall peace : yet for all that, ſince the departure of the Gouernour from Strigonium, wee ſee three moneths to haue beene paſſed, without any Letters at all, or meſſage by word of mouth brought vnto vs concerning this matter; ſo that wee haue not any thing whereof to certifie our Soueraigne Emperour. And foraſmuch as the courſe of time hath brought theſe two contrarie armies euen vnto the point of battell, and that they are marching one of them to encounter with the other, and ſo to enter into the liſts of honour, wee haue thought good before to deſire to know of you, what we are to expect concerning the peace. Wee therefore requeſt you as our verie good brother and friend, in what wee may to ſtay the comming of our armies into this Kingdome, and to attend to that which may produce the concluſion of this treatie, beeing on our part moſt readie to lend both our eare and deſire to whatſoeuer ſhall be iuſt and meet in this treatie, and neceſſarie for the common good: beſeeching you to beleeue vs in this buſineſſe, and not to doubt of our good will, more affected to your good, than is yours to our welfare: whereof wee in good time aduertiſe you, for that our armie which is now before Belgrade, beeing once arriued heere, and marching in field wee cannot poſſibly cauſe it to returne without ſomething doing, conſidering the great harmes, which under the aſſurance of your faith giuen, wee haue receiued from your people during the time of the truce, which they haue many wayes violated. Which their euill dealing hath greatly incenced vs againſt your men in captiuitie with vs, and cauſed our ſouldiers to ſhew great rigour againſt their ſlaues: wee therefore attend your anſwere, and the returne of your brother, to the end wee may together reſolue according vnto reaſon and equitie, of that which ſhall bee needfull to bee done for the common good and welfare.

Now for all this faire gloſing, it was no hard matter to gheſſe at the Baſſaes ſecret meaning: for how deſirous ſoeuer hee ſeemed to bee of peace, and willing to the furtherance thereof, yet neuertheleſſe true it is, that during the time of all theſe faire ſhewes, the Turkes hauing aſſembled their garriſons on all ſides, had by night ſurpriſed the caſtle of Simnin vpon the Chriſtians, ſlaine part of the ſouldiers therein, carried away the reſt priſoners, and moſt cruelly afterwards burnt the place: So manifeſting by their foule deeds the euill meaning of their faire and deceitfull words. But now leauing the Baſſa for a while vnto his craftie deuices, and paſſing ouer many ſmall skirmiſhes which happened in Hungarie and Tranſyluania, as not beſeeming the grauitie of an Hiſtorie, let vs now out of Europe looke ouer into Aſia, to ſee how the Great Turkes affaires there in the meane time went.

The rebellion in Aſia was by the comming ouer of Zellaly and his followers for a time ſomewhat weakened, but not ſuppreſſed, that peſtilent humour of diſloyaltie hauing before infected the mindes of ſo many, as that in ſhort time after the Rebels were much ſtronger and the rebellion much more dangerous than before: for the appeaſing and repreſſing whereof, Cicala Baſſa the old renegate, and a man of great experience and ſeruice, was as Generall ſent ouer with a great and mightie armie into Aſia, where hee needed not long to ſeeke for his enemies, they being as ready as he either to giue or to accept of battell: So that for men ſo on both ſides reſolued, it was no hard matter to bring them to the triall of battell: which they with like deſire and equall hope ioyning, there made a great and terrible fight, the Baſſa fighting for his honour, and the Rebell for his life. Howbeit, that at length the Baſſa after much bloudſhed and a great number on both ſides ſlain, being put to to the worſe, fled with his armie altogether diſordered, and in rout, hauing in that ſo dangerous a confuſion of his people much adoe to ſaue himſelfe. With which ſo ſhamefull an ouerthrow giuen him by the Rebell, the Baſſa who was more aſhamed than diſcouraged, againe repaired his armie, ioyning thereunto great and mightie ſupplies, and ſo ſtrengthened, came now againe the ſecond time to reuenge himſelfe of the great diſhonour which he had before receiued, and vtterly to ſuppreſſe the Rebels: who now finding themſelues too weake to encounter with ſo great and mightie a power, wiſely betime retired, praying aide of the Perſian King, who ſent vnto them his owne ſonne with a great armie of good and valiant ſouldiers; which might haue giuen the Baſſa cauſe enough to haue ſtayed his haſte, and to haue beene well aduiſed how hee ioyned battell with ſuch deſperate and reſolute enemies, and now backt with ſuch ſtrong ſupplyes: But hee being blinded with the furie of his former loſſe, and too much deſirous to be thereof reuenged, with more haſt than good ſpeed came on, and ioyned battell with theſe his enemies, now in readineſſe and well prouided to receiue him. The two armies were in number equall, but the Rebels of the two more reſolute and carefull of themſelues and of their welfare, as they which had repoſed all their hope and confidence in their owne armes and valour, ſo that the battell was with great outcries and furie begun both on the one ſide and on the other: in the beginning whereof the Turks right furiouſly charged the rebels, and ſeemed ſomewhat to preuaile vpon them, vntill that the Perſian Kings ſonne with certaine troupes of his moſt braue horſemen charging them in the rereward, and ſome other of the Rebels with like furie aſſailing them vpon their flankes, their whole armie was ſo diſordered, that Cicala doing what he could to haue put his men againe in order, and ſo to haue reſtored the battell, nothing therein preuailed, but was glad together with the reſt of his armie, now all in rout, to betake himſelfe to flight. In this battell were fortie thouſand men on the one ſide and the other ſlaine, whereof thirtie thouſand were of the Baſſaes armie, and the reſt of the Rebels; who by this their ſo great a victorie, gained no leſſe honour and reputation, than had the old Baſſa got of contempt and diſgrace. The Perſian King alſo after this diſcomfiture of the Turkes, continuing his conqueſts, tooke in the Countrey of Siruan (a matter of great importance) beeing now deſtitute of all reliefe by the ouerthrow of Cicala Baſſa, who, had he preuailed againſt the Rebels, ſhould haue marched thither againſt the Perſian King, to haue ſtayed the courſe of his victories: who now victorious and out of feare, made head toward Aruſta, a very great and ſtrong towne, neere whereunto the riuer Tygris diſchargeth it ſelfe into the great riuer Euphrates, which citie hee at laſt woon, with all the places and Countries thereunto adioyning; and hath ſince as a moſt happy and victorious Prince againe recouered from the Turkes whatſoeuer they had ſince the time of Sultan Solyman by force of armes taken from the Perſian Kings his predeceſſours, two or three ſtrong places onely excepted. Of which moſt notable warres betwixt theſe two of the moſt mightie Eaſterne Princes, viz. the great Turke and the Perſian King, I can rather wiſh than hope to bee better enformed, and that, not ſo much for curioſitie (although that the knowledge of ſuch matters yeeld vnto ſuch as bee deſirous thereof much pleaſure, with no leſſe contentment) as for that they (though farre off) in ſome ſort much concerne the good and quiet of the Chriſtian Commonweale, the Perſian warres being the onely meanes whereby the furie of the Great Turkiſh Sultan hath beene, and yet is, for a time auerted from the Chriſtians in Europe vpon the Perſians in Aſia: as it is greatly to be feared, that ſome one or other (if not moe) of the Chriſtian Princes neereſt vnto him, ſhall to their great coſt and harme feele, ſo ſoone as theſe two great Mahometane Princes ſhall bee at peace betweene themſelues. But leaue wee the Baſſa a while to grieue at his ouerthrowes, and the Perſian King to triumph of theſe victories, and ſee what the Great Sultan himſelfe in the meane time doth.

The ſucceſſe of the Perſian King.

This young Prince Achmat, now one of the greateſt Monarches of the World, had not many moneths raigned, but that hee fell ſicke of the ſmall pox, wherewith hee hauing a groſſe and full bodie, was ſo foulely tormented for the ſpace of foureteene dayes, that oftentimes fainting, it was generally thought hee would thereof haue died: yea, diuers of the great Baſſaes were in ſpeech concerning his younger brother to bee taken out of the Seraglio to ſucceed him: which was thought would haue coſt the younger brother his life, after that the Sultan his elder brother was againe recouered; as no doubt it had, but that hee was the onely heire that was then left of the Othoman Familie, if that his brother the Sultan ſhould haue fayled. But hee againe recouered of his foule and childiſh diſeaſe; to ſhew vnto the Ianizaries and others (who doubted thereof) that hee was ſo recouered, proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe, moſt ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and in great ſtate and magnificence rid vp and downe through moſt of the chiefe ſtreets of the Imperiall Citie, the people (as their ccuſtomed manner is) in euery place as hee went reioycing to ſee him, and proſecuting him ith their moſt ioyfull acclamations, wiſhing vnto him a moſt long and happie raigne. Neither is it to be maruelled, ſeeing that the Almightie God hath euen in the faces and countenances of Princes engrauen ſome reſemblance of his owne, if they become reſpectuous and dmirable in the eyes and ſight of the common people, who cannot but honour them with heir voices, whome God hath bleſſed with his power, and other his extraordinarie world-y bleſſings.

Sultan Achmat ſick of the ſmall pox.

This young Prince ſo recouered of his ſickneſſe, and hauing ſhewed himſelfe vnto his ubiects, began foorthwith to giue himſelfe (according vnto the heat of his youthfull ſpi-it) immoderatly vnto the pleaſures of the field, and other ſuch violent exerciſes, be-g in their moderate vſe wholeſome, but in their violences much hurtfull, but eſpecially

vpon the new recouerie of his late ſickneſſe, the griefes whereof came in haſte, but were to leaue him at leiſure. Whereupon two of his Baſſaes carefull of his health, were ſo bold, as out of their loue to reproue him for ſuch his violent and immoderat exerciſes (the day not beeing long enough for them) and by effectuall reaſons to diſſuade him from the ſame. But ſo farre off was hee from hearkening vnto their wholeſome perſuaſions, as that to the contrarie hee therwith inraged, thruſt them both out of their places. So dangerous a thing it is, euen in zeale and loue to preſume to controll great Princes in their moſt vaine pleaſures; others in the meane time not louing them at all, but onely for their owne profit attending vpon their idle appetites, enjoying the preferments due vnto their more faithfull and loyall ſubiects, and yet ſecretly in themſelues ſmiling at the vanitie of ſuch as by whom they be ſo vnworthily honoured and promoted.

But as in the immoderat vſe of all things there is a ſacietie which breedeth a diſliking and diſtaſte of them (pleaſures being not by any meanes more commended, than by their nouelties and ſeldome vſe) ſo this young Sultan Achmat hauing glutted himſelfe with his pleaſures, began now to caſt his eyes vpon his other more neceſſarie affaires of State, but eſpecially vpon his warres both with the Chriſtian Emperour and the Mahometane Perſian King. Now hee was not ignorant of the great valour and ſufficiencie of Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, for the mannaging of his warres in Hungarie, wherein he had of long time beene exerciſed, and ſo therein beſt experienced. This old Captaine pleaſed him beſt, whome as an old, expert, and politicke Generall, hee reſolued to continue in his charge as Lieutenant Generall of his warres in Hungarie, and by the continuation of him in ſo great and honourable a place, to binde him to all loyall ſeruices in thoſe warres, euen to the vttermoſt of his power. This Great Baſſa was then at Belgrade, vpon the frontier of his gouernment in doubtfull ſuſpence expecting the reſolution of his Prince concerning this buſineſſe, and yet in hope longing after a ſecond charge: Whoſe longing deſire Achmat quickely ſatisfied, by ſending vnto him both a commiſſion for the continuation of his charge and dignitie, and certaine honourable Preſents in token of his extraordinarie fauour towards him; which were a Generals Enſigne, with an Hungarian Mace of pure gold. Now whether theſe Preſents, ioyned vnto the continuation of his charge, were welcome unto him, or not, ambitious mindes (ſuch as was his) can eaſily tell: and hee to ſhew his contentment therewith, gaue thereof good teſtimonie by the publique actions of joy, cauſing all the great Ordnance of the place in thundering wiſe to be oftentimes diſcharged, and the Trumpets and Drummes to be moſt ioyfully ſounded.

In the meane time newes was brought vnto Conſtantinople, how that the Perſian king hauing muſtered his men, was in the field with aboue an hundred thouſand good ſouldiers, and that Bagages Baſſa, one of the great Rebels in Aſia, had confederated himſelfe with him, to the further troubling of the Turkes eſtate. Whereupon Achmat, although hee had before giuen order vnto Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa his Lieutenant in Hungarie, for the beſieging and taking of Veradinum, a ſtrong Citie in the vpper Hungarie; now by a meſſenger ſent in haſte, commaunded the ſame Baſſa, all other buſineſſes ſet apart, with all the power that hee could make, forthwith to returne to Conſtantinople, there with him and the reſt of the Baſſaes to conſult and reſolue vpon the moſt neceſſarie warre, and of the readieſt meanes for the continuing of the ſame. For albeit that the Turkes were moſt deſirous to haue warres with the Chriſtians, and ſo (if it were poſſible) to haue conquered the remainders of Hungarie; yet the danger of the Perſian warres and of the rebellion in Aſia daily more and more encreaſing, ſuffered them not wholly to attend vnto the warres againſt the Chriſtians in Hungarie, but drew them now into a doubtfull conſultation, which way firſt to turne their forces. But the Baſſa being come to Conſtantinople, the Grand Seignior tooke the paines and did him the honour to come vnto his houſe, whither the Counſell for the State beeing aſſembled, it was there moſt proudly reſolued vpon, euen forthwith at one and the ſelfe ſame time with equall forces to make warre both vpon the Chriſtian Emperour in Hungarie, and the Perſian King in Aſia, accounting themſelues ſtrong enough to ſubdue and bring vnder foot both the one and the other, no power vpon earth beeing in their proud conceit of themſelues able to encounter or withſtand theirs. So for the mannaging of theſe warres, and of their ſo proud a reſolution to be performed in ſo remote Haſſan Baſſa ſent for to come to Conſtantinople.

A remote parts of the world, Haſſan Baſſa was continued in his charge, as General of the armie in Hungarie; and Cicala Baſſa was appointed to haue the command of the armie to be ſent againſt the Perſian: Two moſt expert Captaines, being to fight againſt their hereditarie enemies; Haſſan againſt the Chriſtians, and Cicala againſt the Perſians, by whom he had not long before bin euil vſed. An ordinarie policie of the Othoman Emperors, not to commit the charge of their armies againſt the Chriſtians, vnto Renegats; for feare leſt they, touched with ſome remorſe of conſcience, might betray the ſame, or otherwiſe deale vnfaithfully in their charge: but ſtill to employ them againſt the Perſians, of whom they haue no further knowledge, but as of their enemies in the field. But Cicala Baſſa well acquainted both with the difficultie and the danger of the Perſian war, (the ſcarres whereof he yet bare about with him) made ſhew B as if he had been vnwilling to take vpon him the charge thereof; and ſo begun to excuſe himſelfe, vntill that at length vpon promiſe made vnto him, for the furniſhing of him with a ſufficient armie, and all things els neceſſarie for ſo great a war, with a large and moſt honourable entertainment for himſelfe, and all the Perſian priſoners being alſo giuen vnto him in reward; he therewith contented, accepted of the honorable charge, whereof in his ambitious minde he was indeed moſt deſirous. And ſo receiuing the Generals Enſigne, with the other markes and cogniſances of his honour, cauſing the drums to be ſtrucken vp, and the trumpets to be joyfully ſounded, he cheerefully prepared himſelfe for that his ſo great an expedition; expecting but the comming of his ſonne, who at the requeſt of the Venetians was gon forth with a fleet of gallies, to ſcoure the Leuant ſeas of the pyrats, who then exceedingly troubled the C traffique of the Venetian merchants.

Haſſan Baſſa continued Generall of the Turks Armie againſt the Chriſtians, and Cicala appointed General of their armie againſt the Perſians.

Cicala Baſſa maketh ſhew as if he were vnwilling to be General in the warres againſt the Perſians.

Amiddeſt which the Turks ſo great deſignes, the Tartar Cham, bound for his pay to ſerue the Great Turke in his warres againſt the Chriſtians; by his Embaſſadour excuſed himſelfe vnto the Great Sultan, for that he could not himſelfe in perſon come this yeare with his forces into Hungarie, by reaſon that he was otherwiſe neceſſarily buſied with the moſt vrgent affaires of his owne Eſtate: yet promiſing withall, in ſtead of himſelfe, to ſend his ſonne with a good power of men. Now whereas many men maruell, why the Tartar Cham, being ſo great a Prince, and not much in danger vnto the Turke (being ſeparated from him by the Blacke or Euxine ſea) ſhould be ſtill ſo readie at the Turkes call, to doe him ſeruice in his warres: The cauſes thereof are diuers, and thoſe not far to ſeeke. Firſt, Their neere affini- D tie (as both diſcended from the ſame beginning) by often marriages ſtill confirmed: Then, Their likeneſſe of manners and condition, no ſmall bonds of loue and friendſhip: And thirdly, For that the Turkiſh Empire for want of heires males of the Othoman Familie, is aſſured, and as it were entailed vnto the Tartar Cham: But moſt of all, For the yearely penſion and great pay which he, being a bare Prince, receiueth from the Turkes; his rude and needie people being alſo euer readie, in hope of the ſpoyle, to follow him into theſe warres. But this his excuſe for not comming himſelfe this yeare into Hungarie, being by the Great Sultan accepted of, Haſſan Baſſa reſolued vpon his expedition for Hungarie, made great preparation for the good ſucceſſe of the warre there, gaue great hope thereof vnto the Great Sultan, and cauſed himſelfe to be proclaimed Lieutenant Generall of all the Great Sultans E Forces againſt the Chriſtians: euerie man affoording vnto theſe good hopes a thouſand wiſhes for his health and welfare: but eſpecially the Mahometane Prieſts aſſured him of their helpe, ſo that hee would not faile to doe the vttermoſt of his endeauour againſt the Chriſtians their enemies. For why, the Turkes doe account him the beſt and moſt zealous man, which can do the Chriſtians moſt harme. And ſo with theſe ſo great acclamations of joy and honour, Haſſan the great Baſſa ſet forward with his armie from Conſtantinople toward Hungarie.

The reaſons why the Tartar Cham is ſo readie to ſerue the great Turke in his wars againſt the Chriſtians.

Haſſan Baſſa ſetteth forward with his armie toward Hungarie.

The Chriſtian Emperor not ignorant of all theſe the Turks great preparations and haughty deſignes, ſought by all meanes how to reſiſt them, ſparing nothing that might any way ſerue or ſtand him in ſtead to that purpoſe. Experience had aſſured him of the Popes readineſſe in contributing to this action, what in his power was; hauing before receiued ſo many teſtimonies of his good will. Which cauſed him now to diſpatch alſo his brother Maximilian the Archduke, a good and a deuout Prince, vnto him, with expreſſe charge in the Emperors name to yeeld all ſubmiſſion vnto his Holineſſe, to mooue him to relieue the wofull eſtate of his diſtreſſed affaires. Maximilian ſetting forward about this buſineſſe, arriued at Venice, where he was by that State right honorably entertained. From Venice he trauelling towards Rome, and with a great retinue approching the citie, was there met by a great number of Noblemen with their followers, ſent from the Pope, and ſo by them with great honour was brought into the Vaticane Pelace, to the intent that ſo he might the oftener and with more eaſe haue acceſſe vnto the Pope, who then lay there ſicke of the gout. The next day he being brought vnto the Popes preſence, and after vſual reuerence done, hauing audience giuen him, in the preſence of all the Cardinals he began to deliuer vnto him the cauſes of his comming; which (as he ſaid) were two: Firſt, to put his Holineſſe in remembrance of the manifeſt perill and danger which hung ouer the heads of the Chriſtians in generall, from the Turke, but eſpecially ouer them of Italie, being ſo neere vnto the Turkiſh Empire, and a great gap laid open for the Turks thereinto to enter, by the way of Caniſia, the key of Stiria. And then in the Emperors behalfe to requeſt him to ſtretch forth his helping hand againſt this his mortal enemie, who was now drawing all his power together into one head, to deſtroy him: hauing certaine vnderſtanding of the great preparation by him made throughout all his dominions, to thruſt him out of his, if in theſe extremeties he were not relieued by ſuch Princes as could not in the end themſelues auoid the laſt violences of theſe harmes, whereof he felt the firſt aſſaults. Which his Holineſſe conſidering in the zeale of his deuotion, and by the encreaſing of the danger, he was in hope to finde of it the like aſſiſtance in this his ſecond need, that he had before receiued in his former affaires: the pretious balme of his deuout charitie being of greater vertue than to ſerue but for one time, but being of ſufficient power to ſerue for all ages, and all times of neceſſitie. And that therefore he beſought his Holineſſe to applie the ſame vpon the preſent wound, ſeeing that without his helpe, he was more like to periſh than to liue. Whereunto the Pope anſwered, That his former actions alreadie paſſed ſpake enough for him in this action, to manifeſt his deuout meaning, ſo that it was needleſſe for him to vſe further words to expreſſe the ſame. That the great ſupplies both of men and money which he had ſent forth for the good of the Chriſtian commonweale, were the ſure teſtimonies of his carefulneſſe for the ſame. And albeit that theſe euill haps had ſo far preuailed in Hungarie, yet that he for his part neuertheleſſe had ſtill done what he might for the remedying of thoſe ſo great euils. And that now by the aduice of his honourable Counſellors there preſent, he had appointed an hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes to be payd toward the maintenance of the Chriſtian Armie in Hungarie this yeare; in hope to do more than that afterward for the Emperor in his wars againſt the Turks: whom God had (as he ſaid) ſuffered to preuaile vpon the Chriſtians, not for any goodneſſe that was in them, but for the chaſtiſing of the wickedneſſe of the Chriſtians themſelues.

Which ſumme of an hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes was afterward according to a decree made by the Pope and Cardinals, leuied and payd of the tenths of the Clergie throughout all Italie. And ſo Maximilian the Archduke moſt magnificently entertained and feaſted by the Pope, and by him rewarded with foure thouſand crownes, hauing wel diſpatched the buſineſſe he came for, returned againe vnto the Emperor his brother.

But as the Chriſtian Emperour was thus carefull about his prouiſions for the withſtanding of the Turks, they were not any whit behinde him in augmenting of their forces for the inuading of him. And now the Tartars in great number being about to come vnto their aid into Hungarie, being denied paſſage by the Polonians, had turned head towards Valachia, with a purpoſe by force and ſtrong hand to get that of theſe weake people, which the power of the ſtronger had embarred them of. And ſo preſuming vpon their number, they entered into the ſame Prouince, which they all ouer rifled and ſpoiled at their pleaſure. Where ſuch of the countrey people as could eſcape their furie, fled into the townes, leauing their goods behinde them vnto their mercileſſe rage, not with any thing to be ſatisfied. Rodolph the Vayuod himſelfe as a man with furie diſmaied, fled to Cronſtat to George Baſta: where he conſidering the danger he was now in, and that he was ſtill to expect the like ſo often as the Tartars were for the ſeruice of the Turke to come into Hungarie; before Baſta tooke a new oath of allegeance vnto the Emperor, ſolemnly proteſting to die and liue in his ſeruice; neceſſitie now enforcing him to acknowledge his dutie, and to ſeeke for the remedie of his harmes, which he had before oftentimes moſt proudly reiected. Vpon which his ſo humble ſubmiſſion, Baſta receiued him and his countrey into his protection.

Valachia ſpoyled by the Tartars.

Rodolph the Vayod ſubmitteth himſelf & his countrey to the Emperours protection.

A In the meane time two traitours were brought to Claudinople, who hauing by wonderfull craft ſurpriſed a ſtrong caſtle belonging vnto a certain great Ladie a widow, neere vnto a burrough called Caraſebe, and rifled and ſacked the ſame, traiterouſly afterward ſold it vnto the Turks, to the great hurt of the Emperors ſubiects neere vnto the place, and the no leſſe aduantage of the Turks. Whereof the Haiducks hauing gotten vnderſtanding, and cunning in ſuch matters, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the Turks by the way as they were comming to haue taken poſſeſſion of the place: who ſeeing themſelues too weake to withſtand their enemies, and out of hope to ſaue themſelues by flight, were there as men diſmaied and appointed to the ſlaughter, moſt of them by the Haiducks cut in pieces, and the reſt taken priſoners. The two Traitors being according to their deſerts, for their ſhamefull trecherie, moſt cruelly put to death, B to the terror of others.

The Haiducks hauing no houſes but the fields, nor other trade but their armes, ſpoiled of the one by the Turks, and armed with the other by neceſſitie, are alwaies in readineſſe for ſeruice. In hope of profit, it is to them a pleaſure to paſſe ouer the mountaines of yce, to trauell through the ſtormes of thunder and lightening, to ſwimme ouer the deepe riuers, and to thruſt themſelues into a thouſand dangers, which as it is no commendable kinde of life, ſo is the practiſe of it vniuſt. For as in this, ſo in other their actions, they ſpare neither friend nor foe, all that comes in their way being ſubiect, and as it were appointed to their furie: but eſpecially when they want their pay, which affoordeth vnto them a thouſand excuſes, for the robbing and ſpoiling of all men without reſpect. With which manner of furie they were euen at C this time enraged for want of their pay, in ſuch ſort, as that if their right hands ſpoyled the Turks, their left hands robbed the Chriſtians: as vpon one and the ſelfe ſame day they tooke from the Turks of Agria a number of beaſts and cattel, and rifled diuers villages of the Chriſtians. And not content with theſe outrages, meeting with an hundred, or ſix ſcore waggons, laded with great ſtore of victuals, going toward Alba-Iulia, conducted by the Zeclers, ſet vpon them, ſlew them that driue them, and carried away the waggons with them. But theſe wrongs by Chriſtians done vnto Chriſtians, euen the mortall enemies of the Chriſtians, the Turks themſelues reuenged. For the Turks of Temeſwar hauing been abroad toward Lippa, and found good ſtore of bootie, meeting with theſe ſharkers, were by them charged, not ſo much for that they were their enemies, or for the zeale of Chriſtianitie, or for the deſire of D honour, as for to haue had from them their prey and bootie. But the Turks being in number twice as many as they, and withall wel acquainted with ſuch buſineſſe, were not ſo eaſily ſpoiled; but knowing their owne ſtrength, with their number, oppreſſed their enemies, moſt of whom they ſlew, and tooke the reſt priſoners. God being as iuſt in his puniſhments, as he is in works powerfull, puniſhing the wicked by the weapons of others as wicked, or rather worſe than they.

The Turks in the meane time whileſt things thus paſſed, began againe to fall to their old practiſe, for the ſoliciting of a peace: but ſuch fantaſies were too ſtale and common for them any more to deceiue the Chriſtians with: howbeit that they yet gaue ſome eare thereunto, to diſcouer in their policie the commodities and inconueniences of the peace by them in ſhew offered, with a thouſand proteſtations in their words, but farre differing from their thoughts and deeds: who during the time of the parley, laboured in what they might to benefit themſelues, and to hurt vs. For euen in that ſame verie time they fortified their townes and caſtles with men and victuals, but eſpecially the citie of Buda, whereinto by a conuoy of three thouſand Turks come from Belgrade, they put an exceeding quantitie of all ſort of neceſſarie prouiſion, ſufficient to ſerue the ſame for an whole yeare. Beſides that, it was certainly knowne by certaine Turks taken priſoners and brought to Poſconium, that all this parley and treatie of peace was but of purpoſe feigned to put the Chriſtians in ſecurity; for that the Baſſa of Buda, who was the chiefe publiſher of the ſame, had no ſuch commiſſion from the Great Sultan for the concluding of any peace in the abſence of the Viſier Baſſa, vnto whom the Graund Seigniour had giuen charge, not to make any peace with the Emperour, but vpon condition, That hee ſhould firſt deliuer vnto him thu Citie of Strigonium: which if hee would not yeeld, that then he ſhould beſiege it, and by force take it from him; and after the winning thereof to refuſe all other treatie of peace, it being the onely cauſe for which the Turks deſired peace. Of all which their double dealing and craftie deſignes the Emperour vnderſtanding, and whole-

The Turkes in their hearts meaning war, make ſhew as if they were deſirous of peace.

ly reſolued for war, preſently ſent Countie Sulze with commiſſion to Vienna, and appointed George Baſta Lieutenant Generall of his Armie in Hungarie; aduiſing them carefully to looke to their charge, and not too much to truſt vnto the gloſing and flattering ſpeeches of the Turks.

The caſtle of Reouin ſurpriſed by the Haiducks.

The Haiduckes in the meane time alwaies in armes, as hauing no other inheritance whereon to liue, ceaſed not ſtill to looke abroad, to finde that was neuer loſt. Now it fortuned them in roaming abroad toward Belgrade, to light vpon Reouin a ſtrong and faire caſtle of the Turks, wherein eight hundred of the Turks ſouldiers and other of their countrey people had their abode, together with the greateſt part of their ſubſtance. In the ſtrength of which caſtle the Turks truſting, and there lying in ſecuritie, without further care of their ſafetie, were vpon the ſudden before they were aware, by theſe aduenturous men ſurpriſed, who for haſt thruſting one another forward, at length carried the place, ſlew the greateſt part of the Turks, and taking the reſt priſoners, with a great and rich bootie returned to Lippa. The like exploit they of the gariſon of Caniſia attempted vpon the caſtle and burrough of Lambac, which they tooke and ſpoiled, and afterwards ſet it on fire: The flame whereof ſerued for a ſignal vnto the troupes of Countie Serin, which paſſing that way, and lighting vpon the Turks ouerloded with the ſpoiles they had there taken, cut them in pieces, and ſo recouered from them the bootie.

Petrinia in danger to haue been betrayed vnto the Turks

About this time, certaine of the garriſon ſouldiers of Petrinia, hauing ſecretly conſpired with the Turkes (by whom they were before corrupted) to deliuer vnto them that ſtrong caſtle: and being about to haue betrayed the ſame by a Mine which they were in making vnder a ſtable neere vnto a ſtore-houſe wherein the pouder for the ſtore of the caſtle lay, with a purpoſe by firing of the ſame, to haue giuen the Turkes enterance by the ruines thereof, who lay cloſe hidden in a wood neere vnto the place; it fortuned this their wicked purpoſe to be perceiued by certaine offendors then kept priſoners in the ſame ſtable neere vnto the Mine: who hauing diſcouered the Traitours whole purpoſe, and in feare to be burned or blowne vp by the furie of the Mine ſo neere vnto them, diſcouered the ſame vnto the Gaoler, who made the Gouernour therewith acquainted; by whoſe commandement they were forthwith apprehended, and being conuicted of their ſo foule a treaſon, were with exemplarie puniſhment executed.

Now as the Turks had oftentimes made ſhew as if they had beene deſirous of peace, ſo ceaſed they not yet with great earneſtneſſe to ſolicit the ſame: ſo that the Emperour, although he knew it to be a thing rather to be wiſhed than hoped for, yet leſt he ſhould ſeeme careleſſe of the common quiet of his ſubiects and people, and to refuſe ſo great a good ſo oftentimes offered him; now once againe appointed certaine perſonages of great place and authoritie to attend the propoſitions of peace to be on the Turks behalfe propounded. Of which Commiſſioners, Cæſar Gallen Sherife of Strigonium, an Italian, and a man of great experience in matters of State, was one. Whom the Gouernour of Strigonium had of purpoſe ſent to Peſth, to conſider of ſome good meanes for the concluding of the peace, whereof he himſelfe in perſon had layd the firſt foundation; and vnderſtood the Turks demands and pretenſions, not much differing from thoſe which they had many times before demanded. Whereof the firſt was, That the Emperour ſhould for the time to come well and truly pay vnto the Great Sultan and his ſucceſſors, all ſuch tribute as he was wont to pay vnto the Turkiſh Emperors his predeceſſors, during the time of his leagues with them, and that without any demand to be thereof made. The ſecond, That the Emperour ſhould alwaies haue his Embaſſadour Lieger at the Great Sultans Court, with honourable Preſents, there to ſolicit the continuation of his loue and friendſhip toward the Emperour his Maſter. The third, That the Emperour ſhould deliuer vnto the Turks all the townes and caſtles which he had taken from them either by force or by ſurpriſe, during the time of this warre, together with the countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia. Vpon which demands granted, they promiſed to ſend a meſſenger vnto the Great Sultan, in their names to entreat him to ſurrender Caniſia vnto the Emperor, but not Agria, which (as they ſaid) they might in no wiſe deliuer, except they were thereunto by force of armes conſtrained.

The inſolent & vnreaſonable demands of the Turks, for the concluding of a peace with the Chriſtians.

The anſwer of the Emperours Deputies vnto the Turkes proud demãds.

Vnto which their ſo proud and vnreaſonable demaunds the Commiſſioners for the Emperour anſwered, That the Emperour long before this time had made peace with Sultan Selym the

A the ſecond of that name, and with Sultan Amurath the third, this Sultan Achmat his pre-deceſſours. An aſſured peace, ſworne vnto and confirmed by all the iuſt and ſolemne Oathes that could haue beene by any man deſired: and for the more aſſurance thereof, into writing conceiued, and with the moſt authentique ſeales of their Maieſties confirmed:
whereby both parties were moſt ſeuerely and ſtraitly forbidden, one of them to attempt any thing againſt the other, or to encroach the one of them vpon the other, during the time of ſuch their League: And if ſo bee that contrarie to the tenour thereof, either part ſhould vndertake to ſurpriſe any place belonging to the other, and ſo become maſters thereof, that vpon the leaſt requeſt of the partie ſo wronged, the places ſurpriſed ſhould bee againe forthwith reſtored, as vſurped vpon, contrarie to the publique faith, and the vſurpers to bee ſe-
B uerely for the ſame puniſhed. And that yet the Turkes notwithſtanding thruſting by heapes beyond the barres of this ſo ſtrong and holy a League, had violated and broken the ſame, by ſurpriſing a number of places both in the high and lower Countries of Hungarie, neuer giuing eare vnto any ſpeech or requeſt that could bee made vnto them for the reſtitution thereof. And yet not ſo contented, had alſo taken a number of places from the Emperour in Sclauonia, betweene the riuers of Culpe and Vnna: Which places hee had oftentimes by as juſt right redemaunded, as they were by vniuſt forces vſurped, before the beginning of theſe warres. Demaunds eſteemed juſt and reaſonable euen by the Turkes themſelues, and yet for all that altogether reiected by the great Sultans themſelues: of which their ſo great iniuſtice the Emperour had oftentimes moſt juſtly complained, and ſo did euen at this C day, at the feeling of ſuch his hurts and harmes. And that the Emperour hauing by ſo many perfidious dealings made proofe of the vntruſtineſſe of the Grand Seigniour his predeceſ-ſours, what aſſurance then can hee conceiue of his fidelitie? or vpon what foundation of faith can hee build the ſure building of peace, ſo much deſired of him? And yet if he might hope ſo much of the faith of another man, as he is aſſured of his owne juſt meaning, differing much from that of the Grand Seigniours, which hee knew to be neuer anſwerable vnto his, that he for his part could be well content to embrace the peace; prouided alwaies, That hee might haue Caniſia and Agria deliuered vnto him. Or that if they would needs ſtil hold thoſe places, that he might likewiſe in peace hold the places that he had before woon in that war, the reaſons being on both ſides alike. And that as concerning Tranſyluania, hee could not deli-D uer that without betraying of his owne right, and the welfare of that Prouince; hauing obtained the ſame as well by agreements and couenants betweene him and the ſonne of the laſt Duke, Iohn, as by the free and voluntarie releaſement which Sigiſmund Bathor, the laſt and immediat Prince thereof, had not long before made vnto him: for the defence of which his rights, hee had ſpent many men, and great ſummes of money, and all for the keeping of that Prouince by force of armes, which by ſo good right belonged vnto him. And that for Valachia he could be content to yeeld ſome part of his right vnto that Prouince, ſo that the Turks ſhould ſeaſe from thenceforth to demand of him any yearly tribute, or that he ſhould as of ordinary duty ſend his embaſſadors with yerely Preſents to the Grand Seignior, not being able without need, to conſent vnto ſuch a needleſſe ſeruitude: ſeeing that euery Prince ought to be at libertie, at his owne choice to ſend his Embaſſadors, and not at the appointment of another man.

Which anſwere of the Emperours Commiſſioners ſerued to no other purpoſe, but for the Turkes to laugh and ſport at, how juſt and reaſonable ſoeuer they were: ſtill preſſing them io yeeld vnto their vnreaſonable demaunds; or elſe threatening to aduertiſe the Great Sultan thereof, who by force would take that from them, to their further loſſe, which they refuſed to grant him by faire meanes, to their owne good. And ſo the treatie was for that time broken off, without any thing concluded: which cauſed the Gouernour of Strigonium to retire himſelfe backe againe vnto his charge; yet for all that, leauing Caſar Gallen behind him, to entertaine it in ſuch ſmall hope as was there of yet left: who afterwards ſeeing it almoſt deſperate, making a great feaſt vnto certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Buda, and hauing in that merriment drawne from them a promiſe to liue as friends with them of the garriſon of Peſth, and of other places which lay neere vnto that towne, hee retired himſelfe afterwards vnto Strigonium alſo.

The Turkes ſcorne and deride the reaſonable anſwere of the emperors Commiſſioners.

The ſhamefull cowardiſe of Iagenreuter gouernor of Peſth

Peſth moſt ſhamefully abandoned by the Chriſtians.

Shortly after whoſe departure, Iagenreuter Gouernour of Peſth, notwithſtanding the late promiſes of the Turkes of Buda, for their liuing by him in peace and amitie; and the aſſured G promiſe of Cæſar Gallen, at his laſt departure, for the ſpeedy furniſhing of the towne both with men and all things elſe neceſſarie for the defence thereof, which he ought with great aſſurance to haue expected; yet diſmaied with the brute of the comming of Haſſan Baſſa the Turkes Generall with his great armie, and that by the ſtrait commandement of the great Sultan, hee was to begin his conqueſts in Hungarie with the winning of Peſth; as a man afraid of his owne ſhadow, thought good betime to prouide for himſelfe: and vpon that reſolution, hauing yet ſeene no enemie at all to force him, truſſing vp his baggage, the fifth of September forſooke the towne, with fiue companies of footmen, and ſix troupes of horſemen following him: a ſufficient number to haue for a time defended the towne, and endured a ſiege, eſpecially in H ſo ſtrong a place, and ſo well prouided both of victuals and munition. All which, this moſt cowardly Gouernor (but vnworthie that name) left together with his honor, for a prey vnto his enemies: hauing yet before his departure out of the towne, cauſed the principal buildings thereof to be vndermined, and barrels of gunpouder to be laid vnder them, wherewith they were ſhortly after all ouerthrowne, and moſt part of the towne burnt. But being gone not paſt halfe a league from the place, hee met with foure hundred Haiduckes all well armed, whome the Gouernour of Strigonium had ſent for the reliefe of Peſth, with a number of boats loaded with corne, munition, and other neceſſaries of all ſorts, for the better aſſurance of the place, and the performing of the promiſe before to that end made by the Gouernour of Strigonium: which Hungarian Haiduckes meeting with theſe diſmayed cowards vpon the way, I thought it not beſt to goe any farther, as thinking themſelues not able to doe that with their ſo ſmall a number, which the other durſt not to vndertake with their far greater: and ſo ioyning themſelues with the other fearefull fugitiues, they with them returned to Strigonium, leauing their veſſels and munitions vnto their enemies, who immediatly after ſeiſed vpon them.

Peſth taken by the Turkes.

The next day after, the mines hauing taken their effect, the Turks wondering to ſee ſo great and terrible a fire in Peſth, which ſtill more and more encreaſed, there beeing none that went about to quench it, aduentured to come ouer the riuer from Buda, and to draw neere vnto the towne now all on a light fire. Which they finding abandoned and forſaken by the Chriſtians, they with great diligence quenched, repaired the ruines of the towne, and ſo without any K loſſe became maſters of the ſame.

Iagenrenter for his cowardiſe worthily committed to priſon.

Iagenrenter the cowardly late Gouernor with his fearefull troupes in the meane time comming to Strigonium, and by the Gouernour there examined of the cauſes of his flight, and of the ſo ſhamefull leauing of his charge, and being able to alledge no other cauſe or reaſon, but the great brute and report of the Viſier Baſſaes comming with his armie to beſiege the towne, was therefore committed to priſon, and there reſerued to be afterward iuſtly puniſhed for his diſloyaltie and cowardiſe.

The Baſſa of Buda excuſeth himſelf for the taking of Peſth

The Baſſa of Buda by the cowardiſe of the Gouernour thus poſſeſſed of Peſth, by letters excuſed himſelfe vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium, for the taking thereof, the treatie of peace being not as yet quite broken off: alleadging for himſelfe (as the truth was) That he had L taken it as a place by the Chriſtians vpon a vain feare forſaken, and deſperatly ſet on fire, without any ſuch cauſe giuen them ſo to doe by the Turkes, or on his behalfe. And further, offered vnto the Gouernour, if hee ſo pleaſed, to deale with him for the exchange of priſoners on both ſides taken, offering to exchange one of them for another. And as for the concluding of the peace ſo oftentimes treated of, and euen yet in hand, that hee for his part was wonderfull deſirous that it might bee fully concluded and ended, before the arriuall of Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa with his armie in Hungarie: for that hee beeing once come, there would then be no time amidſt the noiſe of ſo many weapons, and ſo many men of warre, to talke of peace.

Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa was now for all that alreadie entered into Hungarie, drawing after M him a world of men, and was come towards Sexart, for the viewing of which armie the Gouernour of Pallantwar going foorth with an hundred horſemen, by euill hap chanced, before hee was aware, vpon the ſudden to meet with fiue hundred Turkes, by the Baſſa himſelfe likewiſe ſent forth to diſcouer the countrey, and the paſſages thereof: by whom he charged, and

A and with the multitude of his enemies oppreſſed, was himſelfe taken priſoner, moſt of his men being in that conflict ſlaine, ſome few of them that were left aliue by ſpeedie flight hardly eſcaping. Which euill hap on the Chriſtians ſide, was forthwith recompenced with the better ſucceſſe of the Countie Serin, who falling vpon three hundred Turkes neere vnto Sigeth, beeing in number ſcarce halfe ſo many as they, yet ſet vpon them with ſuch courage, that giuing them no leiſure to conſider of the weakneſſe of his forces, they were by them ouerthrowne and cut in pieces, before they were well aware of him.

But together with the time of the yeare, to come vnto the maine point of theſe preſent warres in Hungarie, the Turkes finding themſelues out of hope by any capitulations or treaties of peace, to regaine the ſtrong towne of Strigonium out of the hands of the Chri- B ſtians, were now reſolued to employ the vttermoſt of their forces for the obtaining of the ſame; with a thouſand proteſtations, That if by force of armes and ſtrong hand they ſhould gaine the place, they would neuer more haue peace with the Chriſtians. At which their vaine threats and ſpeeches, the Chriſtians before reſolutely ſet downe for the defending of the place by them ſo much deſired, and well acquainted with their great brags, could not but with ſcorne ſmile, as men nothing therewith diſmaied, nor ſo to bee remooued. Neuertheleſſe the Baſſa conſtant in his reſolution for the regaining Strigonium, with all his forces came the eighteenth day of September and layed ſiege vnto it. Now vnto this ſiege the Turkes, in hope of ſpoyle and bootie, came flocking from all places, as it had beene to ſome great mart; and the fields in all the Countrey thereabout were couered and ſwarmed C with armes, men, horſes, and tents. They encamped neere vnto Charles his hill, taking vp with their tents halfe a league of the Countrey round about: and at their firſt comming moſt brauely aduanced their Enſignes with their halfe Moones, the armes of their ſtill encreaſing Empire. Whom the beſieged in this action imitated, brauely aduancing their Enſignes vpon their walls, as did the Turkes in the fields; and further brauing and prouoking them with a thouſand thundering ſhot, diſcharged out of the Towne amongſt them. All the walls round about the Towne, gliſtered with armes and flames of fire, out of which the deadly bullets flew carrying with them death and terrour into the middeſt of theſe new come enemies, for their welcome. The Turkes neuertheleſſe came ſtill reſolutely on, and as men prodigal of their liues euen in the middeſt of ſo many dangers, began to make their approches. D Vpon whom the Chriſtians with great courage ſallied forth, to diſturbe them in their works, and ſo for the ſpace of certaine houres hauing had with them an hot and ſharpe skirmiſh, without any great hurt receiued, retired againe into the towne, leauing vnto their enemies by that they had done, a good teſtimonie of their valour and reſolution. The Turkes for all that lodged themſelues, made their trenches, and ſo encamped before the mount of Saint Thomas, where by the placing of their cannon, they well declared their meaning for the battering of that fort.

The Chriſtians ſally forth vpon the Turkes.

Againſt which their deſignes, George Baſta, Lieutenant Generall of the Imperial army, right reſolutely oppoſed himſelfe, hauing neere vnto Strigonium caſt vp a ſtrong fort, well furniſhed with men and great artillerie, from which he greatly annoied the Turks with his great ordnance, and with the furie thereof enforced them to remoue farther off with their approches: his armie vpon the riuer of Danubius in the meane time lying betwixt the Iſle of Strigonium, and the old towne of the Raſcians, to keep the enemy from entering either into the one place or the other.

The carefull endeuors of Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant Generall, for the preſeruation of Strigonium.

Countie Sultze Gouernour of the place alſo hauing taken a generall muſter of his men, and with comfortable and cheerefull ſpeeches encouraged his ſouldiers, putting them in minde of their duetie, and of the honourableneſſe of the action now in hand, as vndertaken for the maintenance of the Chriſtian religion, for the ſeruice of the Emperor, and the ſafegard of their owne liues: perſuading them withall, not to put any truſt or confidence in the Turks faith, or faire promiſes, conſidering that their weapons were euen yet wet with the bloud of their Chriſtian brethren, moſt perfidiouſly by them of late maſſacred and ſlaine at the taking of Alba Regalis: encouraging them alſo with the goodneſſe of their cauſe, with the carefulneſſe of their friends abroad for their reliefe, with the regard of their owne valour, and cowardiſe of their barbarous enemies, whoſe onely hope and truſt was in their multitude: and withwithall comforting them, that holding out but ſome few moneths, the very elements themſelues and the time of the yeare, would as it were fight for them, and affoord them aid, their enemies being not able with their great armie, in the extremitie of Winter weather, without their irreparable loſſes to hold the field. And that as for himſelfe, his honor together with his life, were ſo bound vnto his graue and ſepulchre, at the foot of the wals of that place, as that they could not be from the ſame ſeparated; hauing propoſed the glory of the preſeruation of that place, or elſe of an honourable death, as the end of all his actions, and conſummation of all his hopes. And that therefore he moſt earneſtly beſought them to follow his ſo honourable a purpoſe, in aſſiſting him in that action, ſo much concerning their liues and honour, and wholly depending of their courage and reſolution. And that for teſtimonie of his earneſt deſire to the furthering of this ſeruice, he was willing to depart with a good part of his ſubſtance and treaſure, to be beſtowed vpon them, amiddeſt theſe the trophies of his honour; hauing commanded them to haue certaine moneths pay payed before hand vnto them, which was accordingly done. G H

Now the Turkes hauing a purpoſe eaſily to begin the conqueſt of Strigonium by the taking of the ſtrong fort of Saint Thomas, came the foure and twentieth day of September to aſſault and batter the ſame: vpon whome fiue hundred horſemen, and two thouſand footmen ſallying out of the fort, cauſed them, after a ſharpe and bloudie conflict, and not without ſome loſſe on both ſides, to retire backe againe, and to forſake the mount whereupon they were encamped. But in purſuing of them too farre, they fell into a great ambuſh, before by the Turkes for that purpoſe layed to entrap them; where betwixt them was fought a moſt ſharpe and bloudie fight; the Turkes preſuming vpon their multitude, and the Chriſtians ſtanding vpon their valour and honour. Vntill that in fine, valour by number being oppreſſed, ſeuen hundred of the Turkes being ſlaine, the Chriſtians were enforced to retire, hauing loſt about an hundred of their men, and amongſt them the valiant Countie Caſimir of Holenloth, for whoſe bodie there was a notable fight betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turkes; not much vnlike vnto that which the Poet Homer deſcribeth, to haue beene fought betwixt the Trojanes and the Greekes, for the bodie of Patroclus. Howbeit that at length the Chriſtians beeing ouercharged with the comming on of the whole armie of the Turks, were glad (as I ſaid) to retire, and ſo to leaue the dead bodie of the Countie Caſimir in the power of their mercileſſe enemies; who as dogges which reuenge themſelues vpon the ſtones which are caſt at them, being not able to bite the hands of them that threw them, ſo did they vpon the bodie of this gentle Knight, by cutting off his noſe and eares, and afterwards his head. But within ſome few dayes after, this bodie ſo disfigured was againe deliuered vnto the Chriſtians for a Turke of good account, who was about that time by them taken priſoner. At which time the Turkes ſeemed to bee verie deſirous of peace, moſt earneſtly requeſting Countie Fredericke of Holenloth (the ſlaine Counties brother) not to be an hinderer thereof. Howbeit that this was but one of their old practiſes, depending ſtill vpon vnreaſonable conditions, whereof the yeelding vp of Strigonium was one of the chiefeſt, as the place by them moſt deſired.

A notable ſally of the Chriſtiãs out of the fort of S. Thomas. The Chriſtians falling into an ambuſh of the Turkes, loſe one of their chiefe Commanders.

More than beaſtly cruelty exercised by the Turks vpon the dead bodie of Countie Holenloth.

But if this ſiege of the Turkes auailed them not againſt the place beſieged, yet was it profitable for them againſt another place by them not attempted, which was the ſtrong towne of Hatwan, more ſubiect vnto feare, without any danger, than was Strigonium vnto the bullets and batterie of the Turkes, with juſt cauſe of diſtruſt. For the ſouldiers which lay there in garriſon, terrified with the ſiege of Strigonium, and doubting leſt the Turks leauing that ſiege, ſhould come and beſiege them, truſſing vp their bag and baggage, the nineteenth of September abandoned the place, and carrying away with them the beſt of the great ordnance, left the reſt altogether with the place, and great ſtore of prouiſion, vnto the enemie, not in hope of any ſuch matter.

The bruit of the ſiege of Strigonium had called thither all the forces of both parties in Hungarie, and the Countries thereabouts, on the one ſide for the winning thereof, and on the other for the defence of the ſame. Amongſt others, the Countie of Tambier, Gouernour of Lippa, was about to haue gone thither with certaine of his troupes to haue aided his Generall, for the preſeruation of the place. But in the mean time Bethlin Habor, chiefe of the rebels in

Bethlin Habor the Rebell ſurpriſed & ouerthrown by the Countie Tambier.

A Tranſyluania, aſſiſted by Beckberes Baſſa with foure thouſand Turkes entered into the Prouince to haue made himſelfe maſter thereof vnder the protection of the Turke. Whereof the Countie hauing got knowledge, reſolued to goe and meet him, and to encounter him at the verie firſt enterance of him into the Prouince. This old Rebell knowing that George Baſta was by the Emperours appointment gone out of the Countrey with the beſt troupes of his horſemen, the greateſt ſtrength of the Prouince, came on in great ſecuritie, thinking of nothing but of victorie, and of performing his entended exploit, without feare of any to let him: ſo that caſting no further perill, hee was ſurpriſed by the Countie, before he was aware, and put to flight. Neither was the fight long betwixt men accuſtomed to vanquiſh, reſolutely ſet downe, and well armed, againſt men diſmayed, halfe naked, and ſurpriſed. B In which conflict aboue a thouſand of them beeing ſlaine, and a thouſand of horſes of ſeruice taken, the reſt fled; amongſt whome Bethlin himſelfe with his Baſſa flying, were glad by ſwimming to ſaue themſelues amiddeſt a thouſand chances and dangers of their liues.

Succors ſent to the rebel by the Baſſa of Temeſwar, defeated by the Countie Tambier, & the Baſſa his Lieutenant ſlaine.

The Baſſa of Temeſwar aduertiſed of this ouerthrow by one of them that was fled from the ſame, preſently hee ſent forth his Lieutenant with a good number of men, to relieue the vanquiſhed Turkes: Who by the way vnderſtanding of the generall ouerthrow of them whome he was ſent forth to relieue, as alſo of the ſtrength of his enemies, and that he was come too late to the reliefe of his friends, retired as faſt as he could with his men backe againe homeward toward Temeſwar. But beeing in their retreat diſcouered, and hotly purC ſued by theſe men imbrued with the bloud of their enemies, and yet breathing with victorie, they were by them ouertaken euen almoſt at the gates of their Citie, and there (as men before ouercome with feare, and ouerwhelmed with deſpaire) cut in pieces, without any fight or reſiſtance by them made, beſeeming men of their ſort; the Lieutenant himſelfe beeing there ſlaine alſo.

After which exploits done, the Countie turning towards Iula, chanced to light vpon certaine companies of Turkes loaded with bootie, which they had got in roaming abroad into the Countrey thereabout, whome he purſued euen vnto the gates of the towne, which they found ſhut againſt them; for that they within the towne ſeeing the Chriſtians euen at the heeles of their companions, had ſhut their gates, neither durſt now open the ſame, for feare leſt the Chriſtians ſhould together with them enter the towne, and ſo become maſters thereof. Who ſo ſhut out by their owne friends, were there all by the Chriſtians ſlaine, euen in the ſight of their companions, not daring to let them in, nor able to relieue them. After which maſſacre done, the Chriſtians not yet ſo contented, burnt the ſuburbes of the towne, and ſo loaded with the ſpoyles of their enemies, departed. The Countie after ſo many honourable exploits in a ſmall time by him performed, returned to Lippa, where hee arriued the fiue and twentieth of September, and from thence afterward aduertiſing Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant Generall, of theſe his exploits done, cauſed ten of the Turkes Enſignes, all ſtayned with their owne bloud, to be preſented vnto him, as the ſure tokens of his good ſeruice done.

The Viſier Baſſa ſeeketh to gaine Strigonium by offering of the Chriſtians peace.

But to returne againe vnto the ſiege of Strigonium, the greateſt exploit by the Turkes entended for this yeare, from which wee haue from the occurrent of the ſame time a little ſtrayed. The Viſier Baſſa perceiuing by the valiant and reſolute defence of our men, how little hee preuayled in this ſiege, and that it was like enough to tend at length to his diſhonour, thought it good once againe to prooue, if hee might by compoſition gaine that which hee was now almoſt out of hope by force to obtaine. And to that purpoſe cauſed a motion to be made vnto the beſieged, for a treatie to be had concerning a peace, and a day appointed for the ſame. Vnto which motion for peace the Imperials (although they had no hope at all, of any peace to be concluded) eaſily yeelded, leſt they might be thought obſtinately to haue reiected the ſame. Whereupon Commiſſioners were on both ſides appoynted to meet together, to conferre of the matter. And ſo for the Emperour Althem himſelfe, with Ferdinand Collonitz, and Fredericke of Hohenlo, Countie of Rhene, were appointed neere vnto the Raſcian towne to meet with the Turkes Commiſſioners, to heare what they would ſay. Howbeit the Commiſſioners on both ſides beeing met at the place aforeſaid, all their conference was but vaine and to no purpoſe, the Turkes ſtill vrging the yeelding yeelding vp of Strigonium,and the Imperials as earneſtly refuſing the ſame. So that the treatie for peace being broken off, and the Commiſſioners departing, the ſiege was more cruelly C by the Turks continued than before.

The Coſſackes depart out of the Turks camp vnto the Chriſtians.

Now there were in the Turkes armie lying at the ſiege, certaine companies of Coſſackes, men for their pay indifferent to ſerue any Prince of what religion ſoeuer. Which ſeruiceable men,in number 700,had agreed together the 28 of September, by night to forſake the Turks campe,and to come vnto the Chriſtians.Of which their purpoſe and deſigne the Viſier Baſſa hauing by ſome vntruſtie amongſt them got knowledge, cauſed the footmen of theſe companies to be apprehended and ſlaine; the horſemen in the meane time making themſelues way ouer the bellies of ſuch as would haue ſtayed them,fled,and eſcaped, ſome of them to Komara,and ſome to Dotis. Threeſcore of theſe Coſſacks being by the Turks hardly purſued,aduentured to ſwim ouer Danubius, and ſo all naked came to Collonitz, by whome they were H courteouſly entertained and apparelled. And within three daies after,two hundred horſemen moe of the ſame Coſſacks came vnto Collonitz alſo: who marching in good order vnto the head of the Chriſtian campe,were there ſworne vnto the Emperors ſeruice; and in token of their loyaltie,there diſcharged their piſtols thrice.Which horſemen Collonitz diuided among the reſt of his troupes, as hauing before time had good experience of the courage and good ſeruice of diuers ſuch others of their fellowes.

By theſe fugitiue ſouldiers it was vnderſtood, that the Ianizaries in great number vp in mutinie againſt the Viſier Baſſa, would haue enforced him to haue raiſed the ſiege, and ſo to haue departed. The cauſe of their ſo great diſcontentment (as they pretended) was the manifeſt and aſſured danger of their liues, with little or no hope at all for the gayning of the I place: They themſelues beeing ſtill expoſed to the dangers both of the ſiege and of the field,hauing the beſieged on head of them armed with an aſſured reſolution, and the Chriſtian armie at their backs,of knowne valour and experience: Beſides that, the place it ſelfe was (as they ſaid)impregnable,being at all times to be relieued,by reaſon that it commanded ouer the Danubie,which might alwaies relieue it both with men and victuals. And that therefore, after that they had ſatisfied their honour, by giuing of an aſſault or two vnto the fort of Saint Thomas, they had reſolued to ariſe, and to be gone.And much about this time,viz. the nine and twentieth of September,in the night time,was a moſt dreadful fierie impreſſion ſeen in faſhion much like a Rainbow, of a fierie red colour,which beginning ouer Cockera,and riſing higher ouer Strigonium, at length vaniſhed away ouer the fort of S. Thomas. The ſight K whereof much troubled the beholders thereof, as well the Chriſtians as the Turkes: ſuch ſtrange meteors and apparitions being oftentimes the preſages of the ruine of them to whom they appeare.

In the meane time whileſt the Turks thus lay before Strigonium,at the ſiege of Saint Thomas fort, the Lord Baſta, Lieutenant Generall of the Emperours forces, to giue the Turkes to vnderſtand,how that he was alwaies in readineſſe to attend vpon their doings,and to take hold of all ſuch opportunities as ſhould by them bee offered, and ſo to keepe them in ſuſpence, came with ſeuen thouſand braue horſemen, and ſhewed himſelfe in the plaine field in order of battell; ſo, as it were, brauing the Turkes euen vnto their owne trenches: where hauing L diſcharged their piſtols thrice,they returned as victorious,alwaies keeping themſelues in order, as men readie either to giue or to accept of battell. Howbeit the Turkes for the preſent keeping themſelues cloſe within their trenches, mooued not; but afterwards being deſirous to counter-braue this the Chriſtians preſumption, the third day of October they came forth of their trenches, and gaue a ſecond aſſault vnto Saint Thomas fort, imploying the vttermoſt of their power in this action, whereupon they well knew a great part both of their honour and of their ſafetie to depend. But in aſſayling the fort they met with them as reſolutely ſet downe for the defence thereof, and for the maintenance of their honour, as were they for the winning of the ſame. So the aſſault was begun with great furie and aduenture, as was M the other before: howbeit that it endured not long, for that the Turkes fought rather for the diſcharge of their dutie,and to haue ſome juſt cauſe to raiſe their ſiege, than for any hope they had to preuaile, or to carrie the place. For it befell them according as they had expected,ſo that after that the fight had endured little more than halfe an houre,amiddeſt the tempeſts of armes and furie, in fine the Turkes out of hope to preuaile, gaue ouer the ſiege, and retired,

A hauing in that conflict loſt fiue hundred of their beſt ſouldiers.

The Gouernour of Strigonium had in the citie vnder his charge ſix thouſand Haiduckes, who attainted with treaſon and feare, all forſooke the place excepting fiue hundred, preferring their liues, vnworthie the ſauing, before their dutie, and the life and honour of their Generall. With which ſhameful treaſon, and the reſolution of the great Baſſa for forcing of the place, the Germanes there left, ſeeing their Captaines diſmaied, gathered themſelues together, promiſing by their owne valour, to ſupplie what wanted by reaſon of the trecherie of the others, offering themſelues to be ſworne againe vnto the ſeruice of the Emperour, and rather to die all in the place, than to yeeld it vp vnto the Turkes, or to leaue it vnto their enemies: where by their generall conſent a ſolemne decree was made, That whoſoeuer he were which B ſhould ſpeake or once make mention of yeelding the towne, ſhould forthwith therefore bee hanged vpon a gibbet. The Turkes although they had now in two aſſaults beene twice repulſed, came yet forth once againe the fifth day of October, and aſſaulted Saint Thomas fort the third time: wherein they fayled not to doe what they might, but were by the Chriſtians therein ſo receiued, that deſpairing of the winning thereof, they with great loſſe and ſhame retired. Which diſgrace cauſed them to returne to their old practiſes, for the taking of places by policie. For hauing in many places vndermined the wals, and filled them with gunpouder, they were in hope by that means to haue opened themſelues a way vnto their conqueſt. Of which their hope for all that, they were deceiued: for the Chriſtians hauing perceiued their meaning, did by countermining not onely fruſtrate their endeauour, but carried C away the pouder alſo, which they had before layed in the mines, reſeruing it to their owne further neceſſitie and vſe. Wherefore the Turkes ſeeing themſelues of their hope deceiued, returned againe vnto their old practiſes, to come to a parley for peace. Of which their motion the Chriſtians nothing diſliked. But the Commiſſioners on both ſides being met together for that purpoſe, in a little Iſland beneath Strigonium, when as the Turkes had offered vnto the Chriſtians the Citie of Agria for Strigonium; or if ſo be that that exchange pleaſed them not, but that they would needs keepe the Citie of Strigonium ſtill, that then in conſideration of the peace, they ſhould deliuer vnto them the ſtrong townes of Fileck, Saint Setſchin, Pallanke, and Nouigrade; both of which demaunds were verie vnreaſonable: The Commiſſioners thereupon againe departed without concluding of any D thing.

The Turks ſeeking to vndermine the fort of S. Thomas, diſappointed of their purpoſe.

A treatie for peace.

The treatie broken off, and nothing concluded.

Now the armie of the Turkes was in it ſelfe diuerſly diuided with quite contrarie deſires, the Viſier Baſſa with ſome other of the Commanders, ſtood ſtifly for the taking of the place, as men willing either to returne from thence with victorie, or elſe there to end their daies: but the Ianizaries to the contrarie, were as earneſt to bee gone, and to raiſe the ſiege, deeming it impoſſible as then to preuaile againſt a place ſo ſtrong, ſo well manned, and ſo eaſily to be ſtill relieued. With which their reſolution ſo contrarie vnto his, the Baſſa enraged, and yet propoſing before his departure to proue the vttermoſt of his forces againſt the fort now alreadie by him thrice before aſſaulted, the tenth of October gaue thereunto ſix great aſſaults, but with like ſucceſſe as before, finding there ſtill the ſame defendants, no whit diſcouraged, but armed with their accuſtomed reſolution. For the defendants encouraged by their moſt valiant commanders, with ſuch furie repulled the Turks, that they were glad to giue ouer aſſault vpon aſſault, and with great loſſe of their men to retire. Their often retreats alſo being vnto them no leſſe hurtfull than were their aſſaults, the deadly bullets being out of the fort diſcharged vpon them like ſhowers of haile. So that the Baſſa now after ſo many aſſaults, out of all hope to gaine the fort, and ſtill preſſed by the Ianizaries for the rayſing of the ſiege, immediatly after roſe with his armie, quitted his trenches, and retired with his campe neere vnto a caſtle, about a league diſtant from Strigonium. From whence the Turks, the better to couer their diſhonour, and to hinder the Chriſtians from purſuing of them in their retreat, the next day after came into the field with a good part of their armie, and ſhewed themſelues before the Raſcian towne, and there skirmiſhed with the Chriſtian Haiduckes. Which manner of skirmiſhing for all that was more in ſhew, than in effect, neither partie therein receiuing any great loſſe or hurt. In the meane time, the beſieged which were in Strigonium, hauing gotten certaine knowledge, that the enemie had alreadie remooued his cannon and other prouiſion for the ſiege backe againe into Buda, in token of joy diſcharged all their great Ordnance out of the citie and the fort, by the report thereof giuing knowledge vnto the other townes and caſtles of the Chriſtians, of their deliuerance. Of which ſo common a ioy euery one of them were partakers, as deliuered from ſome part of the feare which the ſiege of ſo great a Citie as was Strigonium, had brought vpon them. And ſo the ſiege of Strigonium, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turkes giuen ouer the thirteenth of October: the Ianizaries inſolently threatening to haue ſlaine the great Baſſa their Generall, if he had there any longer ſtaied.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in the meane time awaiting all opportunities, failed not to take hold of ſo fit an occaſion, but with his horſemen following after the Turks armie, ſlew of them a great number, and tooke ſome other of them priſoners. And afterward returning vnto their campe, found it void of men, but full of bullets, with certain peeces of great ordnance, which the Turks had left there, hauing not time to remoue the ſame to Buda. Vpon this riſing of the Turks army the Commanders thereof were diuerſly affected vnto the ſeruice that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the ſiege. Such of them as lay in Hungarie, or neere thereunto, deſiring ſtill to hold the field, in hope of the ſpoile of the countrey: but they which dwelt farther off, eſpecially ſuch as were come out of Aſia, deſiring as much to be diſcharged, their horſes being almoſt all dead with faintneſſe and trauell, and themſelues wearie of the ſeruice.

Shortly after the riſing of the Turkes armie from Strigonium, two fugitiues of the Turkes moſt brauely mounted, came vnto Baſta the Emperors Lieutenant, and preſenting him with a ring of great value, and a moſt faire Turkiſh Enſigne, told him, moſt part of the Turks armie to lie then incamped in the country neere vnto Peſth; & the great Cham, a yong Prince of about twentie yeares old to be come thither with a great power of Tartars, to aid the Baſſa: And that the Turks by their comming incouraged, were determined yet to make a great excurſion for the ſpoiling of the countrey. All which ſhortly after was certainly knowne to be true, the plaine countrey of the vpper Hungarie about Palanka, Setſchin, and Villecampe, beeing by them, but eſpecially by theſe new come Tartars, all ſpoyled and burnt. For remedie whereof Sigeſride Collonitz oppoſing himſelfe with his Hungarian horſemen, againſt theſe inſolent forragers, ſo danted them, that ceaſing further to ſpoile the country, they departed, carrying away with them ſuch priſoners and ſpoile as they had there taken, and leauing behind them a ſtrong garriſon of three thouſand good ſouldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Peſth, but a little before cowardly (as we ſaid) by the Chriſtians forſaken. But within ſome few daies after, viz. the foure and twentieth of October, the Viſier Baſſa by his letters written vnto Countie Althem Gouernour of Strigonium, made a mention for a treatie of peace to bee had for the comfort of the diſtreſſed people of that ſpoyled Countrey, ſolemnly proteſting, moſt religiouſly on his part to keepe the ſame, if it ſhould bee once concluded: and yet in the meane time with fire and ſword ſpoiling all the Countrey by the way as hee departed out of Hungarie.

The Viſier Baſſa by his letters maketh a motion for the treatie of peace.

New rebellion in Tranſiluania raiſed by Iſtiuan, ſyrnamed Botſcay.

But now as this poore Countrey began to feele reliefe by the departure of the great Baſſa with his army out thereof, ſo the Countrey of Tranſyluania joyning thereunto, was at the ſame time as much with rebellion and diſcord diſtreſſed. Bethlin Habor the Rebell, with his Baſſa ouerthrowne and driuen out of Tranſyluania (as is aforeſaid) the Lord Belgioſo, Baſta his Lieutenant in this Prouince, thinking all things now at quiet, was making himſelfe ready with his troups, to haue gon to aid the Lord Baſta his Generall, then incamped in the plains of Strigonium, to hinder the Turks deſignes for the taking of this towne. But as hee was about ſo to haue done, behold, euen at the ſame time when hee leaſt feared, a ſecond Rebell there ſtarted vp, far worſe than the firſt, namely the lord Iſtiuan (otherwiſe ſyrnamed Botſcay, or more truly * Potſcay) who accompanied with great troupes of men of warre vnder the protection of the Turke, and ſtiling himſelfe by the name of the Prince of Tranſyluania, entering that Prouince, miſerably burnt and ſpoyled the ſame. Botſcay dealeth vnfaithfully with ſuch as vpon his faith giuen vnto them, yeelded vnto him.

This victorie gotten, together with the humble ſubmiſſion of Botſcay, obtained of the Great Sultan, That from thenceforth hee ſhould be ſtiled by the name of the Prince of Tranſyluania, with a further charge from him, to do the vttermoſt of his endeauour for the ſubduing vnto his obeyſance the reſt of Tranſyluania; promiſing plentifully to ſupplie his wants both with men and money, and out of hand to ſend him three thouſand Tartars to his ayd. And indeed this was a verie great and bloudie battell, fought from the firſt breake of the day, vntill eleuen a clocke at noone: but whether ſo many were ſlaine there or no, it cannot certainely be told, for that diuers of them who were ſaid to be ſlaine, and ſo accounted among the dead, had hid themſelues in the wood thereby, and ſome others of them by ſome other meanes eſcaped death alſo. Petſie himſelfe had with him when hee was taken, two Monkes, whom the ſouldiours in deſpight cut into many pieces, and carried him faſt bound in chaines to Detritza, to be there cured of the dangerous wounds by him in the battaile receiued.

out of the citie and the fort, by the report thereof giuing knowledge vnto the other townes and caſtles of the Chriſtians, of their deliuerance. Of which ſo common a ioy euery one of them were partakers, as deliuered from ſome part of the feare which the ſiege of ſo great a Citie as was Strigonium, had brought vpon them. And ſo the ſiege of Strigonium, begun the eighteenth day of September, was by the Turkes giuen ouer the thirteenth of October: the Ianizaries inſolently threatening to haue ſlaine the great Baſſa their Generall, if he had there any longer ſtaied.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in the meane time awaiting all opportunities, failed not to take hold of ſo fit an occaſion, but with his horſemen following after the Turks armie, ſlew of them a great number, and tooke ſome other of them priſoners. And afterward returning vnto their campe, found it void of men, but full of bullets, with certain peeces of great ordnance, which the Turks had left there, hauing not time to remoue the ſame to Buda. Vpon this riſing of the Turks army the Commanders thereof were diuerſly affected vnto the ſeruice that was further to be done, as they had before been in the time of the ſiege. Such of them as lay in Hungarie, or neere thereunto, deſiring ſtill to hold the field, in hope of the ſpoile of the countrey: but they which dwelt farther off, eſpecially ſuch as were come out of Aſia, deſiring as much to be diſcharged, their horſes being almoſt all dead with faintneſſe and trauell, and themſelues wearie of the ſeruice.

Shortly after the riſing of the Turkes armie from Strigonium, two fugitiues of the Turkes moſt brauely mounted, came vnto Baſta the Emperors Lieutenant, and preſenting him with a ring of great value, and a moſt faire Turkiſh Enſigne, told him, moſt part of the Turks armie to lie then incamped in the country neere vnto Peſth; & the great Cham, a yong Prince of about twentie yeares old to be come thither with a great power of Tartars, to aid the Baſſa: And that the Turks by their comming incouraged, were determined yet to make a great excurſion for the ſpoiling of the countrey. All which ſhortly after was certainly knowne to be true, the plaine countrey of the vpper Hungarie about Palanka, Setſchin, and Villecampe, beeing by them, but eſpecially by theſe new come Tartars, all ſpoyled and burnt. For remedie whereof Sigeſride Collonitz oppoſing himſelfe with his Hungarian horſemen, againſt theſe inſolent forragers, ſo danted them, that ceaſing further to ſpoile the country, they departed, carrying away with them ſuch priſoners and ſpoile as they had there taken, and leauing behind them a ſtrong garriſon of three thouſand good ſouldiers, for the repairing and keeping of Peſth, but a little before cowardly (as we ſaid) by the Chriſtians forſaken. But within ſome few daies after, viz. the foure and twentieth of October, the Viſier Baſſa by his letters written vnto Countie Althem Gouernour of Strigonium, made a mention for a treatie of peace to bee had for the comfort of the diſtreſſed people of that ſpoyled Countrey, ſolemnly proteſting, moſt religiouſly on his part to keepe the ſame, if it ſhould bee once concluded: and yet in the meane time with fire and ſword ſpoiling all the Countrey by the way as hee departed out of Hungarie.

The rebell Botſcay thus wonderfully encreaſed in ſtrength and number, beſet almoſt all the paſſages of the countrey, and with the ſword of rebellion in his hand, and his ſouldiers following him, commanded the cities ſtil as he went, to yeeld vnto him: but, hearing that Belgioſa was after the late ouerthrow gone from Veradin to Caſſouia, where his wife lay; and being come thither, to haue been by the citiſens reiected, who would not only not receiue him into their citie, but turned his wife alſo out of the citie vnto him, he with a great armie comming H thither, tooke the Citie without reſiſtance, the Citiſens for the moſt part enclining vnto him: Of which Citie being poſſeſſed, hee forthwith changed both the Religion and ciuile gouernement thereof, ſlew part of ſuch as were of the Romiſh Religion, and thruſt the reſt out of the Citie, with all the Church-men, tooke the Biſhop and the Emperours Treaſuror priſoners, and ſo changed the whole gouernment of the towne vp-ſide downe. The onely man he ſtood in feare of, was Belgioſa, for whom he laid wait by all meanes hee could to haue taken him, with a purpoſe to haue vſed him moſt hardly, if he had fallen into his hands.

Theſe things thus done in Tranſyluania and in Hungarie, the Viſier Baſſa being about to I returne to Conſtantinople, to grace that little which he had done this yeare in Hungarie, and to auoid the ſuſpition of his euill ſucceſſe in that Prouince, borrowed of Botſcay the reſt of the Enſignes, together with Petſie and other the noble Chriſtian captiues which he had taken in the late battell with Belgioſa: which Enſignes and priſoners he confidently afterwards cauſed to be preſented vnto the Great Sultan Achmat, as taken by himſelfe; and in recompence thereof, left three thouſand Turks and Tartars with the Rebell, to aid him in his wars both in Tranſyluania and Hungarie.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in Hungarie, and Gouernour of Tranſyluania, hearing of the ſtirres and troubles of late raiſed in both thoſe Countreys, by Botſcay and his rebellious Followers, and hauing as he thought beſt, ſet all things in order againe at Strigonium, K marched thence with his Armie, being fourteene thouſand ſtrong, towards Caſſouia, with a purpoſe to haue ſuppreſſed the rebellion in the vpper Hungarie, before it ſhould haue ſpred farther, to the endangering of the whole ſtate of both thoſe Countreys, as afterward it did. Howbeit before hee could come thither, the Rebels after the taking of Caſſouia, being wonderfully encreaſed both in ſtrength and number, had taken in moſt of the ſtrong Townes and places in the vpper Hungarie, the people almoſt generally now fauouring their quarrell, carrying with it the face of Religion, with the ſuppreſſing of the German gouernment, both things vnto them much pleaſing. And now hearing that Belgioſa (a man of them moſt hated, being as we ſaid, ſhut out of Caſſouia) was fled into the Caſtle of Zipze, they by Letters required of Turſon Captaine of the Caſtle, to haue him deliuered L vnto them, to be according to his deſerts puniſhed; promiſing withall, to doe Turſon himſelfe no harme, ſo that hee would take part with them in the defence of their Religion, and of the libertie of conſcience: which if hee ſhould refuſe to doe, yet that they would giue him free libertie to depart whither he would, out of his Caſtle, and in ſafety to conduct him thither, ſo that hee would foothwith reſolue, what courſe hee would take: But if hee ſhould of this his offer miſlike alſo, then they threatened to ſpoyle his Countrey, to kill his people, to raſe his Caſtle, and to make himſelfe an example vnto others. Wherewith for all that, he nothing mooued, refuſed to deliuer vnto them Belgioſa, the man whom they ſo much deſired, or yet to accept of any of their other offers. Whereupon the Rebels with great labour repairing the broken way betwixt Caſſouia and the Caſtle, M and bringing certaine pieces of great Ordnance from Caſſouia, in great number came and ſtraightly beſieged the Caſtle. With whoſe attempts the valiant Captaine nothing mooued, with his thundering ſhot out of the Caſtle ſo welcommed them, that hauing thereby receiued great harme, they thought it not their beſt courſe to ſtay any longer there Belgioſa in the caſtle of Zipze beſieged by the Rebels.

A with ſo great a power, but with the greateſt part thereof to go to Presburg, to reforme that citie and ſome other places by the way; perſuading themſelues, That the Captaine of this caſtle ſo ſhut vp, and on euerie ſide beſet with his enemies, would at length of himſelf yeeld vp the caſtle.

But while the Rebels thus lay at the ſiege of this caſtle, certaine companies of them went to haue taken the ſpoile of a Religious houſe there by: but comming thither, and breaking open the doores, and ſearching euery ſecret corner of the houſe, they found therein nothing worth the reckoning of, but ſo returned almoſt emptie handed: for the Prieſts had for feare of them before carried away with them all the beſt of their goods and ſubſtance into the beſieged caſtle. And ſo likewiſe the riſe report of their comming to Presburg flying abroad, B almoſt all the Prieſts and Ieſuits in Presburg and the countrey thereabout, leauing their Churches and Colledges, fled with their ſubſtance to Vienna, ſcarcely accounting themſelues ſafe there, vntill that the garriſon of that ſtrong citie was increaſed with a new ſupplie of ſixe hundred good ſouldiers.

And now the Rebels, their number ſtill more and more encreaſing, and hauing ſet all the vpper part of Hungarie on a broile, were beſieging diuers other caſtles and ſtrong places, yet holden for the Emperor; when as Baſta in the meane time, comming from the ſiege of Strigonium, came and with his armie incamped about three miles from Filek. Of whoſe comming the Rebels hearing, and thereupon retyring, he forthwith followed after them toward Budnoc, which caſtle they alſo left, and ſo neere vnto Ramoſambat, the place of their rendez-C uous, gathered together in great number, with an intent to haue giuen Baſta battell. Whereof Baſta hauing knowledge, to ſpare the effuſion of more Chriſtian bloud, by an herauld ſent vnto them in friendly and courteous manner, aduiſed them to change their mindes, and to returne againe vnto their former allegeance. But finding them obſtinately ſet downe in their former purpoſe, for the maintaining of their rebellion, and the giuing of him battell, he marching forward with his armie, with great force charged certaine companies of the Rebels, appointed to keepe the paſſage of Filek; who at the firſt right valiantly receiued the charge, and defended the paſſage, vntill that at length with number oppreſſed, and aboue foure hundred of them ſlaine, they were put to the worſe, and enforced to flee; in which flight, amongſt others there taken priſoners, Blaſe Nemet their captaine was taken alſo, whom Baſta cauſed to D be hanged vp by the heeles, with the enſignes ſet vp about him which he had taken from the Rebels in the late fight; and after he had for a time ſo hung, made him to be taken downe, and his head to be ſtrucke off from his ſhoulders. In this conflict fiftie of Baſta his men were ſlain alſo, and many moe hurt, and amongſt them Collonitz, hurt in his ſhoulder and his foot with a ſmall ſhot.

Blaſe Nemet one of the captains of the rebels taken and put to death.

Baſta after this victorie marching on with his armie, by the way met with certaine other companies of the rebellious Haiducks as he was going to S. Peters, with whom he had many an hot skirmiſh for the ſpace of three dayes together, being by them ſtill put to the worſe, inſomuch that hauing burnt many of his carriages, tents, and other luggage, he was of nothing more carefull, than how well to get out of their hands. Neuertheleſſe ſeeing no other remedie, he with great courage not onely endured the often and fierce aſſaults of his enemies, ſtill more and more encreaſing vpon him, but the fourth day after ſo many vnfortunate skirmiſhes, (being the eight and twentieth of Nouember) putting his men in order of battell, right valiantly againe charged the Rebels: who by reaſon of the darkeneſſe of the weather, it being then a verie thicke miſt, being not able to perceiue where the enemies attempts were moſt to be feared, or what way to turne their owne forces; as men diſmaied, were eaſily by them ouerthrowne and put to flight: whom ſo flying, Baſta with his ſouldiours fiercely purſuing, made of them a great ſlaughter: ſo that in the ſpace of leſſe than three houres, fifteen hundred of them were in this thicke and darke miſt ſlaine, with ſome few alſo of Baſta his ſouldiers, and amongſt them Fredericke Earle of Solmes, and the Countie of Erbach wounded. Vpon the report of which ouerthrow, the Rebels which yet lay at the ſiege of the caſtle of Zipze, in hope there at length to haue taken Belgioſa, forthwith roſe and retyred themſelues to Leuſta. But Baſta after this victorie remoouing to S. Andrewes, and hauing recouered that towne from the Rebels, and thereinto put a new garriſon, and ſo by this meanes ſomewhat daunted and repreſſed the inſolencie of the Haiduckes in thoſe quarters, and being not well able longer to keepe the field with his armie in ſo vnſeaſonable a time of the yeare, and ſo to maintain war as it were both againſt his enemies, and the extremities of nature, ſought by letters to haue reclaimed them of Caſſouia againe vnto their obedience; offering vnto them pardon for all their offences paſt, ſo that they would now at laſt acknowledge their fault, and receiue into their towne a garriſon of the Emperors. To which purpoſe he writ alſo to them of Eperia; in hope that if he might ſo haue gained thoſe two ſtrong townes, to haue in them wintered in ſafetie with his armie. But they of Caſſouia hauing in the citie a ſtrong garriſon of ſix thouſand good ſouldiers, and out of feare to be by Baſta beſieged at that time of the yeare, and withall in hope (if need were) to be by Botſcay relieued, (who was then reported to be fortie thouſand ſtrong) vtterly refuſed to hearken vnto Baſta his motion, for their reconciliation, or at all to ſubmit themſelues againe vnto the Emperor. Which cauſed him with his armie to come neerer vnto the citie, yet ſtill ſeeeking rather by faire meanes to haue perſuaded the citiſens to haue returned vnto their loyaltie, than by force to haue conſtrained them. But finding them obſtinately ſet downe, and by no perſuaſions to be remoued, but with their great ordnance in what they might to trouble his campe, he ſent before, the Countie Hohenloh and Rotuitz, with part of his armie to Eperia, to command them vpon their allegeance to receiue the Emperors ſoldiers into the citie, and to relieue them with ſuch things as they were able: and within a few dayes after, viz. the fifth of December, followed himſelfe with the reſt of his armie. But being come thither, after much talke had with the chiefe men of the Citie, it was at length, contrarie to all mens expectation, agreed, That Baſta aſſuring them of the free exerciſe of their religion, of the good behauiour of the ſoldiers towards them, and to defend them from the iniurie and incurſions of their enemies, they ſhould open their gates vnto the Imperials, and relieue them with what they were able, and ſo as before to continue in their allegeance and obedience vnto the Emperor. Of all which things when Baſta had vpon his faith giuen, aſſured them, they opened their gates and receiued in the ſouldiers: vnto whom (now almoſt dead and ſtarued with hunger) nothing could haue happened more comfortable or welcome. Leuſta, Barbeld, and Zebena, famous townes in thoſe places, following the example of Eperia, ſubmitted themſelues in like manner, and helped Baſta his ſouldiers with reliefe. Thither with great danger came vnto Baſta, Sigefrid Collonitz, a man of great power and authoritie in that part of Hungarie, to confer with him about the appeaſing of theſe troubles: who afterward by his letters vnto the States and the reſt of the Nobilitie of Hungarie, yea and to Botſcay himſelfe, in vaine perſuaded them to lay downe armes, and to returne againe vnto their wonted obedience vnto the Emperour.

There had been hitherto in the Imperial campe great ſcarcitie of victuals and of other neceſſaries, ſo that for want thereof, and for the extremitie of the cold, and other miſeries, it was greatly feared, leſt the campe ſhould haue been broken vp; to the irrepairable loſſe of his Imperial Majeſtie, as the ſtate of things then ſtood in Hungary. For the remedie whereof, thirtie waggons loded with money and cloath were ſent from Vienna, vnder the conduct of Countie Solmes, Colonell Starenberg, the Treaſurer, and others: vnto whom Tanbuſar joyned fifteene hundred Huſſars (Hungarian horſemen ſo called) to ſtrengthen the conuoy againſt the danger which was feared from the Haiducks which lay vpon the way, and who indeed were now roaming about and ſeeking after bootie in euerie corner of the countrey. Which Huſſars being come with the reſt of the conuoy into a thick wood, about two miles from Filek, like enemies ſet vpon the waggoners, whom they ſhould haue conducted, and there made a great ſlaughter of ſuch as were about to reſiſt them; inſomuch that the Countie Sólmes had much ado to ſaue himſelfe, and to get out of their hands, leauing the waggons as a prey vnto the trecherous Huſſars; who now become maſters of them, draue them away to Botſcay the Rebels campe: Tanbuſar their Captaine in vaine purſuing after them (with ſuch of his Huſſars as more faithfull than the reſt, had no hand in that ſo foule a treacherie) and recouering nothing but tenne waggons loaded with cloath, which the traitors had left behinde them, hauing taken the horſes out of them, and put them into the other waggons wherein the mony was, (which was reported to be 130000 florens) with the more ſpeed to bring them vnto Botſcay. Who hauing vpon the ſudden receiued ſo great a ſumme of money, by him not looked for, forthwith diuided the ſame amongſt his ſouldiers, the more to encourage them in their rebellion againſt the Emperour.

The newes of this ſo great a loſſe being quickly ſpred thorow all the Emperours campe, at the firſt filled the ſouldiers with griefe and diſdaine againſt the trecherous Huſſars, but afterwards with wrath and indignation againſt their owne Commanders, as deeming it to haue bin nothing but a falſe report by them deuiſed and giuen out to deceiue them, and to feed them with a vaine hope. Which perſuaſion, though not true, had now ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed their mindes, as that they were about al to haue riſen vp in mutiny, and to haue forſaken the ſeruice, to the vtter perill of their Captains, and endangering of the whole Prouince, now vpon point to haue been for euer loſt. All which miſchiefes Baſta foreſeeing, did firſt what he might with words and faire promiſes to haue appeaſed them; which not ſeruing, he with certaine thouſands of duckats and waggons of cloth taken vp at Leuſta and other townes there by, wiſely contented them, in ſome good meaſure furniſhing the old ſoldiers, before halfe naked, both with money and apparell, the ſouldiers greateſt contentments.

Which mutinie ſo againe appeaſed, the Imperials ſhortly after ſurpriſing a caſtle not farre from Eperia, found therein a great many of Hungarian Gentlemen, whom they carried away with them priſoners, to learne of them what they might concerning the Rebels proceedings, and further deſignes. In the meane time the Haiduckes on the other ſide beſieged the caſtle of Sendra, which they after many aſſaults tooke, and put to the ſword all the garriſon ſouldiers therin; and departing thence, firſt rifled and after burnt the towne of Filek. They alſo took the caſtles of Boluar, Setſchin, Dregell, Burac, Holloc, Blauenſtein, and the ſtrong caſtle of Cabragetia, whither they of Hatwan not long before had carried their great ordnance at ſuch time as they for feare of the Turks, then lying at the ſiege of Strigonium, had abandoned the place: all ſtrong holds in the vpper Hungarie. After the taking of which places, Ferentius Radius, and Charles Iſtuan (Botſcay his neere kinſman) and the chiefe Captains and ringleaders of the rebels, exacted contribution money of the minerall townes (as they call them) belonging vnto the Emperor in the vpper Hungarie; but eſpecially of the city of Newſoll, enforcing them alſo to ſweare to be in all things obedient to Botſcay, and to take his part againſt the Imperials, threatning with fire and ſword to infeſt ſuch places as ſhould refuſe to do the like. And to the intent that they ſhould not by Collonitz be encouraged or defended, who to that end was comming thither, the Rebels in great number went to meet him, and hauing belayed all the paſſages, enforced him to retire himſelfe vnto his caſtle of Libentſia; where he lying in great danger with his wife then in child-bed, accompanied but with 50 German ſouldiers only, for that he durſt not to truſt his Hungarian Coſſackes, now in heart altogether enclining vnto the Rebels, was glad in poſt to ſend to Vienna, moſt humbly requeſting to haue a new ſupply of German ſouldiers ſent vnto him for his reliefe, and the furtherance of the Emperors ſeruice, in that ſo dangerous a time and wauering eſtate of that countrey, being the beſt part of that the Emperour then held in Hungarie.

Diuers places taken by the Haiduckes.

Collonitz prayeth aid from Vienna.

Now while Baſta thus lay with his armie at Eperia and in the countrey thereabout, he dayly receiued great harme from the Haiduckes, who were ſtill houering about him, as Hawkes ouer their prey; his ſouldiers, by neceſſitie enforced to fetch in wood, and other things neceſſarie into the campe, being ſtill moſt miſerably ſlaine and cut in pieces; yea, they were ſo bold, as oftentimes to trouble him in his campe, and to aſſayle his ſouldiers where they lay quartered in their trenches; as amongſt other times, they did in the latter end of December to end the yere withall: at which time they by night breaking into the quarter where Charles Collonitz, with Copell and Pettenger, two Captaines of Auſtria, with their companies lay, they ſlew the ſaid Copell, with almoſt all his ſouldiers, and burnt Pettinger in his tent, Collonitz himſelfe beeing at the ſame time in great danger, and hardly by them beſet alſo; vntill that encouraging his men, by performing all the parts both of a good Captaine and valiant ſouldier, hee by true valour enforced them at length to retyre backe againe into the woods, from whence they came, hauing in this conflict ſlaine foureteene of them with his owne hand.

About this time was a ſpie taken in the Imperiall campe, one of Botſcay his chiefe men, diſcouered by one comming from Caſſouia to Eperia which knew him: who by Baſta his commandement apprehended, and vpon torture examined, and confeſſing what he had done, was for his good ſeruice hanged and afterward quartered, to the terrour of others attempting the like.

The euill ſucceſſe of Cicala Baſſa againſt the Perſians.

The effect of the embaſſage of the Perſian king vnto the Emperour.

The Turks this yeare were not much fortunat in their warres: Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa and their Generall againſt the Chriſtians in Hungarie hauing in vaine (as is before declared) beſieged Strigonium, and with all his forces done nothing worth the remembrance; and Cicala Baſſa their other Generall againſt the Perſians in the Eaſt beeing with all his great power by the Perſian King ouerthrowne and put to flight, and the citie of Babylon now called Bagdat taken: and was firſt at Prague the two and twentieth of October reported by the Secretarie of the Vayuod of Valachia, ſent thither in embaſſage from his Maſter vnto the Emperour, and afterward confirmed by an Embaſſadour ſent from the Perſian King himſelfe vnto the Emperour; who hauing audience, told his Maieſtie, how that the King his Maſter was not ignorant of the great and difficult warre by him now for many yeares maintained againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, with whome although hee for his part might haue liued in peace and amitie, yet that mooued with the zeale which one Prince ought to haue to the reliefe of another, he had taken vp armes againſt him, ſo to auert ſome part of that heauie warre from his Maieſtie euen vpon himſelfe: and that he had alreadie obtained many great and notable victories and conqueſts againſt him: and recouered a great territorie, wrongfully before taken from the Perſian Kings his predeceſſours by the Turkiſh Sultans: and that now hee was of nothing more deſirous, than to joyne in a perpetuall league and amitie with his Maieſtie, that ſo in a moſt ſtrong confederation combined together, they might neuer afterward be diſſeuered, or euer make peace with the Sultan, without one anothers knowledge and conſent. And further, That for his part hee was minded neuer to giue ouer the warre ſo happily by him begun, vntill hee had driuen him euen into his Imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, ſo that his Maieſtie would on his part doe the like, by continuing of his preſent warres; it beeing not poſſible for the Turke to hold out againſt them both, and the onely meanes to abate his greatneſſe, and to aſſure them in their eſtates: requeſting him withall, to ſend backe with him ſome graue man his Embaſſadour, with ſufficient authoritie and inſtructions to conferre about theſe matters with him; that ſo knowing and vnderſtanding one anothers minde, the league and confederation betwixt them might the more eaſily and commodiouſly bee made and concluded.

Neither were the Turks buſied with theſe forraine warres onely, againſt theſe ſo great and mightie Princes, in places ſo remote and farre off, but vnto theſe were joyned their owne inteſtine and ciuill warres and troubles alſo; the Rebels beeing yet vp in the leſſer Aſia, and the Baſſa's of Aleppo and Damaſco, two of the moſt famous cities in Siria, and both of them men of great place and command, of late vp in armes one of them againſt the other: inſomuch, that they had brought the matter to be tryed by the ſword in the plaine field, where the Baſſa of Aleppo in a great and bloudy battell ouercome, and flying vnto his own citie, was by the Baſſa of Damaſco purſued thither, and ſo ſtraitly by him beſieged with an armie of thirty thouſand men, that in fine hee was glad to reconcile himſelfe vnto him, and to make his peace, by yeelding vnto whatſoeuer the other Baſſa his enemie pleaſed to demand of him; as being thereunto driuen by the extremitie of famine, which then reigned in the citie; as alſo for that he had loſt a great number of his men, whom he had ſent ſecretly out of the citie to ſeeke for victuals, being all ſlaine by the Baſſa of Damaſco his ſouldiers. With which ſo great matters the Baſſaes of the Court (who had the mannaging of the State vnder the young Sultan) were much troubled, he himſelfe (as was fitteſt for his yeres) in the meane time delighting himſelfe with the pleaſures of the Court, and much reioycing at the birth of his firſt begotten ſonne, who was about that time borne.

Ciuill diſcord the ruine of Hungarie.

The reuolution of time had now thus brought this yeare to an end, the troubles of Hungarie and Tranſyluania yet ſtill more and more ſo encreaſing, as if that thoſe moſt miſerable countries had by the juſt and heauie judgements of God beene now appointed vnto their laſt and vtter ruine and deſtruction: the cauſes of their ſo great miſeries proceeding not ſo much from the Turks their enemies, as from the naturall inhabitants themſelues; who in minds diuided both in religion and affection, ſome of them continuing in their allegeance vnto the Emperor, and other ſome following the Enſignes of the Rebell Botſcay, did both vnto themſelues and to their country more harme in a little time, than had the Turks in many yeres before. Of which ſo dangerous a diſſention, and of the harmes thereof inſuing, Belioioſa left by Baſta as his Lieutenant, was reported to haue beene the firſt and chiefe authour: For whereas the yeare

A before the Biſhops and other Clergie men, in an aſſembly of them at Poſſonium, had without the knowledge of the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, publiſhed a decree by them there made, for the burning or perpetuall baniſhing of all ſuch as were of the reformed Religion in Hungarie: and that the States of that Kingdome vnderſtanding thereof, and ſolemnly proteſting againſt the ſame, vnder the Seale of the Lord Palatine, had publiquely affirmed, with juſt armes to defend themſelues, if they ſhould for their religion bee called into queſtion or troubled: and had againe repeated the ſame their proteſtation at Gallet. Yet Belioioſa neuertheleſſe in the meane time by cunning ſeizing vpon the reformed Churches at Caſſouia, would not ſuffer the citiſens of the reformed religion there, to haue any ſermons in their owne priuat houſes, or ſo much as to read on the holy Bible. Neither any whit mooued with the former B proteſtations of the Nobilitie and States, had taken vnto himſelfe all the lands and goods of them of their religion in Caſſouia, not ſuffering them to burie the bodies of their dead within the Citie, neere vnto the Monaſteries. And requeſting to haue borrowed of Botſcay certaine thouſands of crownes, and thereof by him denied, cauſed his ſouldiers to ranſacke two of his caſtles, and to ſpoile him of all the wealth and treaſure he therein had. For which indignities and iniuries Botſcay enraged, cauſed open proclamation to be made, That he would giue vnto euerie Haiducke that would ſerue him, foure crownes a moneth pay, with all the bootie that they could get. Whereupon ſix thouſand Haiduckes, which then ſerued vnder Belioioſa, forthwith reuolted vnto Botſcay, their number encreaſing daily. But after that vnto this extraordinarie pay, Pallas Lippa, his Lieutenant, had alſo ioyned the protection of the C reformed religion, it is wonderfull to ſay, how the Haiduckes by heaps reſorted vnto him, and how the people in all parts of Hungarie generally fauoured him and his quarrell, being in all places whereas he came, ready to ioyne hands with him againſt the Imperials. The Turks and Tartars alſo, both with men and money furthering him in all his doings, whoſe helpe he refuſed not. Whereof proceeded all the aforeſaid miſeries both in Hungarie and Tranſyluania, with many other worſe than they, which together with the beginning of this yeare tooke their beginning and encreaſe alſo. Vnto which ſo great troubles ſtill more and more encreaſing, Baſta not able by force to giue remedie, ſought by lenitie and faire perſuaſions to haue eaſed the ſame: by letters oftentimes aduiſing euen Botſcay the chiefe Rebell himſelf, to change his minde, to lay downe armes, to diſband his forces, and to perſuade with the reſt of his ſe- D ditious followers, to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Emperour, and to returne againe vnto their wonted obedience. Whereunto he at length anſwered, That if the gouernment of all Tranſyluania might be left vnto himſelfe alone: if a naturall Hungarian borne might be ſtill choſen Lieutenant Generall in Hungarie: if none but ſuch as were Hungarians borne ſhould haue the gouernement and command of all the Garriſons in Hungarie: if the Wallon and French ſoldiers might be ſhut out of Hungarie: if the naturall Hungarians borne, might from thenceforth be regarded and prouided of their pay: if it might be lawfull for euery man to haue the free exerciſe of his religion: if the authours of theſe troubles might be deliuered vnto the Hungarians to be puniſhed: if the Emperour himſelfe in perſon ſhould come and be preſent at the parliament at Presburg: if the Germane garriſon ſouldiers ſhould ſtil keepe themſelues within the places whereunto they were appointed, without making of any excurſions into the townes or villages neere vnto them, or hurting of the poore countrie men: he could then be content to come to ſuch a good agreement for peace. With which offer he ſent two of the Rebels, his followers, vnto Baſta, who not liking thereof, returned them backe againe, without concluding of any thing.

Botſcay his vnreaſonable demands for to come to a peace

But while things were thus in talke, ſome of the Haiducks in the meane time with a number of Tartars ioyned vnto them, in ſeeking after bootie, ſurpriſed Gokara, a town ouer againſt Strigonium: where hauing ſlaine certaine Germanes which had the keeping of the place, and rifled the towne, as they were about to haue ſet it on fire, by the comming ouer of the Gouernour of Strigonium, with his garriſon, they were enforced to forſake the place, and againe to retire. This loſſe receiued at Gokara, was againe by our men requited by the taking of Palantwar, a good fortreſſe of the Turkes, after a long and cruell fight taken by Captaine Bathian (Commander of the Imperiall troupes on this ſide of the riuer of Danubius) whereinto a number of the Turkes being retired, were there together with the garriſon ſouldiers all ſlaine, and amongſt them diuers men of great account, who but ſome few dayes before we come thither. Which fortreſſe the Captaine cauſed to be forthwith raſed, becauſe it ſhould no more ſtand the Turks in ſtead for the annoying of the Chriſtians.

Vacia moſt ſhamefully by the Haiducks betrayed, and deliuered vnto the Turkes.

The Turks about this time had a purpoſe to beſiege Vacia, a city not far from Vicegrade on the other ſide of Danubius, a place which ſtill did them great harme, and ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead. The garriſon of which place was part Germans, and part Hungarians, as the reſt of all the garriſons in the Imperial townes of Hungarie were. Of which the Turks purpoſe for the ſiege, the trecherous Haiducks there in garriſon hauing got vnderſtanding, conſpired to deliuer vnto them the place; and yet not ſo contented, to joyne thereunto a treaſon more bloudie and trecherous than was the betraying of the towne: for finding themſelues by farre too ſtrong for the Germans in garriſon in the towne with them, they fell vpon them, fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew moſt part of them, the reſt ſauing themſelues by ſpeedie flight to Strigonium: and ſo afterward, according to their former pretended treaſon, deliuered the towne vnto the Turks, joyning with them and the Tartars, and directing them for the more eaſie ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and the countrey thereabout.

Strigonium in vaine attempted to haue bin ſurpriſed by the Turkes and the Haiducks.

The taking of this citie of Vacia had in ſhort time called together great numbers of the Turks and Tartars out of all places of the realme; who together with the Haiduckes made a great and puiſſant armie, to the terror of the Chriſtians, not then able to hold the field againſt them, and the encouraging of the Turks, thus holpen euen by the Chriſtians themſelues, to the deſtroying of one another. With this army they turned from Vacia to Gokara, with a purpoſe from thence to haue paſſed ouer the Danubius vpon the yce, and to haue ſurpriſed Strigonium. Which exploit they had once before attempted againſt the baſe towne, being then by the Chriſtians repulſed and beaten backe with their great and ſmall ſhot out of the towne, as now they were againe. Howbeit that ſeeing the number of their enemies dayly more and more to encreaſe, they in Strigonium ſtood more in doubt of a ſecond ſiege, than they had done of the firſt, whereof we haue before ſpoken.

The report of theſe ſo great troubles, and of the general reuolt of the diſcontented Haiducks in Hungarie, much troubled and grieued the Chriſtian Emperor: Who both in reſpect of his honour, and of the ſafetie of his eſtate, raiſed what power he might out of his prouinces thereabout, and leuied great ſummes of money from his ſubiects, taking a ducket vpon euery houſe in Auſtria, being then in great feare of theſe miſeries and miſchiefes ſo faſt ſpreading, and ſtill more and more encreaſing and approching that way. Vnto whoſe forces alreadie on foot, had the aid promiſed from the King of Spaine, the Pope, the Princes of Italy and Germanie, with ſix thouſand footmen and two thouſand horſe out of Bohemia, been in time joyned, they might haue made a ſufficient armie vnder the conduct of Baſta the Emperors Lieutent, to haue repreſſed both the attempts of the enemie, and the inſolencie of the rebellious Haiducks. All or moſt part of which aid this yeare failing, and Baſta with his ſmall forces much weakened with wants and the extremitie of Winter, and not able to keepe the field, the enemies ſtill encreaſing both in number and in ſtrength, and without feare of any to encounter them, at their pleaſure roaming vp and downe, began now to draw neere vnto Vicegrade (a good and ſtrong towne of Hungarie ſtanding vpon the ſide of Danubius, about the mid way betwixt Buda and Strigonium) with a purpoſe to haue beſieged the ſame. Of whoſe comming the Germans there in garriſon hearing, and warned by the trecherie of the Haiducks of Vacia, what to feare from the Haiducks in garriſon with them in Vicegrade, betime retyred themſelues out of the towne into the caſtle. In which doing they were well aduiſed, being otherwiſe like enough to haue run the ſame fortune that the Germanes their fellowes before had done at Vacia. For the Turks with the rebellious Haiducks were no ſooner come thither, but that the Haiducks in the towne, without more ado, opened the gates of the towne vnto them, as vnto their friends; directing them in beſt ſort they could both for the beſieging and winning of the caſtle. Which while the Turks hardly beſieged, and the Germans therein notably defended, Haſſan the Viſier Baſſa, together with Begedes Baſſa, to perſuade them to yeeld vp the caſtle, writ vnto them in this ſort.

The towne of Vicegrade by the Haiducks yeelded vnto the Turks.

The Letters of Haſſan the Viſier, and of Begedes Baſſa, vnto the German ſouldiers beſieged in the caſtle Right worthie and valiant friends, it is not to you vnknowne, the Caſtle of Vicegrade of right to belong vnto our moſt mightie and dread Soueraigne, the Great Sultan. And therefore ſeeing that it is reaſon that euerie man ſhould haue that which of right belongeth vnto him; We aduertiſe and request you to yeeld vp the ſame Caſtle vnto our moſt mightie Emperour, and the honourable Lord Stephen Botſcay, Prince of Hungarie; and with all your ſubſtance to depart thence. Promiſing you vpon our faith and honour, to ſuffer you quietly and in ſafetie with your wiues and children, bag and baggage, to depart thence; and to prouide you ſufficient ſhipping for the carrying away of your things to Strigonium. And if it ſhall pleaſe you to take part with vs, wee promiſe you the ſame pay from our Emperour, that you had from your owne; and the ſame kinde entertainement which the Wallons haue before had with vs. But if that you vpon an obſtinate reſolution ſhall refuſe this our friendly motion and grace offered you, blame vs not, if we ſhall by ſtrong hand and force of armes ſeeke to obtaine our right. In kindeneſſe we offer you our friendſhip, and ſo with ſpeed expect your anſwer.

But the Germanes hearkening not vnto theſe letters, as men reſolued, valiantly ſtood vpon the defence of themſelues, and of the place, vntill that by extreame neceſſity forced thereunto, they yeelded the ſame by compoſition.

Baſta in the meane time with his forces much diminiſhed, lying at Eperia, and in the countrey thereabout, ſeeing the generall reuolt of the Haiducks, of late the Emperours greateſt ſtrength in Hungarie, and Botſcay the Rebels ſtrength dayly to encreaſe more and more, with no poſſibility for himſelf with ſuch ſmal forces as he then had, to repreſſe the Rebels inſolency, or to remedie theſe ſo far ſpreading euils, but for want of greater ſtrength he muſt lie ſtil as it were a man beſieged, was therewith exceedingly grieued, and as it were almoſt ouerwhelmed with the heauie burthen of ſo many great miſeries at once beſetting him. To threaten without power hee knew to be but folly; and to ſpeake faire, to be but vaine. Neuertheleſſe hauing procured from the Emperour a generall pardon for all ſuch as hauing taken part with the Rebels, were willing to returne againe to their alleageance: hee to aſſure all them whom it might concerne, of the Emperours gracious fauour, and to put them all out of feare, cauſed letters of generall pardon to bee publiſhed, for all men to take knowledge of: the purport whereof was this.

Baſta perplexed publiſheth a generall pardon vnto the rebels.

Wee George Baſta Countie of Huſt and Marmar, Lord of Sult, Knight, Counſellour to his Imperiall Maieſtie, Gouernour of the Realme of Tranſyluania, and Lieutenant of the Chriſtian armies of the Emperour, to all Faithfull, loue and greeting. Whereas in this ſo troubleſome a ſtate of things, ſome as well of the Nobilitie as others, in theſe vpper parts of Hungarie, partly of their owne accord, and partly for feare, haue reuolted from his Imperiall Maieſtie, and taken part with the traiterous Haiduckes in their rebellion, to the great preiudice of the Emperour his ſeruice, and the ſtaining of their faith: Wee in the name of his Imperiall and Royall Maieſtie, whome we know to be greatly enclined, and readie to pardon his ſubiects euen of his owne naturall goodneſſe and clementie, haue by vertue of the full power and authoritie, by his ſaid Imperiall Maieſtie granted vnto vs, giuen free grace and pardon to all them which haue withdrawne themſelues from his obeiſance, or forſaken the ſame, of what order, qualitie, or condition ſoeuer they be, whome wee will receiue into our protection, as void of all crime: and requeſt them, as much as in vs is poſsible, to make their profit of this grace, and to returne vnto their former duty and obeyſance, vnder all aſſurance of impunitie for their forepaſſed faults; and without any ſearch or inquirie to be of the ſame hereafter made, as well for matters of religion, as of State: aſſuring them of their liues, goods, fortunes, dignities, franchiſes, priuiledges, and immunities whatſoeuer, as is more at large declared by his Maieſties letters patents which remaine with vs. And if any letted either with their vrgent affaires, or with ſickneſſe, cannot repaire vnto vs within the day in the ſame letters patents nominated, we will accept of their iuſt excuſes. But if any contrarie to our hope, ſhall vpon any indurat minde, or obſtinat contumacie, faile to repent, and to make their appearance before vs within the day limited, wee denounce them to bee Rebels, ſubiect vnto the paine of rebellion, and ſtained with the note of infamie: pronouncing their liues, their goods, and dignities to be confiſcat and deuolued vnto the Emperour his cofers: for which they ſhall by vs the Chiefetaines, and Captaines of his armies, with all rigour and extreamitie be proſecuted. Proteſting before the Maieſtie of God, before the Maieſtie of the Emperour, and before all Chriſtendome, vs not to be in any ſort culpable of the euills, calamities, and miſeries, which ſhall enſue of the warres and diſaſters which ſuch their rebellion ſhall cauſe: but to be therefrom exempt and acquited, the onely authors of theſe diſorders hauing deſerued theſe imprecations and calamities: vpon the heads of whom wee iuſt-

ly from henceforth lay them, as vpon the miſerable authors thereof, by their wickedneſſe hauing refuſed ſo great grace from the Emperour and vs ; vnto all men made knowne by theſe Preſents.

Baſta his proclamation little regarded.

This Proclamation ſolemnely by Baſta publiſhed with the ſound of man y Drummes and Trumpets, the ſixteenth of Ianuarie, and ten dayes libertie giuen for ſuch as would to come in, and againe ſubmit themſelues ; diuers Gentlemen of the Countrey neere vnto Eperia, where Baſta with his armie lay, for feare of being ſpoiled came in,and accepted of the grace offered : other of the ſeditious,dwelling farther off,little or nothing at all regarding the ſame. Inſomuch, that the Rebels in number daily increaſing, and the rebellion ſtill farther and farther ſpreading, Botſcay was now growne ſo ſtrong, that hee diſmiſſed from him moſt part of the Turkes, whoſe ſeruice hee had in all theſe troubles hitherto vſed ; reſeruing yet certaine Ianizaries, whome he mingled with the garriſon of Haiduckes, which he had put into Caſſouia.

Pallas Lippa before by Botſcay taken priſoner, and vpon his reuolt from the Emperour,by Botſcay made his Lieutenant Generall, and a great man amongſt the Rebels (as is before declared) was now of many thought to be a moſt fortunat and happie man. But in the middeſt of ſuch his happineſſe,and the greatneſſe of his command, he was by the malice of ſome, enuying at his eſtate, accuſed to Botſcay, as if he had had a purpoſe to haue made him away ; and deliuering the ſtrong citie of Caſſouia vnto Baſta, to haue gone ouer againe vnto the Emperor,and to haue followed his Enſignes. Vpon which ſuſpition he was by the commandement of Botſcay beheaded, with fiue other men moe, of good place, ſuſpected to haue beene partakers of the conſpiracie with Lippa.In whoſe treaſure,after that he was executed,were found an hundred thouſand Hungarian duckats,with ſeuen hundred chains of gold;all which he had ſcraped together in that ſmall time wherein he had been Botſcay his Lieutenant amongſt the Rebels. With which mony Botſcay in his rebellion confirmed,became therein more obſtinat and furious than before ; not admitting any talke with Baſta,concerning peace, but vpon ſuch vnreaſonable conditions, as beſt ſtood with his owne good liking.

The caſtle of Sacmar yeelded to the Haiducks

Tokay in vaine attempted to haue beene ſurpriſed by the Haiduckes.

Now long and tedious it were to proſecute euery particular exploit, with the diuers wofull euents thereof, during this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion in Hungarie ; which how heauie ſo euer they were for the poore Chriſtians there dwelling, to endure, as tending all to the ruine and deſtruction both of themſelues and of their Countrey (ſometime one of the moſt flouriſhing Kingdomes of Chriſtendome, but now become as it were a large Theatre, for all the World to behold moſt wofull tragedies, and bloudie maſſacres acted in) yet for all that vnto ſome nothing is pleaſing, but what is written of the greateſt actions ; as of great and bloudie battels,of the conqueſts of whole Kingdomes,and the ruine of moſt mightie and famous Princes ; all other things elſe being vnto them tedious. In ſome part to eaſe them of ſuch wearineſſe,and to pleaſe their appetites, I will briefly paſſe ouer,and euen lightly touch ſuch things as for the moſt part of this yere paſſed in this troubleſome country, not ſtaying but vpon matters of greateſt weight and importance. The Haiduckes ſtill proceeding in their rebellion,in the beginning of Februarie beſieged the Caſtle of Sacmar,a place verie fit for their purpoſe : which Caſtle the ſouldiers there in gtrriſon doubting to be able to hold againſt them (being not paſt threeſcore ſound men left in it) and deſtitute alſo of their neceſſarie prouiſion, couenanting to haue their liues ſpared, at length yeelded vnto them. But in going thence, meeting with certaine other companies of Haiduckes neere vnto Tokay, they were by them moſt part of them ſlaine, ſome few of them by ſpeedie flight eſcaping. The ſame Haiduckes which had taken Sacmar, immediatly after attempted to haue ſurpriſed the towne and caſtle of Tokay alſo : But the Gouernour of the place in good time aduertiſed of their intent and purpoſe, cauſed the yce wherewith the riuer was hard froſen, to be broken fortie paces ouer,neere vnto the caſtle, and the ſame to be lightly couered ouer with ſtraw. Whither the Haiducks comming by night, and finding the yce on the other ſide, the riuer, whereunto they firſt came, ſtrong enough to beare them, by heapes thruſting one another forward,to haue ſcaled the caſtle, the yce breaking vnder them, they there together by heapes moſt miſerably periſhed, many of the reſt which eſcaped that danger, being with ſhot out of the caſtle ſlaine alſo. In this caſtle was no great ſtore of victuals : whereof Baſta vnderſtanding,with his armie marched from Eperia toward Bodac, a towne holden by the Rebels, in hope with the ſpoile thereof to haue relieued Tokay. But the Rebels hearing of his comming, hauing themſelues burnt the town, had got themſelues with that they had, into the caſtle, and from thence with their great ordnance ſo welcomed Baſta at his comming, that diſappointed of his purpoſe, and hauing loſt ſome of his men, he was glad with all ſpeed (not hauing ſtayed aboue foure houres) to returne againe to Eperia: certaine of the nobilitie of that country, which tooke part with the Rebels, being reported, in his abſence, to haue made a road towards Eperia, to the endangering of that citie. In which his return towards Eperia, the troups of Countie Turon, and of Charles Collonitz, by chance lighting vpon 500 Haiducks in a country village, ſet the ſame on fire, and therein burnt moſt of the ſaid Rebels, and ſlew the reſt of them that remained, in ſeeking by flight to haue ſaued themſelues.

In the meane time one of the great men amongſt the Turkes came to Caſſouia, bringing with him a great ſum of money, which being diuided amongſt the Rebels there, much confirmed them, both in their rebellion, and deuotion toward the Turks; which rebellion they ſpared not for any coſt by all meanes to maintaine, as more preuailing thereby, than by the greateſt forces they could vſe for the conquering of Hungarie.

Baſta his ſoldiers in mutinie for their pay.

But Baſta was no ſooner with his army returned againe to Eperia, but that the ſouldiers generally exclaiming, and calling vpon him for their pay, were about in a mutinie to haue forſaken him. For the appeaſing of which tumult, he was glad preſently to make what ſhift he could for money, wherewith hee in ſome meaſure gaue them contentment, and ſo with much adoe, agreed with them for ſix weekes ſeruice longer: thereby deliuering the citiſens of Eperia from a great feare, wherein they were, for being ſpoiled by thoſe mutinous ſoldiers, of whom they ſtood in no leſſe doubt than they did of their enemies.

Newſol ſurpriſed by the Haiducks, and again recouered from them.

And now the ſeditious Haiducks after their wonted manner ſtill roaming vp and down the vpper part of Hungarie, the ſecond day of march, about ſeuen of the clocke in the morning came to Newſoll, a faire in that countrey, and there by many reaſons perſuading the citiſens to reuolt, and to take part with them, had parley with them vntill it was full twelue of the clocke; but drawing ſtill neerer and neerer vnto the towne. Inſomuch that Turbelius Gouernor of the place, perceiuing a yeelding inclination in the citiſens, and doubting without their helpe to be able to defend ſo great a citie againſt the Haiducks, with ſo weake a garriſon as he then had therein, he with his Coſſackes, for his more ſafetie retired himſelfe into the Caſtle. Which done, the Haiduckes forthwith breaking into the citie with ſix companies, ſummoned the caſtle, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto them. Of whom Turbelius ſlew diuers with ſhot out of the Caſtle: and the ſame day in the euening couragiouſly ſallying out of the Caſtle, with certaine companies of harquebuſiers, draue the Haiducks againe out of the Citie; which he afterward better fortified againſt their like attempts. And the next day vnderſtanding by a countreyman, That certaine companies of Haiduckes and Turkes together, were comming to Turtzo, a town not far off, carrying with with them a great number of cattel, women and children, which they had got out of the countrey townes and villages thereabout: hee preſently ſent forth his Lieutenant againſt them, with his Coſſackes (a deſperat kinde of horſemen) who meeting with theſe Haiducks and Turks, ſlew of them about 150, and recouered from them all the captiues, the cattell, with 200 horſes, and a mule loaded with 4000 Hungarian duckats.

Now had Filek (a moſt beautifull caſtle, and as it were the key of that part of the vpper Hungarie, which the Chriſtian Emperour yet held againſt the Turkes) for certaine moneths been hardly beſieged by the Haiduckes: which although it was ſo well ſtored with victuals, and other neceſſarie prouiſion, as that it might haue holden out three months longer ſiege, yet the ſouldiers there in garriſon, for want of water were enforced now at length to yeeld the ſame. For the keeping of which caſtle Redeius Ferentſius, captaine of the Haiducks which had woon it, placed therein a garriſon, part Haiducks, part Turks: as not daring to truſt either of them alone; the Haiducks for feare of their trecherie; nor the Turks, for that he knew them to be deſirous of the place, for the commodious ſcituation thereof, as giuing them a way to enter farther into the territories of the Chriſtians: which Redeius, though a Rebell, would not yet in any ſort grant them.

This caſtle of Filek ſo (as is before ſaid) beſieged, the valiant Collonitz had oftentimes in vaine ſought to haue relieued; all the waies being ſo beſet, and as it were, fortified with the infinit number of the Turks, Tartars, and Rebels, as that there was no comming vnto it: and moſt part of his owne ſouldiers being Haiducks alſo, to whom he durſt not well truſt, for feare of being betraied by them. Concerning which matters, he ſhortly after writing to a certaine nobleman, after that he had ſhewed vnto him, That he deſired nothing more of the Emperor, than to be diſcharged of his ſeruice, he thus breaketh forth.

I cannot (ſaith hee) any more performe faithfull ſeruice vnto the Emperour: for being attended vpon with verie traitours, I am enforced to hazard euen mine honeſt reputation. I would willingly ſerue with Germane horſemen; and I could alſo wiſh, three thouſand Coſſackes, and two thouſand Polonian Huſſars to bee againe raiſed, who would doe notable ſeruice in purſuing of the enemie: but euerie moneth they muſt needes haue their wages payed them. The number of the enemie encreaſeth daylie; and their ſtrength ſtill more and more: ſo that things cannot be in worſe ſtate than now they are. All deuices are directed to the hurt of the Emperour: neither is there any place quiet. What courage am I of, which haue loſt all my wealth and ſubſtance, is eaſie for any man to iudge: all which, for all that, I could conceale, and diſſemble, ſo that I might faithfully, and according to my deſire, ſerue the Emperour: which for all that is not poſſible for mee to doe without a ſufficient ſtrength of Germane ſouldiers. But this of all doth moſt comfort mee, for that I know mee to haue done my duetie: for otherwiſe this miſchiefe had ſpread farther. Many were in hope that I would rather haue reuolted from the Emperor, than haue loſt my goods: and ſome there were which doubted not to ſay ſo of mee. The enemies are now in my Dukedome of Cleue, and there made ſpoile of all. Setchin, Iarmeta, Tregla, Palanka, Samoſchin, Blauenſtein, Rabenſtein, Vacia, Regiomont, Dillena, Pugantſa, Tabra, Libetna, Sitna, Dibina, Sacmaria, Sendra, Onoth, Diſgiora, Zatnar, Calo, Scharoſpotac, Budnoc, Nagibana, Filek, and almoſt all Tranſyluania, are now ſubiect to the Rebels: So that what will enſue thereof, except they ſpeedily bee confronted, euerie man may right eaſily gueſſe.

Strong townes and places by the Turkes and rebels taken in the vpper Hungarie.

Now if Collonitz one of the greateſt and beſt Commaunders of the Emperours forces againſt the Turkes in Hungarie, was thus beſet, and ſpoyled of his ſubſtance, by the rebels, as he in theſe his letters complayneth, and as indeed he was, hauing at one time receiued from them ſo great harme, as was deemed to haue amounted to an hundred thouſand Duckats; and not daring to truſt his owne Hungarian ſouldiers, whoſe hearts hee knew to be with the Rebels: In what ſtate may the reſt of the people of that diſtreſſed Prouince, be thought to haue beene, beeing at the ſame time expoſed vnto the ſame Rebels as a prey and ſpoyle, and their countrey layed open for the Turkes and Tartars to forrage and ouerrunne at their pleaſure.

Wiglaſe in vain attempted to haue been ſurpriſed by the Haiduckes.

But in briefe, to run along with the Haiduckes, foure thouſand of them attempting to haue ſurpriſed Wiglaſe, were ſo from thence repulſed, as that many of them being there ſlaine, fiue and thirtie wagons were ſcarce ſufficient to carry the reſt of the wounded ouer the mountains, of whom an hundred died by the way. But going from thence, they brake into Turſon his countrey: where they hauing rifled all the townes and villages, commanded all the States of the countrey, within three daies next after, to ſubmit themſelues to Botſcay, and to ſweare vnto him fealty; or otherwiſe to expect all extremities: who with feare diſmaied, all promiſed to ſubmit themſelues vnto Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant.

Botſcay refuſeth to receiue the Emperours Embaſſadours.

Now for remedie of theſe euils, Napragius and Forgatius, two graue counſellors, were ſent in the Emperours name, to entreat of peace with Botſcay: who the ſeuen and twentieth of March departing from Eperia, with foureſcore harquebuſiers towards Caſſouia, before they came thither, ſent before them an herauld, to aduertiſe Botſcay of their comming. Which meſſenger, ſo ſoone as hee was come into Caſſouia, the Turkes ſo ſtraitly kept, as that no man might ſpeake with him but Botſcay himſelfe; and not he alſo, but in open place, and that in the hearing of the Turkes. Who at his firſt meeting with him, told him, That if the Embaſſadours from whome he came, were ſent from the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, they ſhould bee right welcome vnto him, and haue audience: but if they came from the Emperour, as had Rogatſius and Ciaccius before ſent from Baſta, they ſhould then ſpare their labour, and come no farther: for that all matters had with him beene often enough talked vpon; it beeing now more than time, that things ſo often conſulted vpon, ſhould bee no more talked of, but indeed performed. Which meſſenger returning vnto the Embaſſadours, told them what Botſcay had ſaid, and that the Haiducks had in Caſſouia built a bulwarke of a wonderfull height, beſet the gates with ſtrong guards, and ſo filled the trenches with ſouldiours, that a man could hardly enter into the citie; howbeit that euery man might ſafely come and go thither about his trade and buſineſſe. He told them alſo, how that Botſcay his Lieutenant had called together all the gouernors of the places thereabout, and aduiſed them for the ſpace of fourteene dayes to beware of the excurſions of the Haiducks, and in the mean time, for their more ſafetie, to bring their wiues and children, with ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, into the citie, for that he could not as yet (as he ſaid) repreſſe the vnruly and headſtrong Haiducks, being yet in their rage and furie, as the manner of the diſcontented multitude is. Of which Haiducks, ſome going forth toward Newhuſe, and bringing home a great booty of cattell, were by Collonitz and Trautmanſtorf, purſuing them with their horſemen, ouerthrowne, and all the bootie againe recouered.

Botſcay about this time, viz. the nine and twentieth day of March, ſummoned all the Nobilitie and States of Hungary vnto an aſſemblie to be holden at Serentium the ſeuenteenth day of Aprill, writing vnto them in this ſort:

Botſcay his letters to the Nobilitie & ſtates of Hungarie, to call them together to Serents.

You know (ſaid he) right worthie and valiant men, into what extreame miſeries our afflicted countrey (all the antient priuiledges and immunities thereof being contemned and troden vnder foot) is by the comming in of ſtrangers brought: whoſe inſolencie is gone ſo farre, that we cannot only not quietly poſſeſſe our owne goods, but ſo much as enioy the libertie of our owne conſciences. For which cauſe the Nobilitie of the whole kingdome being the laſt yeare ſent in embaſſie, and as it were foreſeeing what was to come; the aſſemblie of the Empire being ended, openly proteſted before the whole Imperial Dyet, and by their letters oftentimes declared, that they ſhould of neceſſitie be at length enforced to take vpon themſelues the defence of their priuiledges and of their Religion: by which their proteſtation for all that, they ſo little preuailed, that forthwith after, ſuch an intollerable Edict was by the Emperours commandement publiſhed, as had expoſed vs all and euery one of vs to moſt certaine death, had we not betime prouided for our ſelues. All which things are vnto you all moſt certainly knowne, both by the vnlawfull Acts themſelues, and the whole proceeding of the Prouoſt General. All which things conſidered, you met together at Galeſt, and from thence againe openly ſignified vnto the aforeſaid Prouoſt General (vnto whom his Imperial Maieſtie had committed the ſhedding of our bloud, the aboliſhing of our priuiledges and Religion, viz. the execution of this cruel Edict) that if he proceeded to go forward in that buſineſſe, you would put into execution what you had before publiquely proteſted, in the general aſſemblie of the whole Empire at Presburg. But what anſwer you receiued from him, foraſmuch as it is not vnto any of you vnknowne, it is not needfull here to rehearſe. Wherefore when as he going about the execution of the aforeſaid Edict, did in forcible manner with certaine pieces of great ordnance impugne the Armie of his Imperial Majeſtie, both in his and our dread Lord and Soueraigne, and by force tooke from vs ſome of our caſtles, and beſieged ſome others; we found no other remedie againſt theſe ſo great euils, but that which God himſelfe euen then ſhewed vnto vs, which was, by force of armes to defend our ſelues ſo far as we might. In which our purpoſe ſeeing that the grace of God, and the good ſucceſſe which we haue hitherto had, will vs to continue, although we haue ſuffered no little harme from the Germanes and Haiducks (which for all that, is for the recouerie of the libertie of our countrey, patiently to be borne) to the intent that we vnited with other our brethren through Hungarie, may the better withſtand our enemies, and fight againſt them; it is moſt neceſſarie that we ſhould meet together, and all matters ſet apart, enter into conſultation, how hereafter to reſiſt our enemies, and ſet our countrey in peace and quietneſſe. Wherefore ſeeing that we haue determined to hold an aſſemblie at Serents the 17 day of Aprill, wee by theſe Preſents warn and requeſt you al, there at the aforeſaid 17 day of April to make your perſonal appearance, to ioyn in amity with vs, and after Gods name called vpo, to conſult and conclude vpon ſuch things as may be both acceptable and pleaſing vnto God, and moſt profitable and neceſſarie for the good of our afflicted countrey in general. But if there ſhall be any which vpon a preſumptuous or careleſſe contempt ſhall not at the time appointed come, nor ſeeme to regard ſuch things as ſo much concerne the common good and welfare of their natiue Countrey; let them aſſuredly know, both themſelues to be therefore to be accounted for enemies vnto their Countrey, and their goods alſo ſo to be diſpoſed of, as ſhall vnto the Nobilitie and States then and there aſſembled, be thought meet and conuenient.

Much about this time a great tumult was raiſed amongſt the Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the Court at Conſtantinople, at which time a great fire aroſe alſo in the Citie (as oft times the like hath before done through the inſolencie of the Ianizaries, who in ſuch confuſion of mens mindes vſe to make their owne gaines) wherein many both men and women periſhed, with aboue fiue hundred ſhops and ware-houſes full of rich merchandiſe, moſt part whereof belonged vnto the Iewes; of whom almoſt two hundred are ſaid to haue bin there burnt: the deformitie and ſpoile made by which fire in the citie, remaining euen yet to be ſeene. Theſe troubles brought a great feare vpon the young Sultan, who firſt therewith halfe diſmaied, and ſeeing the like to ariſe in Pera alſo on the other ſide of the hauen, about a mile off from the Seraglio, could not otherwiſe thinke, but that the ſouldiours were about ſome dangerous treaſon. Which ſuſpition two meſſengers but a little before come from Cicala Baſſa, encreaſed; who by the ſame meſſengers deſired new ſupplies to be forthwith ſent vnto him; proteſting, that for as much as he had not long before, in a great battell loſt a number of his men, if he were not with new ſupplies ſpeedily relieued, he muſt of force retyre, and leaue all vnto the Perſian. Howbeit the fire quenched, and the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers with the ſpoile they had of the loſſes of others gotten, ſatisfied, the tumult was without much ado againe quieted.

The Emperours ſoldiers in mutinie for their pay, threaten their Generall, and ſpoyle the Countrey betwixt Eperia and Preſburg.

Now beſide the aforeſaid troubles from the Rebels in Tranſyluania and the vpper Hungarie, that nothing might be wanting vnto the miſerie of thoſe ſo miſerable Countries, the Emperors ſouldiers which ſerued vnder Baſta, hauing of long from day to day in vaine expected their pay, and ſeeing neither pay nor other reliefe to come vnto them, roſe vp in mutinie, and ſo in a great rage brake into Baſta the Generall his lodging, where hauing heaped vpon him many vnworthie and deſpightfull reproches, with their Pieces bent againſt him, and taking the ſpoyle of certain carriages loded with many rich commodities, they departed from him, and ſo marching thorow the countrey toward Preſburg, by the way vſed ſuch inſolencie and crueltie, by rifling and ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, as that they ſeemed vnto the people as they went, worſe and more inhumane than the very Turks and Tartars themſelues: where amongſt other the prey by them taken, which were verie great, they carried away with them toward Preſburg aboue ten thouſand oxen and two thouſand horſes; threatening by the way as they went, to burne the ſuburbs of the citie ſo ſoon as they came thither, if they were not forthwith payed their pay: whereupon many of the Citiſens for feare forſooke their dwellings, and remooued to Vienna.

Newſoll taken by the Haiduks

But the Rebels on the other ſide hauing (as is before declared) in vaine attempted to haue taken Newſoll, being forthwith driuen out of it againe, aſſembling themſelues in great number, came now againe and beſieged it, and the ſixteenth day of Aprill tooke it, to the great and incomparable loſſe of the citiſens: other of their fellowes in other places hauing but the day before taken Cibinium, Portfeld, Schemnitſe, with ſome other places alſo.

The miſerable eſtate of Hungary through ciuil diſcord.

Thus while the Haiduckes at their pleaſure on the one ſide ſpoile the vpper part of Hungarie, and the Emperours ſouldiers on the other ſide for want of pay do therein no leſſe harme than they, as enemies rifling and ranſacking euery corner of the countrey as they went, the poore husbandmen dwelling here and there, diſperſed abroad in the countrey, for feare leauing their homely dwellings with ſuch things as they had, fled ſome of them into Polonia, other ſome into the mountaines, where many of them periſhed with hunger; the poore husbandman not daring now to go forth to till his land, neither the ſheepheard to feed his flocke, all places being filled with miſerie, mourning, and heauineſſe; the Turkes and Tartars, the common enemies of the Chriſtians, being not the cauſers thereof, but euen the Chriſtians themſelues, one of them euen with greedineſſe ſeeking the ruine and deſtruction of another; as commonly it falleth out in kingdomes and States diuided.

Morauia ſpoyled by the rebel Bous Haiduks.

Neither did theſe ſo great troubles, the ground of ſo many miſeries, containe themſelues within the bounds of Hungarie onely, but brake out into other countries and prouinces thereunto adjoyning alſo; but eſpecially into Morauia, into which Countrey the Haiduckes breaking, miſerably ſpoyled the ſame, by force tooke certaine townes, which they robbed and rifled, carrying away with them euen the verie little children, taken from their heauie parents, to be ſould afterwards vnto the Turks: a miſerable kind of merchandiſe, and of all Chriſtians to be deteſted. For remedie of which miſchiefes, by ſufferance ſtill more and more encreaſing, Lichtenſtein Gouernor of the country hauing raiſed all the power that he was able for to make, went againſt them, and with much ado at length draue them out of the countrey, with fire and ſword now by them moſt grieuouſly ſpoiled: they for all that carrying away with them a great part of the wealth of that countrey, with foure thouſand captiues, all by them appointed vnto the Turks ſlauerie.

About this time alſo Baſta lying at Presburg, and vnderſtanding that fourteene thouſand Turks and Tartars being come to S. Georges, ſix thouſand of them were gon ouer the Danubius, about a mile beneath Presburg, to the end that whileſt they were making a road into Auſtria, the reſt in the meane time might proue their forces vpon Presburg; with his horſemen followed after them himſelfe, to cut off ſuch ſtragling companies of them, as otherwiſe might haue done great harme abroad in the countrey, leauing behinde him in Presburg but three hundred Wallon horſemen, with certaine companies of footmen for the keeping of the citie. Which three hundred horſemen being verie good and expert ſouldiers, and deſirous to be doing ſomething, by night made a road out of the citie, toward S. Georges, where the reſt of the Haiducks and Turks in great ſecuritie lay; vpon whom theſe reſolute men vpon the ſudden falling, brought a great feare vpon the whole campe, and hauing ſlaine of them aboue fiue hundred before the reſt could arme themſelues, returned with a great victorie, though but with ſmall prey, carrying with them ſome few horſes of ſeruice to Presburg: where by that they had done it was reaſonably thought, that had they been but a thouſand ſtrong, they had diſcomfited the enemies whole campe.

In the meane time they of the garriſon of Comora vnderſtanding that Begedes Baſſa was determined with a notable conuoy to go from Buda with ſeuenteene waggons loaded with money and other things of great value, to Botſcay the Rebell and the Tartar Cham his ſonne, who with certaine thouſands of Tartars was come to Solnok, to the aid of Botſcay and the Rebels: they in hope of ſo great a bootie lay in wait for him vpon the way whereby hee muſt needs paſſe, and at his comming ſet vpon him, and ſlew a number of his men; amongſt whom it fortuned the Baſſa himſelfe to be ſlaine, ſhot in the breaſt with a ſmall ſhot whileſt hee was mounting vp his horſe: whoſe dead bodie the Turks about him hauing taken vp, and therewith about to flee, were there ſome of them ſlaine, and ſome of them taken priſoners, the reſt by ſpeedie flight eſcaping. Here were alſo all the aforeſaid waggons taken, with an exceeding rich bootie; all which the garriſon ſouldiers, well worthie thereof, carried away with them to Comora, together with the Baſſa's head, ſtrucke from his bodie with his owne ſcimitar: which ſcimitar, with the Baſſa's rich coat, Pogranus the gouernor of Comora afterward ſent as a Preſent to the Emperor at Prague. This Baſſa while he liued was a moſt craftie and ſubtil man, the chiefe plotter and author of all the late troubles in Hungary, hauing before put all Tranſyluania into moſt dangerous ſtirs and tumults, & greatly confirmed Botſcay in his rebellion: he ſpake the Hungarian language naturally, and was therein verie eloquent, which ſerued him to great purpoſe both for the raiſing and maintaining of the rebellion both in Tranſyluania and in Hungarie. Which ſo dangerous a man taken out of the way, many were in good hope of ſome good end to be made of theſe ciuile warres, more dangerous vnto the ſtate of both theſe afflicted Countreys, than were the great and puiſſant armies of the Turks, which were almoſt euerie yeare in the heart of the one or of the other of them to bee ſeene.

Begedes Baſſa ſlaine.

Now was the rebellion growne ſo great in Hungarie, and the Rebels ſo ſtrong, that euen the verie name of the Germans was become vnto the Hungarians both odious and contemptible: inſomuch that Baſta offering to haue put new ſupplies of German ſouldiors into the Citie of Tyrna, then in danger of the Haiducks; the Gouernours of the place not onely refuſed to receiue them, but alſo to let them haue any thing of them for their readie money, ſaying, That they had Citiſens ynow in the Citie to defend the ſame againſt their enemies, and that therefore as they needed not of the helpe of the Germanes, ſo they would haue nothing to do with them. And yet as ſoone as Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant, was with his Armie come thither, they without more ado opened vnto him the gates of the citie, and receiuing him in, were about to haue ſlaine all the Germanes there dwelling amongſt them, being well neere a third part of the Inhabitants; and had ſo done, but that ſome wiſer than the reſt, conſidering

The name of the Germanes odious vnto the Hungarians.

The Germans in Tyrna conſtrained to weare garmēts like to the Hungarians.

that the Germans hauing there long dwelt, were by often marriages joyned in affinitie with the Hungarians, and the Hungarians with them, otherwiſe perſuaded them, leſt in ſo doing they might ſeeme to be cruell againſt their owne bloud. And ſo the matter being referred to Redeius himſelfe, it was by him (by the counſel of one of the greateſt men of the Turks) ordered, That the Germans ſhould be ſpared their liues, ſo that from thenceforth they ſhould no more vſe the German but the Hungarian apparell and attire; onely the German attyre being taken away for the Germans themſelues.

But to proceed with theſe troubles according to the courſe of the time and of the yeare, about the twentie fourth of May the Turkes and Tartars joyning their forces with the Rebels, burnt fourteene countrey villages about the lake of Neuſidier, and as many moe in other places alſo towards Neuſtat, leauing behinde them moſt lamentable remembrances and teſtimonies of their barbarous and inhumane crueltie, hauing put moſt of the women and children to the ſword, and impaled diuers vpon ſtakes, carrying the men away with them as captiues, and the beaſts and cattell as a prey; and ſo leauing the countrey as they went almoſt deſolate, ſcarce any being therein left to bewaile the miſeries thereof. And about the end of this ſame moneth the rebels ſurpriſed Simega, Grotta, and Coppernacum, and a little while after, Ginſium: all which places they rifled and ſpoyled, as they did alſo Hogengoa, a great towne of the Lord Lichtenſteins; and Niderſprunga a Towne of Collonitzes, which they firſt rifled, and afterward burnt: and with the terrour of this their dealing enforced all the Countrey thereabout both farre neere to yeeld vnto them; onely Altſoll and Chremnicz, who continued in their loyaltie, and ſtanding faſt for the Emperour, did the Rebels much harme.

About the beginning of Iune certaine companies of Turkes and Haiduckes mingled together, came againe, as they had before done, to Presburg: Of whoſe comming the Gouernor of the citie hauing aduertiſement, with three troupes of Wallon horſemen, and certaine companies of harquebuſiers, breaking out of the Citie, cauſed them forthwith to retyre: which the Wallon horſemen ſeeing, to preuent them in their retreat, fetching a compaſſe about, met with them when they thought themſelues paſt all danger, and falling vpon them, ſlew of them fiue hundred, and draue the reſt into Danubius; ſo that of all thoſe Turks and Haiducks none eſcaped but onely foureteene, amongſt whom three Turkes and one fugitiue Citiſen of Presburg were found, whom together with a great ſpoyle, the garriſon ſoldiers carried backe with them into the citie.

Veſprinium yeelded vnto the Rebels.

At the ſelfe ſame time the Citiſens of Veſprinium fauouring the proceedings of the Haiduckes, roſe themſelues in rebellion alſo, and taking the Captaine of the caſtle, together with his Lieutenant and the keyes of the Caſtle, cauſed them to be carried to Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant; yeelding themſelues into his protection. Of which reuolt of the citie the Turks tooke exceeding pleaſure, and forthwith ſent newes thereof vnto the Sultan, wiſhing him to haſt the comming of his Armie, for that the paſſages were now layed open vnto his further conqueſt; and further aduiſing him ſtill more and more to encourage Botſcay in his rebellion.

Stiria and Auſtria ſpoyled by the Rebels.

And now was Hungarie too little, or els too bare to containe and ſatisfie the ſtill encreaſing Rebels, who in great number breaking into Stiria (as they had before done on the other ſide of Hungarie into Morauia) did therein great harme, waſting and ſpoyling all before them as they went; inſomuch that Countie Serin, the Lord Nadaſti, and Budian, all right worthie men, and ſuch as heretofore had done great things againſt the Turkes, for the Chriſtian Commonweale, ſeeing themſelues and all that they had in danger to be ſpoyled, being themſelues not able to withſtand the Rebels, nor any other ſtay whereon to reſt, ſubmitted themſelues vnto Botſcay, as did many other Noblemen of that Countrey alſo. Out of Stiria the Rebels made head into Auſtria, and there roaming vp and downe the Countrey, did like harme.

Thus was the ſtate of Auſtria and Hungarie at this time moſt miſerable, which for that it is ſo well ſet downe in certaine letters by a graue and vnderſtanding Citiſen of Vienna, who was himſelfe an eye-witneſſe of moſt part thereof, as that it cannot well better be expreſſed; I haue thought it good to refer the report thereof vnto the letters themſelues.

The miſerable troubles of Hungarie and Auſtria notably deſcribed by the letters of a citiſen of Vienna.

All Auſtria (ſaith he) is full of miſerie and calamitie. From out of the Caſtle and Bulwarkes here at Vienna, a man may ſometime at once behold fifteene townes and villages all on fire in the Countrey hereabout, kindled partly by the Rebels and Turkes, and partly by our owne mutinous ſouldiours. Odenburg is yet beſieged, and the Haiducks haue forraged the Countrey as farre Hinberg: whom had not the Regiment of Collonitz repreſſed, theſe our ſuburbs of Vienna had now beene taken, ranſacked, and burnt. Neuſtat is on euery ſide beſieged by the Enemie; all the Villages about Vienna, as farre as Dreſkirc are with fire deſtroyed: they of Newſtat went about to haue cut off ſome part of the Enemies Forces, but with euill ſucceſſe, hauing loſt aboue fiftie of their owne men. Brunna and Entzendorfe are alſo with fire conſumed: The Wallons lye incamped at Miedling, moſt miſerably ſpoiling the countrey People of all that they had: The Haiduckes hauing by night ſurpriſed the great Towne of Altenbourg, and from thence carrying a great prey, haue burnt it: The Caſtle had endured the like fortune, had not an hundred Harquebuſiers, that were by chance come thither holpen to defend it. Sixe thouſand of the enemies lie about Viſſelbourg, but whether the Wallons will attempt any thing againſt them or no, it is greatly doubted. Presburg is alſo in great danger; for the Garriſon ſouldiours there doe threaten the cruell ſpoyle of the Citiſens, and all extremities, if by a certaine day they receiue not their Pay: who if they ſhall depart thence, there is no doubt but that the Haiduckes will forthwith ſucceed them in their places. Theſe men indeed doe pretend Religion, but what louers they be thereof, the late example of a Miniſter by them moſt cruelly tormented, not farre from Cobbelſdorfe, doth manifeſtly ſhew. The report is, That the Vayuod of Valachia doth fauour neither part: into which Prouince a great number of Tartars are come in the aid of Botſcay. All the Market places and ſtreets heere in this Citie, lie full of poore fugitiue creatures of all ſex and ages; a moſt miſerable ſight to behold. Our owne mutinous ſouldiours beſet all the wayes to the Citie, and exclude vs from all manner of victuall; and not to vſe many words, in crueltie and hoſtilitie almoſt exceed the verie Enemies. The Hungarian Rebels, who of late forraged Auſtria, haue carried away with them aboue eight thouſand head of cattell, which, together with the Priſoners by them taken, they haue ſent into Turkey. The little boyes and children, which cannot by reaſon of their tender yeares goe, they carrie along with them vpon horſes, whoſe pittifull mourning and lamentation might mooue euen the verie ſtones; and yet are they (inhumane men) no whit mooued: yea many of theſe poore ſoules are heere and there by the way found daſhed againſt the ground, with their braines beaten out. And theſe Rebels in their behauiour ſhew ſuch crueltie, as whereat the verie Turkes themſelues were amazed. All things about Iſenſtad are by the Enemies taken and carried away. They of Neuhuſe, beſieged by thirtie thouſand of their Enemies, haue hitherto played the men, and of late repulſed the ſecond aſſault, with much ſlaughter of their Enemies. They ſay, That two thouſand Tartars, as many Rebels, and thirteene thouſand Turks, are to be yet expected to come vnto the Campe at Neuhuſe; who if they ſhall chance to come, it can ſcarce be, that they of Neuhuſe can long well hold out againſt them, eſpecially being not well appointed of neceſſarie prouiſion. The report is, That hauing taken Neuhuſe, they will remooue to Strigonium. It is ſaid alſo, twelue thouſand Turkes to haue now paſſed ouer the bridge at Eſſec; and great ſupplies both of men and money to come to Botſcay, who lieth encamped about Eperia, and is ſaid to haue made a couenant with the Great Sultan, That what place ſoeuer either of them ſhould firſt take, he ſhould hold the ſame wholly vnto himſelfe. Tanhuſer, who of late was Gouernour of Filek, is now (as the report goeth) of counſell with Botſcay. Germenchius hath put in three moneths victuall into Huſt in Tranſyluania. God in his mercie behold our poore afflicted and diſtreſſed Countrey.

Thus far he: Whereby the Reader (as I ſuppoſe) may eaſily gather, the miſerable eſtate of both the countries of Hungarie and Auſtria, the Chriſtians themſelues being the chiefe Authors thereof.

Odenburg beſieged by the rebels, and by Baſta relieued.

The rebellious Haiduckes had hitherto moſt ſtraightly beſieged the Citie of Odenbourg, hauing aſſaulted it in fiue ſundrie places at once: vpon whom Trautmanſtorfe, Generall of the Garriſon there, cauſing part of his horſemen to ſallie forth, skirmiſhed with them from eleuen of the clocke in the forenoone, vntill two of the clock in the afternoone, at which time the Haiducks beginning to preuaile, the Gouernour with the reſt of his horſemen, certaine enſignes of footmen, with ſome of the citiſens, with three field pieces vpon the ſudden breaking out of the gate, diſcomfited the Haiduckes, put them to flight, and ſlew many of them, hauing taken from them twelue enſignes, with many priſoners, whom he carried with him into the citie. Of which ouerthrow the Haiducks deſirous to be reuenged, with their renewed forces ſhortly after returned again vnto the city, burnt the ſuburbs of the ſame, and ſpoiled the villages thereabout. But whileſt they thus lay about Odenbourg, Baſta but with a ſmall power drawing neere vnto them, they preſently roſe, and paſſing ouer the riuer Drauus, carried away with them two thouſand head of cattell, with a great number of Chriſtian captiues.

The Turks ſeek to haue Caſſouia deliuered vnto them by Botſcay.

The Turkes being not to learne to make vſe of the diſcord of the Chriſtians among themſelues, had oftentimes been in hand with Botſcay, to deliuer Caſſouia wholly into their hands. Of which ſtrong citie, being the beſt that the Chriſtians now held in the vpper Hungarie, the Turkes were moſt deſirous, both for the commodious ſcituation thereof, and alſo for that they deemed themſelues partly thereof alreadie poſſeſſed, ſome good part of the garriſon therein being Turkes, as well Ianizaries as others. The full poſſeſſion of which ſtrong Citie the better to obtaine from Botſcay, and to get it into their owne hands, they ſent vnto him three waggons loaded with money and other rich commodities for a Preſent, and to ſupplie his wants, by a good conuoy of foure hundred Haiducks and ſome Turks ioyned vnto them.

Which Haiducks as they were by the way to Caſſouia, to paſſe by Tockay, a ſtrong towne holden by the Chriſtians, gaue ſecret knowledge vnto the Gouernour of the place, of their comming that way, and that if he would receiue them into the towne, and ſo into his protection, they would with ſome ſmall helpe from him, deliuer into his hands that ſo rich a bootie, and ſo continue with him as his faithfull and truſtie ſouldiours. Of whoſe offer the Gouernor well aſſured, forthwith ſent forth foure hundred of the ſouldiours of his owne garriſon to meet them, who ioyning with the aforeſaid Haiduckes which came with the conuoy, ſet vpon the Turks which came with them, and ſlew them euery mothers ſonne: and ſo with the rich bootie were by the Gouernour receiued into the towne, and by him courteouſly entertained: where they had not long lien, but that after their woonted manner looking abroad into the countrey, they chanced to meet with certaine companies of Botſcay his men, with whom they encountering, and hauing ſlaine of them neere about fiue hundred, tooke from them ſeuen waggons loded with good prouiſion, and thirtie horſes, beſide much other rich ſpoile.

Totiſa yeelded vnto the Turks

Newhuſe hardly aſſaulted and valiantly defended.

But the Rebels, notwithſtanding theſe and ſuch other loſſes, encreaſing both in number and power, ſtill more and more in all places preuailed, but eſpecially in the vpper part of Hungarie, the townes there one after another dayly reuolting vnto them, as amongſt the reſt the ſtrong towne of Totiſa did; whereinto the Rebels entering, ſent from thence part of the great ordnance, together with Relinger a Germane Captaine Gouernour of the Towne, and certaine other Germane ſouldiours there taken, vnto Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant, then lying with a great armie of thirtie thouſand Hungarian Rebels and Turkes, at the ſiege of the ſtrong towne and caſtle of Newhuſe. Which as it had oftentimes by him beene ſharpely aſſaulted, ſo was it by the ſouldiours therein moſt notably defended; proteſting neuer to yeeld the ſame, but to hold it out euen to the laſt man therein to be left aliue. Which cauſed Redeius for the encouraging of his ſouldiours, (who had now lien there certaine moneths at the ſiege thereof) to promiſe vnto them the whole ſpoile of the towne, and of all that therein was. And yet for all that, oft times kept backe the Turks from aſſaulting the ſame, for feare leſt if they ſhould by force haue taken it, they would by force alſo haue holden it vnto themſelues, as a place for them moſt commodious for the conquering of that which remained of the vpper part of Hungarie: which hee, though one of the greateſt Rebels, was yet loth to haue it to fall into their hands; and yet himſelfe with the Haiduckes the Hungarian Rebels, afterward, viz. the 25 of Iuly, gaue thereunto a moſt furious aſſault, inſomuch that hauing aduaunced ten of their Enſignes to the top of the Rampiers, they were in great hope euen preſently to haue taken it, but yet were by the reſolute valour of the defendants notably repulſed, and enforced againe to retire, leauing behinde them aboue ſeuen hundred of their moſt forward men dead in the trenches. Vnto which ſiege the Baſſa of Agria came alſo afterward with three thouſand horſemen and a number of Ianizaries; ſo that the beſieged, partly with mynes, partly with ſhot and often aſſaults diſtreſſed, were ſo waſted and wounded, that there were ſcarcely two hundred whole and ſound men left in the whole garriſon: beſide that, both victuals and pouder begun now to grow ſcarce alſo, ſo that they were brought vnto ſuch extremity, as that well they could not be in worſe caſe: and yet armed with a conſtant reſolution, they ſeemed not to be any thing therewith danted or diſcouraged, but ſtill valiantly held it out.

Newhuſe diſtreſſed.

The Hungarians dwelling in the Iſle of Shut in the riuer of Danubius, hauing before ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Rebels, did with their helpe much trouble the paſſages vnto the towne of Rab and Comara, and the Citie of Strigonium; vnto whome certaine meſſengers were ſent on the Emperours behalfe to perſuade with them to forſake the Rebels and to returne againe vnto their antient obedience. Who ſo well vſed the matter with them, that taking a truce for eight dayes, they in the meane time ſent fiue of the chiefe men amongſt them by ſhip to Presburg, offering vnto the Gouernour there, That if they might be ſecured of their goods and ſafetie, and that the Haiduckes that were with them might be entertained in pay, they would be readie againe to take the oath of allegeance and faithfully to ſerue him as became his loyall ſubiects and valiant ſoldiers: and for the aſſurance thereof, to leaue their wiues and children as pledges at Presburg. Which their offer was vnto the Gouernour very acceptable and welcome, who yeelding vnto their requeſt, in friendly ſort diſmiſſed them. But they being returned home, and hauing declared to the reſt of their fellowes what they had done; it was by generall conſent agreed, that foure thouſand of them ſhould ioyne themſelues vnto the Emperours power vnder the Regiment of Collonitz, who to bee knowne from others, wore in their creſts certaine ſpeciall feathers; their wiues and children being carried to Presburg as pledges of their faith: but this agreement by them made with the Gonernor of Presburg beeing once knowne, the reſt of the Rebels in the Countrey thereabout together aſſembled with the Turkes, inuaded the Iſle, in hope vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed them: but deceiued of their expectation, were by the inhabitants of the Iſle, and by the helpe of certaine Germane troupes ouerthrowne and put to flight, and three thouſand of them there ſlaine.

About the beginning of Iuly certaine Commiſſioners were ſent on the Emperours behalfe to Coſſouia, to intreat with Botſcay concerning a pacification to be made, who being by him there honourably entertained, and hauing with him ſtayed almoſt a whole moneth, were at length the nine and twentieth of the ſame moneth againe diſmiſſed. Now the articles, which Botſcay propounded vnto theſe Commiſſioners to be conſidered of for the making of a peace, and which for the moſt part were agreed vpon in the peace afterward concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperour, were theſe.

Firſt, that it ſhould be lawfull for all ſuch as would, to haue the free exerciſe of the reformed religion. For although (as hee ſaid) he was not ignorant that there was an antient decree amongſt the Hungarians, whereby all that profeſſed not the Catholicke Religion, or that reuolted from the ſame, were to bee burnt, and that hee deſired not to haue that article repealed; yet that his requeſt was, That the Emperour hauing regard vnto the troubles of the preſent time, would promiſe and aſſure, That from thenceforth no man ſhould bee troubled for his Religion, or called in queſtion for his conſcience and Beliefe. Beſides that, he requeſted to haue the Principalitie of Tranſyluania during his life; yet with this condition, That after his death it ſhould againe returne vnto the Emperour, ſo that the Emperor in his abſence ſhould appoint a naturall Hungarian to gouerne the ſame, as alſo to haue the chiefe gouernement in Hungarie. That there ſhould no more Biſhops ſit in counſell but one, and that hee, if it ſhould bee ſo thought meet, ſhould beare the office of the Chancelour. That the liberties and priueledges of that Kingdome ſhould bee kept whole and inuiolate. That it ſhould be lawfull for him onely to make choice of the chiefe Palatine of the Kingdome. That goods confiſcated for any offence committed, ſhould not be diſperſed or ſold, but giuen to men of deſert. That all offenders againſt the State from thenceforth ſhould bee iudged by the Counſell of Hungarie. That none ſhould bee preferred to Biſhoprickes in Hungarie, but ſuch as were of the noble Hungarian bloud. That all iniuries heretofore done ſhould be abſolutely pardopardoned, forgiuen and forgotten. All which things if they might be granted, he promiſed to labor to the vttermoſt of his power, vpon the beſt conditions he might to procure a peace betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor. Laſt of all he requeſted, That the charters of peace containing theſe articles thus agreed vpon, might be ſubſcribed and confirmed by the Biſhop of Rome, the Emperor, the King of Polonia, and all the Imperiall Kingdomes and Prouinces. G

The Turkiſh Sultan vnderſtanding of this treatie of peace betwixt the Emperour and Botſcay, by a meſſenger ſent in haſte to Botſcay, ſought by great offers and promiſes to hinder the ſame: putting him withall in remembrance, that a little before this treatie made, he had not onely by words but by letters alſo, ſubſcribed with his owne hand, promiſed vnto Botſcay his Embaſſadours ſent to Conſtantinople, That hee would bring to paſſe, that Botſcay rewarded with ſuch priuiledges as King Iohn in former time enioyed, ſhould in ſhort time be proclaimed and crowned King of Hungarie, and that to that purpoſe he was euen now readie to ſend H a ſcepter and a crowne, the ornaments of a King, to Alba Regalis. But for the preſent, hee by theſe meſſengers ſent vnto Botſcay two goodly horſes, with furniture of gold, gliſtering with precious ſtones. He ſent him alſo a rich ſcimitar, a paire of golden ſpurs, and a long horſemans coat garniſhed with gold and precious ſtones of great price; perſuading him valiantly to perſiſt in his former courſe and purpoſe. Which he failed not to doe: for immediatly after, hee with a gallant traine went from Caſſouia into Tranſyluania, there to take of the nobilitie of that Prouince the oath of their fidelitie vnto him; accounting no paines or labor great, which he tooke to turne the people from their obedience vnto the Emperor, and to ſtrengthen himſelfe. At which time he alſo ſent Redeius his Chancellor, with ſome others, into Polonia, to renew the confederation which was ſometime betwixt the Polonians and the Hungarians: who being admitted vnto the Kings preſence, and audience giuen him, firſt declared the cauſes of the diſcord and ciuill war that then was in Hungary, which he imputed chiefly vnto the oppreſſion of Religion, the free exerciſe thereof being forbidden them; and to the inſolencie of the Germans, who there at their pleaſure commanded ouer them. Vpon which two points he ſtood much, labouring with many words to perſuade the king thereof: and afterwards requeſting him of his gracious goodneſſe, and of the care which he, together with other Chriſtian Princes, had for the common quiet of the Chriſtian commonweale in generall, and eſpecially of thoſe two diſtreſſed countries, lying as it were euen in the enemies mouth, to enter into conſultation how the ſame euils might be remedied, and thoſe ſo great troubles again appeaſed, and to the effecting of ſo good a worke to put to his helping hand. Whereunto the King anſwered, That the frendſhip wherein Botſcay offered to ioyne with him being but the renuing of the antient amitie betwixt the Countries of Polonia and Hungarie, to be vnto him pleaſing; howbeit, hee could not for all that (as he ſaid) well like of Botſcay his reuolt from that houſe and familie, whereunto he was himſelfe ſo neere ioyned in affinitie; promiſing yet neuertheleſſe, that he would propound the matter vnto his nobilitie, to be further conſidered of: which when he had indeed done, it was by common conſent agreed, That no aid ſhould be giuen out of Polonia vnto Botſcay or the Rebels, and that whoſoeuer ſhould from thence afford him any aid, ſhould therefore loſe his head. With which anſwer the Embaſſadorus returned to Botſcay much diſcontented, beeing now with a great power againe returned out of Tranſyluania to Caſſouia.

The Lord Ruſſworm beheaded.

About this time the Lord Ruſſworm (ſometimes Generall of the Emperours armie againſt the Turks in Hungary, a man of great note and valor, and of whom we haue before much ſpoken) at Prague falling into words, and from words to blowes, with Francis Count Belioioſa his brother, and their men taking their parts on both ſides, it fortuned the ſaid Francis, the Earles brother, being grieuouſly wounded, to be there ſlaine, Belioioſa himſelfe being alſo in fiue places dangerouſly hurt; who ſo hardly proſecuted the death of his brother againſt the Lord Ruſſworm, that within a while after, he was therfore by the Emperor condemned, & at Prague beheaded, and diuers of his men hanged, with ſuch weapons hanging at their heeles, as wherewith they had ſlaine the ſaid Francis the Earles brother.

The Turkes troubles againſt his rebels and the Perſians in the Eaſt, an eaſe vnto the Chriſtians in the weſt.

Now was the time of the yeare come, when as the Turks great armies were woont to bee ſeene euen in the heart of Hungarie: howbeit, ſuch were their troubles in Aſia, both with the Perſian and their owne Rebels, that they were not at leiſure now to ſend ſuch great forces

A as they had before vſed, into Hungarie: neither could the Chriſtian Emperour on the other ſide now raiſe ſuch a power as he had in former times done to oppoſe againſt them, and to hinder their proceedings. The Hungarians themſelues (his greateſt ſtrength in thoſe wars) were now generally reuolted from him, and for moſt part followed the Enſignes of the Rebell Botſcay. The Princes wont to ſend him aid both out of Italie and out of Germanie, now affoorded him little or none at all: and his mercinarie ſouldiers for want of pay were now almoſt euery where vp in mutinie ready to forſake his ſeruice, and to pay themſelues with the ſpoile of his countries euen vnto the gates of Vienna. So that had not the Turkes beene ſo buſied in the Eaſt, but at leiſure to haue turned their whole power into Hungarie, as often times they had before done, it is hardly to be imagined, what ſhould haue letted them to haue ouerrun B not onely that which remained of Hungarie, but euen all Auſtria, with ſome good part of Germanie alſo; the Emperours preparations being then ſo ſmall, and his forces ſo weake, as that they were not able to hold the field againſt his own rebellious ſubiects, much leſſe againſt ſo puiſſant and dreadfull an enemie. But God which with his word hath ſet bounds vnto the raging ſea, beyond which it cannot paſſe, and by whoſe power Kings doe raigne and Princes bare rule, had by other meanes auerted the greateſt part of the Turkes forces Eaſtwards: ſo that Serdar Baſſa, Sultan Achmat his Lieutenant Generall for his wars againſt the Chriſtians, came this yeare but with a right ſmall armie (in compariſon of thoſe which the Turkiſh Sultans were woont to ſend) into Hungarie. Howbeit, with ſuch forces as he brought, and with ſuch ſupplies of the Rebels in Hungarie as came vnto him, he being growne fiftie thouſand C ſtrong, and out of feare of the Emperours forces, came the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt to Strigonium, and with his armie (part Turks, part Tartars, and part diſloyall Chriſtians) encamped in the ſelfeſame place where the Turks army had but the yeare before lodged; hauing brought with him fortie great pieces of batterie, with all things elſe neceſſarie for the ſiege. Neither were the Turks ſooner encamped, but that the Tartars which came with them to the ſiege (after their wonted manner) more deſirous of prey and booty, than of honor and victory, paſſing ouer the riuer of Gran into the territorie of the Chriſtians, there ſpoiled and burnt all before them as they went.

The Turkes in the meane time to depriue the beſieged of all reliefe to be ſent vnto them down the riuer of Danubius, made a great bridge of boats ouer the riuer, well fortified at both D ends thereof on each ſide the riuer with a ſtrong Corps de guard for the defence thereof, ſo that nothing could that way paſſe to or from the beſieged citie. Which things much diſmaied them in the citie, ſeeing no preparations to be made on the other ſide for their defence or reliefe: yea Baſta himſelf, Generall of ſuch ſmal forces as the Emperor had then, ſeeing the enemy ſo ſtrong, and himſelfe ſo weake, began greatly to doubt of the euent of this ſiege: and yet neuertheleſſe reſolutely ſet downe to employ both his valour and his wiſedome for the ſafegard of the place, he during the time of the ſiege failed not to the vttermoſt of his power to ſhew the effects both of the one and of the other.

The Turkes make a bridge ouer the riuer of Danubius, to keep Strigonium from being that way relieued.

And now the Turks aſſiſted with the Hungarian Rebels, had performed an exploit vpon the Iſle of Strigonium, aſwell to take the ſame from the Imperials, as for the ſpoile and pillage E thereof. The inhabitants there had ſtill remained faithfull vnto the ſeruice of the Emperour, whom the Rebels for all that had oftentimes ſought both by force and by perſuaſion to haue remoued from this their loyaltie and iuſt deuoire. Within this Iſle were 200 Haiduckes, returned againe to the Emperors ſeruice, who were ioined vnto the Iſlanders, for the better defence both of them and of the Iſland. But the Rebels knowing well the paſſages and entrances into the Iſle, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the ſame, and in it theſe poore Haiducks, whom they cut all in pieces: which loſſe cauſed Baſta to reſolue to ſend the Wallons he had in his army into the Iſle for the defence thereof. Which they of the Iſland vnderſtanding, made requeſt vnto the Generall, That he would not in any wiſe ſo doe, for that they greatly feared leſt the Wallons, beeing men altogether giuen to the ſpoyle, not finding the Rebels to prey vpon, ſhould F after their woonted manner prey vpon them, the Emperours faithfull ſubiects. At whoſe inſtance the former purpoſe for the ſending of the Wallons beeing changed, Collonitz himſelfe was appointed vnto that ſeruice, with whome Monſieur de Laual, a noble young Gentleman of France (who but a few dayes before was newly come vnto the campe, for the honourable deſire he had to ſee ſeruice, and to ſerue himſelfe, with his troupe of horſemen whome hee had brought with him out of Fraunce) went ouer into the Iſland alſo: Whereinto when as the Rebels ſhortly after againe entered, they were by Collonitz ouerthrowne and driuen out of the Iſle, two hundred and fiftie of them beeing ſlaine, and aboue fiftie moe of them taken priſoners. In which conflict the noble young Gentleman Laual ſo brauely behaued himſelfe, as that he gained vnto himſelfe much honour and renowne, euerie mans mouth beeing full of his prayſes, and wondering to ſee ſo great courage in ſo young yeares, hee beeing then ſcarce nineteene yeares old. With which loſſe the Rebels rather enraged than diſcouraged, ſhortly after returned againe, in greater number and better reſolued; where betwixt them, and them that were left for the defence of the Iſland, was fought a more ſharpe and bloudie fight than was the former; yet ſo, as that the Rebels were enforced againe with loſſe to retire. In which ſo hot and bloudie a skirmiſh, Mounſieur Laual hauing moſt valiantly borne himſelfe againſt the enemie, and done enough for his honour, but not ſo contented, but carried away with the heat of youth, and the deſire of glorie, and not otherwiſe to be perſuaded, but ſtill aduenturouſly preſſing on the retiring enemie, was there with a ſmall ſhot ſlaine, all they which knew him much lamenting his vntimely death. But the Rebels not ſo diſcouraged, but ſtill in one place or other inuading the Iſland, and threatening the Iſlanders with all extreamities, except they would take part with them; what by force, what by perſuaſion, ſo much preuailed with them, that the moſt part of them reuolting from the Emperour, vpon the ſudden ſet vpon the Count of Rhene, beeing then in the Iſland, and hauing ſlaine three hundred of his men, grieuouſly wounded himſelfe alſo. For the ſpeedie appeaſing of which multitude, Baſſa ſent ouer into the Iſland certaine companies of the Ratzians and Wallons, who not regarding that the Iſlanders were daily damnified by the Rebels, moſt miſerably ſpoiled them of whatſoeuer the Rebels had yet left them.

S. Thomas fort battered and aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Turkes encamped before Strigonium, firſt planted their batterie againſt the ſtrong fort, ſtanding aloft vpon S. Thomas hill: for that from thence they ſhould haue receiued infinit harme, if they ſhould before the winning thereof haue attempted to haue woon the citie; it ſtanding on their backes, and all the plaine betwixt the hill and the citie wherein they were to plant their batterie being ſubiect vnto it. Which fort, though very ſtrong, they with continuall batterie by the ſpace of almoſt three weekes, hauing with infinit charge, and the loſſe of a number of their men, made ſaultable, the foure and twentith day of September mounted the hill to aſſault the ſame. Vnto which aſſault they went vp the hill ſo thicke one thruſting an other forward, that the hill ſeemed now to be nothing but a mount or heape of armed men, ſcarce any part of it being to be ſeene, it was ſo couered with them. Vpon whom ſo ſwarming vp, the Chriſtians in the fort, hauing repoſed all the hope of their welfare in their valour, and reſolued thereby to die or liue, couragiouſly diſcharged their murthering ſhot both great and ſmall, ſcarce any of their deadly bullets falling in vaine. Howbeit the Turkes, reſolutely ſet downe for the performing of that they had taken in hand, without reſpect of death or danger, came ſtill deſperately on, vntill that they were come to the puſh of pike, and ſo to handie blowes euen in the verie breaches, which the long furie of the Turks cannon had made verie ſaultable. Fiue houres this furious aſſault was by the Turks maintained, and by the Chriſtians with inuincible courage and reſolution endured, many braue and valiant men falling on both ſides: and thrice the Turkes repulſed, were enforced to retire, but were ſtill by their Commanders brought on againe. The loſſe was to both ſides common, many worthie men there ending their daies, worthie of eternall fame. The Chriſtians fell dead vpon the Turkes ſlaine by their valor, and the Turks vpon the Chriſtians ſlaine by their multitude. But what ſhould wee ſay? The Turkes by numbers died, but not their force, that being by their great numbers ſtill maintained euen in deſpight of death, and alwaies liuing in their great multitude, yet left aliue. Which was not ſo with the defendants, but euen quite contrarie; who could not loſe one onely man, without diminiſhing of their forces, and means of reſiſtance: ſo that they ſtill loſt without hope of ſafegard, and yet could not be in ſafetie, without continuing of their ſo great loſſes. But he that ſtill fighteth onely for to ſaue his life, without hope of killing of his enemie, being too mightie for him to ouercome, muſt needs at laſt die ouercome, if it were but

with

A with verie wearineſſe. So in the end of this long and furious aſſault,nine hundred of the Chriſtians being ſlaine, together with the Count Oetingen, their Chiefetaine, and his Lieutenant mortally wounded,and nothing now more left but a few ſore hurt men, and the dead wals for the Turkes to ouercome,they entered the place,ſlew thoſe few whome they found yet breathing, made bootie of their death, bloud,and armes; and by the infinite price of their owne bloud, gained that place which had now no more bloud or life left in it. From whence they carried certaine great pieces, to helpe to batter the citie withall, and to vanquiſh them, for whoſe defence they were but a little before appointed.

S. Thomas fort woon by the Turkes.

The baſe town of Strigonium battered.

The Turks hauing thus gained S.Thomas fort,euen as they were yet embrued with bloud, and prickt forward with furie, forthwith planted thirtie great pieces of batterie againſt the B baſe towne of Strigonium, ſtanding low by the ſide of Danubius, and commonly called the Water towne; which they with all their force and fury moſt terribly battered. This baſe towne was enuironed with a palliſado of wood, to defend it againſt all ſudden ſurpriſes, as almoſt all the townes of Hungarie are: Whereunto the confuſed multitude of the Turkes carried a number of bruſh faggots, ſtuffed with gunpouder and brimſtone, which beeing ſet on fire,preſently ſet fire vpon the palliſado alſo,and burnt it down to the ground,making a way for the Turks to come euen to the wals of the city; which they with their great ordnance both night and day inceſſantly moſt terribly battered,vntill that by the fury of the cannon they had therein made a faire and large ſaultable breach. A great ſhame for our men to ſuffer the ſame ſo to be made,and not again repaired: whereas the Turks before in the ſame place,had made C it good againſt the great armie of the Archduke Matthias,being neuer to be driuen and forced out of it by the Chriſtians valour, vntill they were therein ſlaine; and to be now by our men through their cowardiſe not to be able to be made good.For why,it was euen the ſame place of battell, the ſame men,the ſame armes, and the ſame forme of fight, but not the ſame courages.The Turks can very well learne of vs that which is for them profitable,& make vſe thereof to their owne aduantage; whereas we can borrow nothing of them to ſerue vs againſt them, and ſo profit our ſelues by their example. Beſides that,the confidence they haue in their multitude carrieth them vnto ſuch aduantages, as from which the deſpaire of being ſeconded & relieued keepeth vs: whoſe boldneſſe alſo firmely grounded vpon a reſolution to die,paſſeth our reſolution far,in fighting onely to ſaue our liues.

The baſe town of Strigonium aſſaulted.

A terrible aſſault.

The great Baſſa incourageth his ſoludiers in the time of the aſſault.

D The breach ſo made, the Turks in good order, ſtayed vpon a firme reſolution, came brauely marching on,one of them thruſting another,and as it were ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhould haue the honour to giue the firſt charge, their haughtineſſe of minde animating of them to ſeeke for honour euen where perils were rifeſt; ſo to haue the honor to die amongſt the moſt forward and valiant men of war, rather than to liue among cowards of no reputation or valor. During the heat of which their ſo great and firme a reſolution, they regarded not the ſhowers of deadly bullets falling amongſt them as thicke as haile, as too weake to dant their haughtie courages; but thruſting one another amidſt theſe ſo great dangers, came vnto the breach, there to trie the matter hand to hand with our men. The Ianizaries were the men eſpecially appointed to this ſeruice, and had taken the ſame vpon them; who with their great E muskets on their reſts cruelly gauled our men, expoſed to the danger of their deadly ſhot vpon the brinke as it were of their own graues. The great Baſſa himſelfe was there preſent at the aſſault, encouraging his ſouldiers with ſpeeches full of terror and of comfort, as he ſaw occaſion for either to be vſed; wherewith he ſtirred vp their valor as is a ſhip with a faire or rough gale of wind. Death it ſelfe could not ouercome theſe miſcreants,their number ſtill repairing in a moment what death had taken away in an houre: whereas our men ſlew others but to bee ſlaine themſelues; and fought not but to become ſacrifices vnto death themſelues,and not by their reſiſtance to carrie away the victory againſt inexorable deſtinie. The fight was great and terrible, and the bullets ſtill flew, few of them falling in vaine amongſt ſuch a multitude and preaſe of men. They of the high towne, who themſelues expected the like danger where-F in their companions now floated betwixt life and death, ſtood aboue looking on, not daring to giue them aide, or to remooue out of their ſtrength, but reſeruing themſelues with all their forces for the ſole ſafegard of themſelues and for their owne defence. Howbeit all this while the enemies forces ſtill encreaſed,and the Chriſtians diminiſhed; for death could not weaken theirs, whereas it ſtill deſtroyed ours, who failed but in number, not in valour, and gaue place but vnto the force of death, and not vnto the force of men. All the deadly blowes appointed to be giuen for the defence of a breach, had been by our men giuen; all the armes neceſſarie for ſuch a purpoſe had been employed, all reſiſtance that could be deſired had bin made, and all the duties of valiant and worthie men performed; ſo that nothing here wanted but number, and not valour. But in all ſuch actions there are two things neceſſarie, the one for the helping of the other, for the correſpondencie of their power; which both ioyned in one bodie, may doe all things, but being diuided, can neither of them doe any thing againſt him which is poſſeſſed of both.

Power & valour the life of great actions.

The baſe town of Strigonium woon by the Turkes.

The upper towne of Strigonium in vain by the Turkes aſſaulted.

In fine, after foure attempts in this aſſault, moſt of the Chriſtian defendants beeing ſlaine, the Turks forced the reſt, and gained the breach, treading vnderfoot the dead bodies both of the Turkes and of the Chriſtians, to get into the Citie. This place thus woon, and thoſe that were left, put to the ſword, and the towne rifled; the Turkes yet in breath, and all embrued in bloud, gaue an attempt vnto the high towne, in ſome hope euen at that time in ſo great a confuſion of the defendants to haue carried the ſame alſo. Howbeit, the defendants beholding their weapons yet dropping with the bloud of their friends and companions, and readie to ſhed theirs alſo, for the preſent notably repulſed them: Who ſo diſappointed of their purpoſe, and deſiring to gaine the place with the leaſt loſſe they might, reſolued to take the ſame by vndermining of it, repoſing more truſt in the ſpade and the mattocke, than in their ſwords and harquebuſies, beeing by experience of their former ſieges taught, how hard and dangerous a thing it was by batterie and aſſault to obtaine the ſame. This trauell in the mynes tooke ſucceſſe according to their deſire: for within a few dayes the mynes (with much labour) beeing brought to perfection, and fire put vnto them, they fayled not to worke their effect, but with great their violence blew vp the wals, rampiers, men, and munition, altogether, caſting fourth ſuch ſmoakes and flames, as wherewith a number of the defendants were ſmothered and burnt. Which breaches ſo made, and the defences of the Citie blowne vp, in ſuch ſort, that the Chriſtians lay open to the enemies deadly ſhot, beeing not able any more to ſhew themſelues without danger of their liues, the Turkes in order forthwith came to aſſault and force the ſame. Which the Captaines of the Chriſtians beholding, prepared themſelues to withſtand them, and to that purpoſe would haue giuen order vnto their ſouldiers for the defence both of the breach and of the walles; whome they found ſuch as Eumenes at his greateſt need found his, not willing in any wiſe to fight, and in the moſt aſſured perill of death, without courage either to vanquiſh their enemies, or defend themſelues; in ſuch ſort, that not one of them would put themſelues in order, ſhew themſelues vpon the breach, or come neere the walls. Lazie cowards, chuſing rather to attend an aſſured death in their cowardiſe and want of courage, than to aduenture their liues into the danger of armes; well deſeruing to endure the ſame with diſhonour, ſeeing that they refuſed by honourable reſiſtance to preſerue their liues. The Captaines for all that by faire ſpeeches and by threats ceaſed not to ſtirre them vp; praying, exhorting, and ſometime with death threatening them, if they thus refuſed to doe their duetie, and with their naked ſwords in their hands would haue enforced them to the breach. But all in vaine; their dead courages beeing not to bee reuiued or ſtirred vp in their ſo great a feare of death: Which much diſmayed the Captaines, ſeeing their liues and honour, together with the place (through this tumult and cowardiſe of their ſouldiers) to bee in extreame perill. During which time the Turkes comming on, had without any great reſiſtance gained the foot of the breach: whome the ſouldiers now ſeeing ſo neere vnto them, and out of hope to bee relieued, and deſtitute of courage alſo, in ſtead of truſting vnto their armes and valour, betooke themſelues vnto the refuge of their ſhame and cowardiſe. For compaſſing in the Count Dampierre, Gouernour of the place, they would by reaſons haue perſuaded him to haue yeelded, and by threates haue feared him from further reſiſting of the enemie. Their furie emboldened them, proceeding not from their valour, but from their feare; ſtorming againſt their Generall for not beeing a coward, as they themſelues were; trembling for feare of their enemies, and inſulting againſt him. They had but one man of him to fight againſt, which made them furious and hardie: hardie with cowardiſe againſt one,

Strigonium undermined.

Great cowardiſe in the garriſon ſouldiers of Strigonium.

The garriſon ſouldiers in mutiny againſt the gouernour, would enforce him to yeeld vp the citty.

The braue reſolution of Count Dampierre Gouernor of Strigonium.

His notable remonſtrances vnto his diſcouraged ſouldiers, to perſuade them to hold out the ſiege.

A one, not daring to hold vp their weapons againſt their enemies being many. Howbeit the Count in the middle of theſe feares enraged, continued firme in his reſolution, his courage encreaſing in this ſtorme of mutinie, wiſhing rather to die by the hands of his owne ſouldiours, in the performing of his dutie, than to be ſaued by the Turkes in the bottome of his diſhonour. Which his ſo braue a reſolution cauſed him euen in the middeſt of theſe furious and tumultuous companies, to put them in minde of their duties, and to perſuade with them: That the perill they ſo much feared, was greater through their owne feare, than indeed it was: that onely their fearefull apprehenſion made the danger, and not the action that was by them to be performed; ſeeing that it was impoſſible for the enemie to ouercome them, if they would but reſolutely ſtand vpon their valour to reſiſt him. That all things reſting but B in opinion, were by themſelues to be ſubdued, if they had but the deſire to ouercome them, and yet of power to ouerthrow them, if they will yeeld to their diſhonour. That therefore they ſhould propound vnto themſelues the honor and the ſhame that was to enſue vnto them, by the different deportment of themſelues in this action, how much the deformitie of the one differed from the beautie of the other, and aſpire vnto the honour which their enemies had ſometimes got in the ſame place, and in the verie ſame action wherein they were now, for hauing with leſſe appearance of their ſafetie ouercome the like danger, wherein their holding out had made them victorious with honour, without any great fight at all. That it ſhould be an eternall infamie vnto them, that the Turkes ſhould ſurmount them by their reſolution, in an action wherein they ought to ſhew themſelues moſt valorous; and by their cow- C ardiſe become ſubiect vnto them, whome at other times they had accounted vnworthie to be compared with them in valour. That they ſhould lay their hands vpon their hearts, and remember their eſtate and faith; bound vnto the firſt by their honour, and to the ſecond by their dutie. That they were men of Warre, liuing by their pay, which bound them to the ſeruice of him from whom they receiued it, euen vnto death; hauing before obliged their liues vnto their pay: and that they were Chriſtian Subjects, bound to keepe their promiſe giuen by oath before God. That forgetting either the one or the other of theſe things, they depriued themſelues of the pay promiſed to them which performed their ſeruice, and loſing their renowne in this world for their cowardiſe, and in the world to come for breaking their faith. That therefore they ſhould continue conſtant in the performance of their dutie, reſol- D uing themſelues rather to endure an honorable death, vnto which belonged the recompence of an eternall fame for their valour and fidelitie; than to prolong a miſerable life with perpetual infamie for their cowardiſe: whereof for all that, they could no more aſſure themſelues by the yeelding vp of the place, than by the defending thereof, for as much as the Turkes were oft times euen as cruell vpon them that yeelded, as thoſe that reſiſted; keeping no faith with the Chriſtians, but as beſt ſtood with their profit and their pleaſure. And that therefore for his part he was reſolued, rather to die with honour in the place, than to be beholden to his enemies for an infamous and miſerable life. And that therefore he beſought them to follow him in this laſt action of their deuoire, which carried with it all the trophees of their precedent actions, wherein they had oftentimes aſſiſted him in many actions of leſſe worth, and of E much greater perill.

This diſcourſe grounded vpon ſo good reaſons, and proceeding from ſo great valour, might haue preuailed with any other generous mindes, except with theſe degenerate ſouldiours, who by their cowardiſe had hardened themſelues againſt all the points of honor which might any way mooue them; in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood as faſt in their baſe cowardiſe, as did their General in his valorous and conſtant reſolution. They ſtood with their hands behinde them, without any weapons in them, as was their mindes without any courage at all: and as men appointed to be ſacrificed vpon the altar of death, attending without moouing, but the hands of them that ſhould ſacrifice them. Great and ſhameleſſe cowardiſe, not daring by reſiſtance to withſtand the violence of their enemies, for feare of hindering them in their deſires, being indeed ſuch as had vowed their death to ſatiſfie their owne furie. Meane while ſome of theſe ſouldiors ſeeing their ſpeeches to be but vaine, and not able to mooue their Gouernour to ſatiſfie their deſire, conceiued the ſame their requeſts, with the reaſons thereof, into writing, which they ſent vnto him. Which the Gouernor hauing read, in their ſight tore their letters ters in pieces, and trode the ſame vnder his feet; reiecting as well their demands by letters, G as he had done their requeſt by words. In briefe, hauing forgotten nothing of the dutie of a worthie General, and valiant Captaine, joyned now thereunto the office of a ſimple Souldiour, going himſelfe vnto the breach, with ſome few, to defend the ſame. But the more the Count ſtood vpon this his ſo great reſolution, the more theſe cowardly and mutinous Villaines proceeded in their baſe obſtinacie, in ſo much that they fell from prayers, to furie and rage, threatening to deliuer him their Gouernour, together with the place, vnto the Enemie, to ſaue their liues, if he himſelfe would not by treatie ſaue them from the imminent perils. If theſe baſe cowards were before deafe vnto the juſt remonſtrances of their Gouernour, which might haue preſerued them from death and infamie, he was alſo as deafe as they, to conceiue their requeſts, or to be mooued with their threats; knowing that he had more reaſon on his H ſide, by conſtant valour to withſtand the wicked and ſhamefull reſolution of his ſoldiors, than they had with diſhonour to enforce him, or to offer him violence, to their eternall ſhame and infamie.

The conditions wherupon Strigonium was to bee deliuered vnto the Turks

In the meane time theſe obſtinate and enraged cowards proceeeded from words to deeds, and from requeſts to violence, as did oft times the diſloyal ſouldiors of Rome, in ſlaying the good Emperors. For they in cruel manner, without reuerence, by force layed hands vpon the Gouernor, put him in priſon, and afterwards crauing parley, fel to treatie with the Great Baſſa about the deliuerie vp of the place. Where with the Baſſa well contented, ſent in vnto them Haly Baſſa, to conclude the matter. Where after ſome little talke, it was agreed, That they ſhould deliuer vp the place (which was not indeed theirs to diſpoſe of) and that the Baſſa I ſhould therefore promiſe and ſuffer them with bag and baggage in ſafetie to depart whither they would, with their enſignes frilled vp, and fire in their matches; leauing behinde them their great ordnance, with all their other munition and warlike prouiſion. Which only compoſition by the perfideous ſouldiors made in the abſence and indurance of their General, was by the Turks faithfully kept, amongſt a thouſand others like before by them broken: whether it were in reſpect of the eaſie conqueſt of the citie, (being one of the chiefe and principal places of all Hungary) or for that they being ouer-joyed with the gaining of that which they had ſo long deſired, and now ſo little hoped for, they forgat their wonted crueltie and breach of faith, is doubted.

This citie thus yeelded the third of October, and the Turks forgetting their wonted crueltie, K according to their faith and promiſe before giuen, in ſafetie conducted theſe cowardly ſoldiors within a league of Comora, helping them by the way to carrie their ſicke and wounded men, together with their fardles, which the Turks oft times carried vpon their own ſhoulders. Theſe cowards which thus went out, with their Gouernor ſent out alſo with them, were in number a thouſand whole and ſound men, fitted whilſt they were in the citie, with all things neceſſarie for their honour, and defence of the place: but themſelues deſtitute and void of all honour and courage. A thouſand, which all together were not worth their Gouernor alone, ſeeing that in him alone there remained more valour than in all that whole multitude. Many of the Inhabitants which had there long dwelt, would not forſake the place, but by the leaue of the Turks there remained ſtill; the reſt which would not, hauing leaue in ſafetie to depart L whither they would.

Thus this famous Citie of Strigonium, one of the ſtrongeſt bulwarkes of Chriſtendome againſt the Turks, which the Chriſtians had now holden by the ſpace of ten yeares and one month, after that it was by Count Charles Manſfelt woon from the Turks, when as it had long time before been in the Turks poſſeſſion, woon from the Chriſtians by Sultan Solyman, now againe (as is before ſaid) fell into the power of the Turks, with threeſcore and ten pieces of great ordnance, and a wonderfull deale of other warlike prouiſion.

The Captaines and chiefe authours of the mutinie, and yeelding vp of Strigonium, impriſoned, condemned, and moſt ſhamefully. but worthily executed.

Theſe baſe and cowardly Souldiours, together with the Count their Gouernour, being come to Comora, were juſtly deſpoyled both of their honour and of their armes, and ſent backe againe to Presburg, where curſed and deteſted of all the world, and eſpecially of the Hungarians themſelues (who although they were reuolted from their alleageance toward the Emperour, yet could they not but much deteſt their ſo ſhamefull and notable cowardiſe) were there the chiefe of them committed to priſon; where after they had for a cer-

A a certaine time lien, and being brought to judgement, and conuicted of treaſon, in deliuering vp the city of Strigonium vnto the Turks, and in ſo doing to haue greatly damnified the Chriſtian commonweale, they were therefore condemned, and according to the qualitie of their offences, diuerſly in this manner executed. Captain Leonard Fredericke Schleker had his judgment, firſt to haue his right hand cut off, and his tongue drawne out behinde in his necke, and both of them nailed to the gallowes, and afterwards to be hanged; howbeit through the interceſſion of many of his friends he was not hanged but beheaded. Iohn Michael Schorer, Iohn Hopff, Adam Lindawar, Philip Dur, and Caſpar Lielbarter, all Captaines, were adiudged to haue their right hands firſt cut off and nailed to the gallowes, and afterward hanged, but through the interceſſion of Countie Mansfeld, they were hanged, and their hands not cut off. Iohn Lau- B tenberger was condemned to be quartered aliue; but was at the interceſſion of Countie Mansfeld, firſt beheaded, and afterward quartered. Iohn Diſchoff with eleuen other were only hanged. Laurence Marſhal was enjoyned to ſerue two yeares againſt the Turks as a common ſouldior, without pay; but through the interceſſion of Countie Mansfeld had one yeare pardoned him. Ieremie Strelin, with diuers other, which were either fled, or els remained ſtill in Strigonium, were judged, their names to be ſet vpon the gallowes, and being afterwards caught, ſome of them to be quartered, and other ſome their hands to be cut off, and nailed vpon the gallowes, and afterward hanged. And thus theſe diſloyal Captaines, by ſhunning of an honourable death in defence of Strigonium, and performing of their dutie; by neglecting the ſame, procured vnto themſelues a moſt ſhamefull death, attended vpon with perpetuall infamie and C diſhonour.

But as the loſſe of this ſtrong place was vnto the Chriſtians heauie and grieuous, ſo was it vnto the Turkes no leſſe pleaſing and joyfull; it being the place they had of long aboue all others deſired, and whereat they had euer ſince the loſſe thereof, with their great armies in Hungarie, for the ſpace of ten yeares ſtill aimed. Howbeit this their joy endured not long, their proſperitie being too hot to hold out without ſome cooling blaſt of aduerſe fortune. For the ſame report of Fame, which with the right hand preſented vnto the Great Sultan at Conſtantinople, the pleaſing newes of the winning of Strigonium in Hungarie; euen with the left hand deliuered likewiſe vnto him the melancholie report of the ouerthrow of his great armies in Aſia, with the loſſe of Damaſco the greateſt citie of Syria. For, to begin with the greateſt firſt: The King of Perſia, inuaded by Cicala Baſſa, Sultan Achmat his great Lieutenant in Aſia; and hearing that the Baſſa of Caramania had expreſſe charge, with all ſpeed to come vnto him with a great ſupplie of ſouldiours to be taken vp in Caramania and the countries thereabout: he then hauing a puiſſant armie on foot, before prepared for all euents, preſently ſet forward againſt Cicala: whome he comming vpon before hee was readie to fight, by his vnexpected comming, and ſudden charge, ouerthrew his armie, and tooke from him all his great ordnance; Cicala himſelfe with three hundred ſouldiours, with much adoe eſcaping and retyring himſelfe to Adena; which Citie the Perſian King, purſuing Cicala, ſhortly after ſtraitly beſieged. With which vnluckie newes Sultan Achmat much troubled, forthwith writ vnto the Baſſa of Trebezond, with all ſpeed to ſend aid vnto Cicala: who taking vnto him ſome other of the Turks Commanders, with a great armie ſet forward on his journey. Of whoſe comming Cicala hearing, the better to direct the Baſſa in his proceeding, cauſed himſelfe with ten of his ſouldiours whom he beſt truſted, ſecretly by night to be let downe ouer the walls of the citie. And ſo comming to the Baſſa, together with him kept on his way to joyne battell with the King as neere vnto the citie as he could, for that he had taken order before he came out of the citie, that ſo ſoone as they ſhould perceiue the battell to be joyned, they ſhould forthwith ſallie out vpon the backes of the Perſians, and ſo by holding of them with a doubtfull battell, to further the victorie. All which the Perſian King, hearing of the Baſſa's comming, wiſely doubting, and not willing to forſake the ſiege, diuided his armie, and leauing one part thereof to continue the ſiege, went himſelfe with the other to meet the Baſſa. Wherein hee vſed ſuch expedition and ſpeed, that with all his power falling vpon him before he could put his men in order, or range his battell, he made of the Turkes (now confuſedly and without all order fighting more for the ſafegard of their liues, than for any hope they had of victorie) ſuch an exceeding great ſlaughter, that few of them eſcaped, but were there almoſt all ſlaine. Cicala himſelfe but with two or three moe, hauing much ado by getting ting into a little boat, and ſo by paſſing ouer the riuer, to eſcape the danger. After which victorie ſo eaſily gained, the King returning againe to the ſiege, after many ſharpe and great aſſaults thereunto giuen, and many men on both ſides loſt, had the ſame at length yeelded vnto his mercie.

Now with this newes of the loſſe of his armies, and of the victories of the Perſian king, Sultan Achmat enraged, cauſed Cicala Baſſa his houſe at Conſtantinople, ful of treaſure & wealth, to be rifled; after the manner of the world, deeming of the doings of him ſo great a Captaine, according to the euent and euill ſucceſſe thereof, though not in his power to haue been remedied: neuertheleſſe ſhortly after, he cauſed great ſummes of money to be deliuered out of his treaſures, and new forces raiſed for the renewing of the war againſt the Perſian King. Vnto which ſeruice (now become vnto the Turks dreadfull) when as many of the Ianizaries were to be appoiuted, they after their proud and inſolent manner, all ariſing vp in mutinie, ſaid flatly, That they would not ſtirre one foot out of Conſtantinople, except they were both before hand payed, and aſſured alſo to haue their wages encreaſed: complaining grieuouſly withall, of the Baſſa of Damaſco, the Great Sultan his high Treaſurer, that he conuerting the Sultans treaſures to his owne vſe, did not pay the ſouldiers their wages due. For the appeaſing of which mutinie and tumult, the Sultan cauſed the ſame Baſſa to be apprehended and his head ſtrucken off, and ſo with the price of his bloud againe appeaſed them.

The Ianizaries mutinie.

But leauing the Perſian King triumphing in his victories, and the Great Sultan grieuing at his loſſes, let vs turne aſide into Siria, to ſee the troubles the Turkes had euen among themſelues, to the weakening of their State, and the increaſing of the Great Sultans cares & griefe. The two Baſſa's of Damaſco and Aleppo had (as is before declared) been at great diſcord and variance betwixt themſelues, and the Baſſa of Aleppo in field ouerthrowne, and in his city beſieged, glad to make peace with the other Baſſa, by yeelding vnto all ſuch things as it pleaſed him to demand. Which two Baſſa's for all that being diuerſly affected vnto the State, long agreed not, he of Damaſco continuing faithfull in his allegeance towards the Great Sultan, and the other of Aleppo ſecretly inclining vnto rebellion. Which the Baſſa of Damaſco perceiuing, and joyning vnto him the Baſſa's of Tripolis and Gazare, with their vnited Forces went againſt the Baſſa of Aleppo, leading with them 60000 good men, with purpoſe to haue beſieged the Baſſa of Aleppo his enemie, in his citie. But he betimes aduertiſed of this his deſigne, and not vnprouided for his comming, quickely called together his Forces, and had in verie ſhort time raiſed an armie of thirtie thouſand valiant men, whom he encouraging, and finding them willing to follow him whitherſoeuer he would lead them, marched directly towards his enemies; with whom he meeting, readily joyned battell with them, which was fought with ſuch furie and hideous noiſe, as if it had been two thunder-claps oppoſing each other in one cloud, ſtriuing of themſelues, which ſhould burſt out firſt, being like people, like armes, and like order of fight. The medley for a great time continued ſharpe and furious, the number of the one ſide counteruailing the valour of the other, and the others valor ballancing the others great number: howbeit in the end the lone Baſſa ouercame the other three, and the ſmaller number the greater, and putting them to flight, remained ſole victors of the field. Now the victorious Baſſa, as wiſe to vſe the victorie, as he was valiant to obtaine the ſame, ſo eagerly purſued them, that without giuing them leaue to breathe, hee beſieged Tripolis, the Baſſa whereof at his comming abandoned the ſame, and carrying with him all his treaſure, fled into Cyprus; which made the taking of the place vnto the victorious Baſſa eaſie, who rifled and ranſacked the ſame: and not content with this conqueſt, forthwith beſieged the great and ſtrong citie of Damaſco, reſolued to die in the plaines thereof, or to become victorious within the walls of the ſame. During which ſiege, the Baſſa of Tripolis had out of the prouinces and countries of the Turks thereabouts, raiſed another great armie, and was comming to raiſe the ſiege, and to reſcue the Citie. Whereof the Baſſa of Aleppo hearing, roſe with the greateſt part of his armie, and meeting with him, gaue him battell, and therein the ſecond time ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Which misfortune ſo diſmaied the mindes of the beſieged, that deſpairing of all ſuccour and reliefe, they by conſent of their gouernor fell to parley with the enemies, and ſo vpon certaine capitulations yeelded vnto him the place. Whereinto the Baſſa entering, found therein great treaſure, raiſed of the Turkes tributes, whereupon hee ſeiſed, and by the meanes thereof reſolued to make himſelfe maſter of all Syria, the chiefe

A citie whereof he had now in his owne power: whereunto he gaue free acceſſe and traffique vnto all the Merchants of Perſia and of the Indies.

Now in the time of this his proſperitie, newes was brought him, That the Beglerbeg of Natolia had ſent his Lieutenant with a great armie againſt him; who knowing that diligence was the ſpirit of conqueſt, and that to conquer was to little purpoſe, without a vigilant care for the preſeruation thereof, reſted not vpon his former good fortune, but marched directly towards his enemies. Wherein his ſucceſſe was anſwerable vnto his deſigne, for within the ſpace of two dayes he had taken all the paſſages which might giue way vnto his enemies to diſtreſſe him: and in the ſtreights of the mountaines, whereby the enemie was to paſſe, layed a great ambuſh of two thouſand harquebuſiers and three thouſand horſe, who the enemies being paſſed, and hee charging them a head, ſet vpon them in the rereward, and brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that hauing made a great fight, in fine they hauing loſt a number of men, were glad to flie, and to leaue the victorie to the Baſſa. And to the encreaſing of his good happes, he intercepted a Ship, caſt by weather vpon that coaſt, laded with great treaſure, bound from Alexandria to Conſtantinople with the tributes of Ægypt, belonging to the Great Sultan. Of all which things the Perſian King aduertiſed, ſought to ioyne with him in amitie, highly commending his valiant acts, and ſending vnto him honourable Preſents; to wit, a Piſtoll, an Helmet, and a Targuet, all ſet with pretious ſtones, eſteemed to be worth fiftie thouſand Crownes. This flame of rebellion ſpread abroad out of Syria, into Caramania, and ſo farther and farther into the leſſer Aſia. Which was the cauſe that the Great Sultan ſent with all ſpeed vnto the Viſier Baſſa, then in Hungarie; commaunding him, now that Strigonium was taken, which before had hindered the concluding of peace, hee ſhould now vpon reaſonable conditions conclude the ſame, to the end that his affaires on this ſide of his Empire being ſet in quiet and ſecuritie, hee might foorthwith after turne his Forces againſt the Perſians and the Rebels in Aſia.

But after all theſe great troubles, to returne againe into Hungarie. The Rebels there had of long beſieged the ſtrong towne of Newhuſe, as is before declared: which being hitherto valiantly defended by the German garriſon therein, was now brought to ſuch extremitie, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to be longer defended, the garriſon ſouldiours therein being with often aſſaults for the moſt part ſlaine, and the reſt of them that were left, grieuouſly wounded. Of which ſtrong Towne (being as it were the Key of that ſide of the Countrey) the Turkes which together with the Rebels beſieged the ſame, were for the commodious ſcituation thereof verie deſirous: and the Rebels thereunto as vnwilling, for that it being once in their hand, would hardly euer be againe from them recouered. For which cauſe Illiſhaſcius one of the Captaines of the Hungarian Rebels then at the ſiege thereof, perceiuing it could not long be kept, to the intent that the Turks ſhould not by force obtaine the ſame, by letters requeſted of Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant, though then his enemie, That the towne might be deliuered vnto Humanoius, another Captaine of the Hungarian Rebels, leſt the Turks ſhould by force obtaine the ſame: aſſuring him vpon the peril of his owne life, and the confiſcation of all his goods to the Emperour, that vpon a reconciliation and peace to be made betwixt the Emperour and the Hungarians his ſubiects, he ſhould againe deliuer the ſame towne and Fortreſſe into his poſſeſſion. Whereupon by commaundement of the Archduke and of Baſta, the Towne was yeelded vp the ſeuenteenth day of the moneth of October, vnto the aforeſaid Humanoius, and the Hungarians onely receiued into the towne; yet with this condition, That the Germane ſouldiours which were yet left, and who had valiantly thus long endured the ſiege, might ſtill ſtay in the towne in pay, and keepe watch and ward together with the reſt of the Hungarians; Humanoius hauing commaund ouer them all.

Newhuſe yeelded vnto the Hungarian Rebels.

Wherefore the Turkes ſeeing themſelues diſappointed of their purpoſe, for the obtaining of this ſtrong Towne, riſing by night, and not a little diſcontented with the Hungarians, marched towards Strigonium, at the ſiege whereof the Viſier Baſſa lay. Howbeit within a few dayes after, the Hungarians not liking to haue the Germanes in garriſon with them, turned them with their Captaine Strenius out of the Towne, and yet ſafely conducted them to Comara.

Altenſol yeelded to the Hungarian Rebels.

At the ſame time they of Altenſoll, another ſtrong towne of the vpper Hungarie, not farre from Neuhuſe, hauing bin long beſieged by the Rebels, and driuen for want of victuall to eat their horſes for the ſpace of fiue weekes; and hauing now eaten them all but ſeuen, and nothing elſe left, yeelded themſelues together with their towne to the Rebels: as did alſo they of Wiglas, Shemnitz, and Cremnitz.

In the meane time Botſcay with a verie great armie of his Hungarian Rebels, came to Tyirna, a ſtrong towne about ſixteene miles diſtant from Vienna, attended vpon with a guard of an hundred tall ſouldiers, gallantly apparelled all in blew: a little before whoſe comming, Humanóius, vnto whome Neuhuſe was a little before yeelded, had ſummoned Presburg, requiring the ſame to bee yeelded vnto him. Which thing Botſcay, beeing now come, by Letters likewiſe required of the citiſens, threatening otherwiſe moſt ſtraightly to beſiege them. Whereupon Schonberg Gouernour of Presburg, doubting of the faithfulneſſe of the citiſens, beeing almoſt all Hungarians, retired himſelfe with a good part of his ſouldiers into the Caſtle; with proteſtation, to ſpend his life and all that hee had for the keeping and defence thereof. With whoſe conſtancie the citiſens mooued, continued firme in their allegeance to the Emperor. Which Botſcay perceiuing, and that the city was not to be got by threats, forthwith remooued and went to Peſth, where he was moſt honorably receiued by the Viſier Baſſa and by him preſented with a crowne of curious workmanſhip, and threeſcore thouſand duckats, with fiue and twentie moſt goodly horſes: and there hauing receiued from him full power to entreat of peace, and to conclude the ſame with the Imperials, with Haly Baſſa and certaine other of the chiefe of the Turkes joyned in commiſſion with him, againe departed and went to Kyrpa, vnto an aſſembly of the Hungarians there to be holden: whither but a little before Sigiſmund Forgatt was come with the Emperours reſolution, concerning the negotiation of peace; when as in the meane time other commiſſioners from the Emperor were come to Comara about the treatie of peace with the Turkes, they themſelues ſo requiring. Howbeit Collonitz at the ſame time by letters writ vnto the Archduke, aduiſing him that this treatie of peace might not, together and at one time, be taken in hand with the Turks and the Rebels: but that if it were poſſible, an attonement ſhould be firſt made with the Rebels, and afterward a peace concluded with the Turkes; the common good of the common weale ſo requiring: for that he perceiued the Turks indeed not to be deſirous of peace at all, but onely to goe about, by keeping of the Chriſtians at variance among themſelues, and in ſuſpence betwixt hope and feare, to do them harme, and themſelues good; which was afterward found to be ſo indeed.

Botſcay obtaineth leaue of the Viſier Baſſa, to entreat of peace with the Emperors Commiſsioners.

The Perſian King had ſome moneths before ſent three Embaſſadours vnto his Imperiall Maieſtie, who being come at diuers times one after another, were all with peculiar letters diſmiſſed from Prague the 29 of Nouember. Vnto the firſt of which Embaſſadours letters were giuen, of this purport.

The Emperors Letters vnto the Perſian King.

Zinel Chan Beg whome your Maieſtie hath ſent Embaſſadour vnto vs, wee haue willingly ſeene and receiued, and giuen him audience, in declaring of ſuch things as he had from you in charge. It is vnto vs both acceptable and pleaſing, that your Maieſty hath regard, ſo friendly to ſalute vs, and ſo carefully to ſeeke to ioine in amitie and friendſhip with vs, whereby your Maieſtie much bindeth vs vnto the like deſire of mutuall loue and friendſhip; and that we againe on our parts ſhould be readie to performe ſuch things as may be vnto your Maieſtie pleaſing: and that we ſhould wiſh for nothing more, than that our friendſhip ſhould daily more and more be confirmed, and for the common good of vs both for many yeres preſerued: wherein we for our parts wil not be wanting. Wheras your Maieſtie with great courage hath vndertaken, and with ſo happie ſucceſſe of victories continued your wars againſt the Turke, whereof you had ſo iuſt cauſe, wee from our hearts in your behalfe reioyce as all other Chriſtians worthily doe: and we our ſelues are thereby much animated valiantly and conſtantly to proceed in our warres, which wee now ſo many yeares haue made with the ſame enemie, nothing doubting but that God the reuenger of wrong will ſo proſper the honourable endeauours of your Maieſtie, as that you ſhall not onely recouer ſuch things as haue beene wrongfully taken from you, but alſo weaken and deſtroy the power of that perfidious enemie. Which that it may the better bee brought to paſſe, wee alſo renue our warres, raiſe greater forces, and by our Embaſſadours and Letters exhort and incite the greateſt Chriſtian Princes and Potentates to extend their power againſt this our common enemie: and

A thereby to giue fitter opportunitie and occaſion vnto your Maieſtie for the better proceeding of your affaires in Aſia. The courſe of our notable victories, which wee haue in few yeares paſt obtained againſt the Turkes, the tumults and troubles which the Turkes haue by ſecret deuiſes raiſed in Hungarie, haue ſomewhat hindered: howbeit we hope by Gods permiſſion, that all things ſhall ſhortly bee againe reſtored vnto their former eſtate, ſo that wee may wholly without let turne our ſelues with our power againſt the Turkes. Yet in the meane time we haue thus much preuailed with the King of Spaine, as that hee hath alreadie ſet forth a fleet vnto the borders of his territories, to diſtract his forces: the proſperous ſucceſſe of which fleet wee dayly expect. Wee haue alſo mooued the Pope, that hee ſhould alſo giue aid in this common cauſe, and excite other Princes alſo to doe the like, which hee with great indeauour doth. But concerning ſuch things as ſhall hereafter happen, wee ſhall by Letters and B Embaſſadours certifie your Maieſtie as occaſion ſhall require; as at this preſent we had appointed to ſend vnto you the Baron of Dohna, a famous and noble Gentleman, who (all things beeing readie for his iourney) ſuddenly dyed: and would now haue ſent another, had not the vnexpected change of the affaires of the Muſcouites otherwiſe diſſuaded vs, wee hauing no other way but that, at this time, to ſend into Perſia. For concerning this great Prince, who is now reported there to raigne, what his minde is, or how hee ſtandeth affected, wee haue as yet no experience. In the meane time wee ſo deſire a perpetuall and firme friendſhip to bee eſtabliſhed betwixt vs and your Maieſtie, with a certaine ſecure and free commerce, that if your Maieſtie (which wee wiſh) ſhall extend your victories vnto the ſea, your ſubiects may haue free acceſſe and traffique vnto all our Kingdomes and dominions. Wee alſo thanke your Maieſtie, that you ſo kindly entertaine the Chriſtians into your kingdomes, and grant to C them to haue the free exerciſe of their religion: as alſo for that you haue ſent your Embaſſadours vnto the King of Fraunce, although without wiſhed ſucceſſe, whereby we eaſily gather your Maieſties great care and circumſpection euerie way. As concerning them whom your Maieſtie hath ſent vnto vs, they haue diligently and faithfully performed their dutie, ſo that they haue deſerued praiſe and fauour both heere and in Perſia: whom we much commend vnto your Maieſtie, to whom in all things wee offer our greateſt loue and affection.

Vnto the ſecond Embaſſadour were alſo giuen Letters from the Emperour, to this effect.

D Whileſt we were yet buſied in the diſpatch of Zinel Chan Beg, your Maieſties former Embaſſadour, in the meane time Methi Culi Beg, another Embaſſadour of yours, came vnto vs, whome wee haue courteouſly entertained, and graciouſly heard: by whoſe ſpeech, as alſo by your Maieſties letters, wee haue with exceeding great pleaſure vnderſtood both your friendly greeting of vs, as alſo of the happie ſucceſſe of your affaires againſt the Turkes, ſince the departure of your former Embaſſadour, together with your kinde affection towards the Chriſtians in thoſe parts. One of the ſeruants alſo of our Embaſſadour which died by the way, hath reported vnto vs, how courteouſly our ſaid Embaſſadour, was by your Maieſtie receiued: and how you haue ſhewed your ſelfe affected againſt the common enemie, which was vnto vs a thing both acceptable and pleaſing. Vnto both which your Embaſſies the more ſolemnly to anſwere, wee had appointed againe to ſend an honourable Embaſſage vnto your Maieſtie, E had not theſe lets and impediments happened, which in our letters giuen vnto your former Embaſſador are declared. But ſo ſoone and as often as may bee, wee will endeauour either by Letters or by Embaſſadours, more at large to manifeſt our loue and affection towards you. Wherefore we greatly deſire that your Maieſtie may continue in perfect amitie with vs, and valiantly proceed in ſubduing of the common enemie; wee on our part being readie to performe all things whereby we may teſtifie vnto you the deſire wee haue for the preſeruation of our mutuall loue and friendſhip; as alſo of our endeauours in our warres againſt him. God almightie long preſerue your Maieſtie in health, and make you ſtill victorious againſt the common enemie.

Vnto the third Embaſſadour were likewiſe letters giuen from the Emperour, of this purport.

Whereas Ius Baſſi Haſſan Beg, your Maieſties Embaſſadour vnto the French King, came this way at the ſame time that other two of your Embaſſadours were heere preſent with vs, we receiued him with the ſame courteſie wherewith we receiued them, making ſtay of him, vntill that they might all three be together diſmiſſed. And for becauſe that his Embaſſage was vndertaken for the furtherance of the common good, although it wanted the wiſhed ſucceſſe, yet wee haue thought it good to giue thankes vnto your Maieſtie therefore, and in moſt friendly manner to greet you by this your ſaid Embaſſadour, whom we highly commend vnto you, for that for the time hee heere ſtayed in our Court, he ſo behaued himſelfe, as that hee well deſerued both our and your Maieſties fauour, whereof wee wiſh him to bee partaker. Almightie God bleſſe your Maieſtie with all felicitie, and long to his good pleaſure preſerue the ſame.

Theſe Embaſſadors with theſe letters thus diſmiſſed, one of them went into Polonia, and there declared vnto the king the great loue and affection of the Perſian king towards him, offering vnto him all loue and kindneſſe: firſt requeſting him, That he would ioyn with his Maieſtie in all friendſhip and brotherly loue: and then, that hee would take vp armes againſt the Turke their common enemy: promiſing on his Maſters behalfe, That he ſhould not lay down armes vntill that enemie were vtterly brought to nought and deſtroied, ſo that the Chriſtian Princes would on the other ſide likewiſe impugne him. This was a ſtrange meſſage, and not before heard of in Polonia, where, for all that, the meſſenger was courteouſly and bountifully entertained, and afterward with good words put in hope of obtaining what he had requeſted, was ſo honourably diſmiſſed.

The Turks and Hungarian Rebels by the Imperials ouerthrowne.

But leauing theſe Embaſſadours vnto their long journey: to returne againe into Hungarie. A great number of the Turkes and Hungarian Rebels meeting together at Hidweg, had a purpoſe ſecretly to haue ſurpriſed and oppreſſed the Imperiall ſouldiers in their campe. Of which their purpoſe they in good time aduertiſed, and therefore keeping good watch and ward, ſo receiued the Turks and Rebels at their comming, contrarie to their expectation, as that after a ſmall fight they cauſed them to betake themſelues to flight: whome the Imperials ſo hotly purſued towards Caniſia, that they ſlew of them aboue a thouſand, tooke about two hundred more of them priſoners, with fifteene hundred horſe which they carried away with them; and ſo hauing left ſufficient garriſons on that ſide of the countrey towards Caniſia, returned themſelues towards Vienna.

The treatie of peace with the Turks and Rebels began.

In the meane time the Commiſſioners from the Emperor being met together at Comora, about the treatie of peace with the Turks and the Hungarians, the ſixth of December receiuing letters from the Baſſa of Buda, certaine of them the next day after went by water downe the riuer of Danubius to Buda: where they being honorably receiued, and hauing much and long talke with the Baſſa concerning a peace, found little difficulty therin, but that the Turkes ſaid they could thereof determine nothing, without the preſence and conſent of the Hungarians. With which anſwer they full of hope returned backe again to Comora, as did alſo Sigiſmund Forgat with the like hope of peace from Botſcay. At which time Botſcay beeing about to depart from the aſſemby of Kirpay, backe againe to Caſſouia, gaue power and authoritie to Illiſhaſcius for the furthering of the treatie for peace: who hauing receiued letters of ſafe conduct from the Archduke Matthias, about the end of December, together with his wife went to Vienna: who beeing admitted vnto the Archdukes preſence, and hauing had an houre and halfes talke with him, and euerie day after conferred with the counſellors from eight a clocke to twelue, at length compoſed all difficulties and differences touching the treatie of peace, excepting fiue articles onely concerning religion, the free exerciſe whereof the Hungarians in any wiſe required; ſo that now men began to conceiue ſome good hope of a peace to be in time concluded.

This yeare thus ending with the beginning of the treatie for peace, the next yeare begun with the wonted troubles of war, the rebellious Haiducks in Hungarie doing great harm in the vpper Hungarie, tyrannizing after their woonted manner vpon men of all ſort and condition. Where giuing diuers aſſaults vnto diuers cities, they being valiantly repulſed, were conſtrayned to retire (the Polonians and Coſſacks defending the ſame) yet did they neuertheleſſe no little harme vnto the countrey inhabitants. Whereof complaint being made vnto the King of Polonia, he by his Embaſſadour ſent to Botſcay at Caſſouia, obtained, that thoſe ſpoiling Haiducks ſhould be called backe againe out of theſe parts.

Now had Illiſhaſcius the negotiator for the treatie of peace to be made with the Rebels, ſo well dealt in that matter, as that the ſame, in the latter end of Ianuarie ſhould haue beene publiſhed at Vienna, but that certaine of the chiefe of the Clergie could not bee brought to conſent, that the free exerciſe of Religion ſhould indifferently be granted to all the people in generall, but to the Nobilitie onely. Whereupon Illiſhaſcius with the reſt of the Commiſſioners for the Hungarians, with great diſcontentment beeing about to returne home againe without any thing at all concluded, the deputies for the Emperour ſeeing that it could not bee otherwiſe brought to paſſe, at length agreed (although neuer ſo much contrarie to the liking of the Clergie men) to ſatisfie the Hungarians in this their requeſt, and that the free exerciſe as well of the reformed, as of the Romiſh Religion, ſhould be permitted to all men throughout all Hungarie, in ſuch ſort, as it had before beene in the time of the Emperours Maximilian and Ferdinand. Concerning which point for the libertie of the Religion, letters were deliuered vnto Illiſhaſcius; all the other points concerning the peace beeing put off vnto the next aſſemblie of the States of Hungarie, ſhortly after to bee holden at Presbourg.

The free exerciſe of Religion granted to the Hungarians.

About the beginning of March the Spahi at Conſtantinople had requeſted of the Viſier Baſſa, That it might be lawfull for themſelues to take vp their woonted penſion of the farmers and husbandmen here and there in the conntrey: which although it were vnto them by the Viſier Baſſa denied, who had commaundement from the great Sultan within a few dayes after, to giue euerie one of them his preſent pay in money; yet they not ſo contented, but going out of the Citie, preſumptuouſly preſumed to trouble the countrey men, and to doe the farmers great harme. For which their inſolencie, the great Sultan (the chiefe Captaines and leaders of them beeing againe returned into the Citie) cauſed them ſome to be beheaded, ſome to be hanged, and otherſome to be bound in chaines and drowned: whereby no ſmall feare was ſtrucke into the reſt of the common ſouldiers. But the rebellion in Aſia ſtill encreaſing, and the Rebels there ſecretly both fauoring and furthering the proceedings of the Perſian king, the Sultan forthwith ſent for the Viſier Baſſa, who the laſt yere had ſerued in Hungarie, to go into Aſia, to repreſſe the Rebels there, and alſo to withſtand the proceedings of the Perſian king: committing in the meane time the mannaging of the war in Hungarie vnto his Lieutenant.

The ſpahi inſolently oppreſſing the countrey people, juſtly puniſhed.

The treatie of peace both with the Turks and the Rebels, was yet in hand, whereunto how much the Turks were for their part inclined, the garriſon ſouldiers of Rab had good proofe. for the eighteenth day of March, being the day at their requeſt appointed for the treatie, and whereon the Commiſſioners on both parts there meeting together, ſhould haue furthered the negotiation of the peace, not paſt fiftie of the Turkes comming to the gate of the towne, required to bee let in, as if they had come for that purpoſe. Whome our men nothing ſuſpecting, were about to receiue them into the towne; when as a ſentinell without the towne, it being a thicke miſt, perceiued three thouſand more of the Turkes lurking there by, and forthwith giuing an alarme to thoſe of the towne, bewrayed the enemies treacherie, who thereupon retired, they of the towne diſcharging their great ordnance after them. The next moneth, about the beginning of Aprill, certaine meſſengers came from Eperia (a citie of the vpper Hungarie, yet holden for the Emperour) to Vienna, declaring the moſt miſerable ſtate of that Citie: which although the way thereunto beeing three or foure weeks before opened, it had receiued ſome good ſtore of victuall, yet now (as they ſaid) was ſo on euerie ſide by the Rebels beſet, as that no prouiſion at all could more thereunto come: hoping by that meanes to bring to paſſe, that the citiſens pinched with hunger and want of things neceſſarie, ſhould at length yeeld themſelues together with the citie into their power. By which meanes they but a little before had obtained the ſtrong towne of Tokay: wherein the famine was ſo great, that the ſouldiers had not onely eaten their ſhooes and leather jerkins, but had now alſo kild two boyes to eat, and ſome others of them had caſt lots among themſelues, which ſhould be kild for the other to eat. By which extreamitie Ruber the Gouernor of the place, was enforced to yeeld: vnto whom Botſcay, who then lay at Caſſouia, is ſaid to haue offered a great ſum of money, with many other good things, to haue taken his part; all which he moſt conſtantly refuſed, proteſting euen vnto death to continue faithfull in his obedience to the Emperour.

Rab attempted to haue been by the Turks ſurpriſed.

Eperia by the Rebels diſtreſſed.

The letters of Illiſhaſchius ſent to a notable man of Vienna.

About the ſame time Illiſhaſchius, who had before not a little laboured about the furthering of the peace in Hungarie, writ letters from Caſſouia vnto a certaine great man at Vienna; whereby hee declared, that Botſcay without the conſent of the Eſtates of Hungarie could of himſelfe determine nothing concerning the concluſion of the peace: who had oft times told him to his face, that rather than they would againe ſubmit themſelues to a forreine Gouernour, they would for euer put themſelues vnder the Turkes protection: and yet promiſed by the ſame letters, that although hee had got vnto himſelfe great diſpleaſure thereby with the Haiduckes, hee would not for all that ceaſe by all meanes to draw the States of the countrie in their next aſſembly vnto his part, ſo that that which was before concluded at Vienna concerning Religion, ſhould not againe be reuerſed: for many of them (as hee ſaid) were afraid that it would not be performed, which was there promiſed vnto the States concerning the exerciſe of their Religion. And that therefore they could not yet bee perſuaded to put themſelues from vnder the Turkes protection, vntill they ſaw themſelues ſufficiently ſecured, both for the libertie of their Religion, and the keeping of their antient priuiledges. And that they could not, nor would not endure a forreine Gouernour to rule ouer them, with whome they could not talke; nor yet ſuffer Clergie men to haue any voyces in their ciuill affaires. And therefore (hee ſaid) hee thought it verie neceſſarie that the Emperor ſhould not doubt in this point to gratifie the Hungarians. And that Tranſyluania, whereupon hee had beene hitherto enforced to beſtow ſo great coſt for the keeping thereof, beeing now left vnto Botſcay, hee ſhould appoint ſuch a Gouernour ouer Hungarie as the States of that countrey ſhould require. For that there was no hope of any peace to be made with the Turkes, except Botſcay and the States of Hungarie ſhould vndertake the treatie thereof; ſeeing that they but onely ſeeking for a peace in ſhew, were oftentimes diſcouered but to ſeeke for their owne aduantages and profits.

But concerning Illiſhaſchius himſelfe, the Hungarian Rebels ſeeing him ſo much to labour about the concluding of a peace, in ſcorne called him by the by-name of Cripeliſhacius, as hee that too much enclined vnto the Germans: which by-name he tooke in ſo ill part, as that hee departed ſtraight to Eperia, with a purpoſe not to haue beene preſent at the next aſſemblie of the States: but beeing againe pacified, and by Botſcay called backe, hee made ſuch a notable ſpeech vnto the States in their next aſſemblie, that all men now began both to hope and wiſh more for peace than they had before done.

In the meane time the Turkes in great number beeing gathered together to Belgrade, expected the end of this treatie for peace, and letters from the great Sultan to Botſcay were intercepted alſo: whereby hee aduiſeth him to proceed in his purpoſe, and ioyning with his powers, to ſeize vpon Auſtria, Bohemia, and Morauia; for that hee could be contented with Hungarie and Tranſyluania, and leaue the reſt of the Prouinces vnto Botſcay as his inheritance.

The Haiducks inceſed againſt the Turkes and Tartars, truſt neither of them.

The Tartars about this time were about to make a road into Polonia; but when as they with their oft incurſions had not a little troubled the Haiduckes alſo in the vpper Hungarie, they reſolued amongſt themſelues to ioyne their forces together, and to fight as well againſt the Turkes as the Tartars, and from thenceforth neither to truſt the one nor the other.

Heereupon, when as the Turkes in great number came to aſſault Lippa, a towne of the Haiduckes, they forſaking the towne, fortified the caſtle with certaine companies of armed men, and afterwards beſtowed many others heere and there in caues and cellars in the towne, and layed great ſtore of gunpouder in the ſtreets. Vnto which towne the Turkes comming, and finding the gates open, and none to reſiſt them, haſted to haue taken the Caſtle. But in the meane time, the powder which the Haiduckes had layed taking fire, blew vp a number of them, and they which lay hid in the caues and cellars forthwith breaking out, ſlew of them whomſoeuer they met, and ſo made of the Turkes a great ſlaughter, and againe cleered the towne.

The Eſtates of Auſtria conſidering the great harmes they had in theſe late troubles receiued, as well from the Hungarian Rebels, as from the Emperors mutinous ſouldiers; and by experience taught how dangerous a thing it was for them to reſt vpon other mens protection, being vnto them ſtrangers: reſolued now in a generall aſſemblie of the Eſtates by them about this time holden, to take vpon themſelues the defence of their country, againſt ſuch ſudden incurſions and tumults of the mutinous ſouldiers, and no more to relie vpon forreine protection, ſtill to ſeeke when they had moſt need thereof. Wherefore to aſſure themſelues in their own ſtrength, they with a generall conſent agreed to haue alwaies in readineſſe two thouſand horſmen and eight thouſand footmen, to be maintained of the common charge; fiftie of the countrey peaſants ſtill finding of one of the ſaid ſouldiers.

And much about this time, viz. the third of Iune, Illiſhaſcius a great man amongſt the Rebels, and yet the greateſt furtherer of the peace, (as appeared by his doings and by that wee haue before of him written) hauing before obtained letters of ſafe conduct from the Archduke, came now againe with his wife alſo to Vienna, there more at large to conferre vpon the Articles for a peace to be concluded, with ſuch as were on the Emperours behalfe for that purpoſe deputed. Where comming to conferre and talke vpon the matter, hee was ſo croſſed by Nicholas Biſhop of Vienna, who hitherto had beene preſent in Counſell together with the reſt of the Commiſſioners (a great enemie vnto the peace, in reſpect of the article concerning the libertie of Religion) hee was I ſay by him ſo croſſed, as that there was no hope of any thing to bee for the common quiet concluded, ſo long as hee was there preſent. For which cauſe he, on both ſides and of all men deſirous of the peace diſliked, was in the Archdukes nanne willed no more to come into the Counſell for the diſturbing of the peace. In which negotiation for the concluding of the peace, Illiſhaſcius had taken ſuch paines in trauelling too and fro betwixt the Archduke then lying at Vienna, and Botſcay with the States of Hungarie then lying at Caſſouia, and ſo debated the matter on both ſides, that all things beeing as good as agreed vpon; for a full concluſion of all matters, he himſelfe, together with George Humanoius, Francis Magot, Sebaſtian Tockell, Staniſlaus Turſon, and others, with two hundred horſe, and two and thirtie waggons, in all foure hundred perſons, the ſeuenth of September came to Vienna with fiftie Huſſars following of them: Shortly after whoſe comming, the treatie for peace was earneſtly begun with often meſſengers paſſing too and fro betwixt Vienna and Caſſouia to Botſcay lying then verie daungerouſly ſicke, vntill that all the articles of peace were neere about the fourteenth of September fully on both parts agreed vpon: moſt difference ariſing about the article for the free exerciſe of Religion. For although it was before declared, that men might haue the free exerciſe of religion: yet the Hungarians recalling that generall word of Religion vnto a particularitie, would needes haue it ſet downe, that men might haue the free exerciſe of thoſe Religions which are at this day called the Lutheran, Caluinian, and Romiſh religion: neither would they conclude any peace vntill they were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied. Which peace ſo concluded, the next day after, the deputies for the Hungarians ſent an embaſſador to the Viſier Baſſa at Buda, to certifie him of all their proceedings, and to requeſt him not as yet to attempt any thing for the diſturbing of the peace: now the articles whereupon the peace was concluded, were theſe:

The Biſhop of Vienna a great enemie to the peace to haue been concluded betwixt the emperor & his diſcontented ſubiects.

A peace concluded betwixt the emperor & his diſcontented ſubiects of the vpper Hungarie.

Firſt, That from thenceforth it ſhould be lawfull for euerie man throughout the Kingdome of Hungarie, to haue the free vſe of his Religion, and to beleeue what he would.

2 That if the Hungarians ſo thought good, they might chuſe a Palatine for their Gouernour, and that in the meane time the Archduke Matthias ſhould no more vſe the title of a Gouernour, but of a Viceroy.

3 That the crowne of Hungarie ſhould ſtill be left in the Emperours keeping.

4 That the Biſhops that were nobly diſcended in Hungarie, and had lands of their owne, ſhould from thenceforth be admitted into the Counſell, but the other Biſhops not ſo to be receiued.

5 That Botſcay for himſelfe and his heires male ſhould for euer hold Tranſyluania.

6 That the ſame Countrey of Tranſyluania ſhould bee ſtill ſubiect vnto the Kingdome of Hungarie.

7 That for his Armes he ſhould beare three Royall Crownes and three open Helmets.

8 That he ſhould no more afterwards ſtile himſelfe Prince, but Lord of part of the Kingdome of Hungarie.

9 That they ſhould pay the Haiduckes their wages which had leuied them.

10 That the harmes done on both ſides ſhould for euer be forgotten.

11 That Bohmia, Morauia, Sileſia, Lauſniſium, and Auſtria, ſhould not onely with their Letters and Seales confirme the articles, but alſo ſweare at Vienna to keepe the ſame ſo far as ſhould concerne them.

12 That the Hungarians ſhould likewiſe ſend ſome to Vienna, who in their behalfe ſhould with their Letters, Seales, and Oathes, confirme and ratifie theſe articles.

13 That the aſſemblie of the Eſtates of Hungarie, ſhould be referred vntill a more conuenient time for them.

14 That all theſe things being done, this agreement ſhould be publiquely confirmed and enrolled in the Records of the Kingdome of Hungarie.

15 That it ſhould be lawfull for the Hungarians, by their Embaſſadors to inuite the Princes of the Empire to the approuing and confirming of theſe articles.

Which fifteene articles were on the Emperours part ſubſcribed by Tranſam, Mollart, Sigifrid, Pruner, Lichtenſtein, and Kreuberge: and on the part of the Hungarians, by Illiſhaſcius, Peter Erkod, George Turſo, and Sigiſmund Forgat, and others.

The twentieth of September following, the Embaſſadour for the Hungarians and of Botſcay, beeing admitted vnto the preſence of the Archduke Matthias, obtained of him pardon for the forepaſſed rebellion, and all that was therein done: vnto whome ſecuritie for the ſame was afterward giuen by the Prouinces; thereby alſo to aſſure them, that they ſhould not be therefore afterwards troubled. But yet for all that was before done, the title of the Prince of Tranſyluania was left vnto Botſcay for terme of his life: who feeling his ſickneſſe dayly to encreaſe, would oftentimes ſay, That hee could willingly die, ſo that it might pleaſe God before his death, to giue him leaue to excuſe himſelfe of his rebellion before the whole Romane Empire. And ſo about the end of September all the aforeſaid Embaſſadours for the Hungarians and Botſcay, beeing aſſembled into the Caſtle of Vienna, together with the Emperours Councell, and certaine other Noblemen of the Prouinces belonging vnto the Emperour, receiued euerie one of them the Articles of the peace copied out, and faire written in parchment: which done, they returned euerie one to his owne dwelling. But Illiſhaſcius went from thence to Neuhuſe, to be preſent at the peace to bee afterwards made with the Turkes alſo: from whence hee afterwards writ Letters vnto the Viſier Baſſa, to requeſt him, not as yet to attempt any thing againſt the Emperours Prouinces, but peaceably and quietly to expect his Commiſſioners, which were ſhortly to come vnto him.

But in the meane time whileſt this peace was thus in concluding, certaine Tartars at Conſtantinople, in their inſolencie ſet fire vpon a certaine Iewes houſe, whereof aroſe ſuch a terrible fire, as burnt not only many houſes, but a great number of the Iewes themſelues alſo: the harme there done beeing eſteemed at fortie hundred thouſand duckats. In which tumult and noiſe of the people running too and fro, and quenching of the fire, the great Sultan hauing a fall from his horſe, was thereof for a while ſicke.

The Turks ſeeking to ſurpriſe others, themſelues ſurpriſed

The Turks of Caniſia alſo hauing conſpired with the Captaine of the leſſer Comora, came to haue ſurpriſed the ſame. But the garriſon ſouldiers there, hauing before had a ſuſpition thereof, ſuffered ſo many of the Turkes as they knew they were able to ouercome, to enter; and ſo ſhutting the gates of the Citie, kild them euerie mothers ſonne, the reſt which were without, returning againe to Caniſia.

The Commiſſioners for the emperor, to intreat of peace with the Turks came to Preſburg.

Peace thus (as is aforeſaid) concluded with the Hungarians, George Turſon, Nicholas Iſtuan, Iohn Mollart, and Althem, with ſome others, the Emperours Commiſſioners for a peace to be made with the Turkes, went to Comora; Sigifrid Collonitz and Budin following them with the armie; for as yet the ſaid Commiſſioners durſt not altogether truſt the Turkes for intercepting of them by the way. Which Commiſſioners carried with them Solyman the Baſſa of Buda, who had now beene ſeuen yeares kept priſoner in the Caſtle of Vienna, and Aly Baſſa, both brauely apparelled in blew ſilke; ſix waggons following of them, wherein were carried certaine preſents for the great Sultan, to wit, a moſt curious clocke, certaine taine faire pieces of plate, an hundred thouſand duckets, with diuers other things of great value.

But whileſt they there ſtayed, expecting to heare from the Viſier Baſſa then at Buda; a ſudden inſolent accident fell out, like enough to haue broken off againe the peace, alreadie made with the Hungarians, as alſo to haue vtterly cut off the treatie of peace to be had with the Turks, and to haue ſet them all together by the eares againe. For albeit that the firſt article of the peace made with the Hungarians, was, That euery man ſhould haue the free exerciſe of his Religion; yet the eighth day of October, about three of the clocke in the afternoon, when as a certaine Hungarian Lutheran Preacher was in the pulpit preaching to the people in a Church, in the ſuburbs of Comora, Buchem and Kneuie, two Captaines, comming from dinner with certaine of their ſeruants more than halfe drunke, with their ſwords drawn ruſht into the Church, and draue out thence the Preacher, vpon whom Captaine Buchem his Trumpetter alſo diſcharged a piſtoll, and raiſed ſuch a tumult in the Church, that diuers children were troden to death vnder foot, and the reſt put in great feare of their liues.

The Peace already concluded with the Hungarians, like enough to haue again bin broken off throw the inſolencie of ſome few diſordered perſons.

Which inſolent fact ſo mooued the Hungarians, that Turſon and Budian, there preſent with the reſt of the Commiſſioners, readie to haue gone about the treatie of the peace, would needs the next day haue departed from Comora, and were hardly by Mollart and Colloniz entreated to ſtay; Buchem and Kneuie the two Captaines being bound to their appearance for the anſwering of the mater, and the trumpetter with yrons on his heeles clapt in priſon. But the newes hereof being carried to Neuhuſel, and (as the manner of report is) by fame made far greater than it was, as, That an hundred and fiftie perſons was ſlaine in the Church, there aroſe ſuch a tumult among the Hungarians there, as that Illiſhaſchius with the reſt of the Captaines had much ado to quiet and appeaſe the ſame: who joyning with the Turks of Strigonium, and the Haiducks of the Iſland, had determined now by night to haue inuaded Comora, where the outrage was committed, had not Pogrania the elder (a man of great grauitie) comming from thence, declared vnto Illiſhaſchius and the reſt of the Captaines, all the matter as it was done; vpon whoſe relation the whole tumult was againe appeaſed. But for as much as the two aforeſaid Captaines, bound to their appearance, were by night fled from Comora to Vienna, the Hungarians were verie earneſt to haue them ſeuerely puniſhed, as breakers of the firſt article of the Peace, concerning Religion. Botſcay in the meane time beheaded Catayus his Chancellor, who had gone about to haue poyſoned him, in hope after his death to haue been Prince of Tranſyluania himſelfe; placing Iohn Ianuſy in his ſtead, and giuing him Catay his lands.

Botſcay causeth his Chancellour to be beheaded.

Peace now made with the Hungarians (as is afore ſaid) and Commiſſioners appointed for a treatie of peace to be had with the Turks alſo, (whereunto the Viſier Baſſa, then lying at Buda, was as forward as any, being ſo commanded from the Great Sultan his Maſter) there wanted but a place commodious for the ſaid Commiſſioners, without ſuſpition of danger, and indifferent for them all to meet in. Whereupon Cæſar Gallen a man of great experience in ſuch matters, with ſome other Captaines, were appointed to finde out ſome ſuch conuenient place for them to meet in: who hauing viewed many, at length made choice of one within halfe a league of Comora, ſo fit for that purpoſe, as if nature had prouided it for the ſame. The great riuer of Danubius being there diuided into three parts, made therein three Iſlands, all compaſſed round with the arms thereof, into which Iſlands the Commiſſioners for the Emperour, for the Turke, and for the Hungarians, might come without let one of another, to entreat of their affaires, and ſo in little boats prepared for that purpoſe, paſſe ouer one to another as their occaſions required. Into this place, ſo commodious for all three parties, the Deputies for the Emperour the fiue and twentieth day of October, conducted by the horſemen of Manſfeld, Hohenlo, and Bonchimin. After whom followed Illiſhaſcius, and the other Deputies for the Hungarians, aſſiſted with the nobilitie of Hungarie, all attending the comming of the Great Sultans Commiſſioners; who likewiſe immediatly after came, being brought vp the riuer in foure and twentie braue ſhips well appointed.

The Commiſſioners for the emperour, the Turks, and the Hungarians, meet together to entreat of a peace.

Theſe Commiſſioners being thus apart arriued in the Iſlands, began firſt to conſult by themſelues euerie one, of their ſeueral affaires and buſineſſes, and afterwards many times meeting together, with much grauitie conſulted and conferred of the beſt wayes and meanes for the making of a good and aſſured peace for the appeaſing of theſe wars: which euery one of them and all together, to that end employing the vttermoſt of their endeauours, at laſt the nineteenth of Nouember it was betwixt all the three parties fully agreed vpon and concluded, and hoſtages on all parts giuen one to another, with oathes and promiſes ſolemnly on all ſides giuen and receiued, for the inuiolate keeping and obſeruing of the ſame; the articles whereupon the ſaid peace was concluded being theſe:

Articles of the Peace concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Great Sultan.

Firſt, That the Emperor and the Great Sultan, in all their Letters, Diſpatches, Inſtruments, and Embaſſages, ſhould not ſtile themſelues by any other names or additions, but by the names of Welbeloued Father and Sonne; to wit, the Emperour calling the Great Sultan his Sonne; and the Great Sultan the Emperour (in reſpect of his yeares) his Father.

That in the beginning of their Letters they ſhould take vpon them the name and quality of Emperor, and not of King, reſpectiuely one of them to another.

That theſe two Emperors ſhould take order, that the realme of Hungarie and the Archdukedome of Auſtria, might be in reſt, peace, and tranquilitie, and altogether deliuered and aſſured from all incurſions, oppreſsions, and outrages of the men of war on both parties.

That it ſhould be lawfull for the King of Spaine, if he ſo thought good, to enter into this treatie of peace, without the oppoſition or let of one or of the other of both theſe Emperors in any ſort.

That the Tartars, and all other people vſually wont to come in armes into Hungarie, ſhould be compriſed within this treatie of the peace, ſo to be diſarmed of all power, by their meanes to do harme within the realme of Hungarie, and they there aſſured from their violences and robberies.

That euery one both on the one part and on the other, ſhould forbeare from making incurſions and pillages, and enterpriſes of war, and from all acts of hoſtility one againſt another; and yet euery one neuertheleſſe to haue power to purſue theeues and robbers, and ſuch others ſeeking after bootie, to the diſturbing of the peace, and iniurying of the Commonweale: whereof euery man ſhould haue power to giue knowledge, to the intent by common force to ſuppreſſe them, and to cauſe them to recompence the wrongs and harmes by them done.

That all places, Caſtles, Townes, and Forts, ſhould remaine without attempt either on the one part or on the other, whether it were by force, ſurpriſe, or treaſon, and ſo likewiſe the goods, families, and cattel of the countrey-men, which were of their territories and iuriſdiction; Botſcay ſtill holding all that was lately to him granted by the treatie of Vienna.

That all priſoners taken in the wars ſhould be ſet at libertie, but eſpecially ſuch as had been taken in Townes and Citadels, which by their valour and courage they ſought to haue defended; and the other priſoners to be deliuered by exchange and ranſome, as ſhould be moſt expedient and eaſie for both parties.

That all controuerſies happening as well on this ſide as beyond the riuer of Danubius, ſhould be peaceably ended by the iudgement of the Gouernor of Rab, of the Baſſa of Buda, of the Gouernour of Sclauonia, and of the Gouernors of other places; and that if they ſhould chance to be of ſuch important weight and conſequence, as that they could not by theſe Magiſtrats be determined and compoſed, that they ſhould in that caſe be reſerued to be decided by their Imperial Majeſties: and that it ſhould be lawfull both for the one partie and the other to repaire and build the places ruined, but not to build places of new, which might preiudice either the one part or the other.

That Amurath the Viſier Baſſa ſhould ſend his meſſengers with Preſents to the Archduke Matthias, and that the Emperor ſhould diſpatch an Embaſſador toward the Great Sultan with 200000 Duckets, and that the Great Sultan likewiſe ſhould ſend his Embaſſador to Prague with great and rich Preſents to the Emperor.

That this peace ſhould begin in the yeare 1607, and continue for the ſpace of twentie yeares, and that one of the Emperors ſhould ſend vnto the other euery three yeares their Embaſſadors with their honorable and rich Preſents, according to the pleaſure and power of their Majeſties.

That all the Emperors ſucceſſors, as alſo thoſe of the Kingdome of Hungarie, ſhould be comprehended within this agreement of peace, together with all their kinſemen, allyes, and confederats, as likewiſe thoſe of the Great Sultans alſo.

That the Christians ſhould againe haue the Citie of Vacia, which they ſhould at their pleaſure keepe and fortifie, and that Strigonium, with all the Villages thereto belonging, ſhould remaine vnto the Great Sultan; yet ſo, as that no man ſhould be with any new tribute oppreſſed; and that ſuch as had before been free from paying of tribute, ſhould ſtill keepe the ſame priuiledges.

And that the Turkes ſhould not exact their tributes by the point of their ſwords, but by the way of Iuſtice, which they ſhould commit vnto the diſcretion of Iudges and Receiuers, to that end appointed, that ſo it might be payed without oppreſſing of the people, except haply they which ſhould pay it, vpon preſumption ſhould denie it, or too long deferre the payment of it: in which caſe it ſhould be lawfull both for the one ſide and the other, to vſe ſuch meanes as ſhould ſeeme vnto them good for the obtaining thereof.

Theſe are the Articles of this Peace, which God turne to the glorie of his Name, and the benefit of the Chriſtian Commonweale; and for which all the Townes of Hungarie made great joy and triumph, which they declared by the thundering of their Cannons, which they in great number diſcharged, with many other ſolemnities and triumphs. The Commiſſioners themſelues in token of their conceiued joy, magnificently feaſted one another alſo: which the Turks firſt began; and not content to haue made them great cheere, gaue vnto our Commiſſioners great Preſents alſo: for the Baſſa of Buda gaue vnto Mollart, Althem, Turſon, Iſtuan, Collonitz, Budian, Hendoc, Cæſar Gallen, and Eleſchin, braue and couragious horſes moſt gallantly furniſhed; and to the reſt exceeding rich garments and tapeſtrie hangings of great value. And as at the time of this feaſt, the troupe of Mansfeld had by many ſallies and vollies of ſhot giuen great pleaſure vnto the Turks as they ſate at the table; Alla Baſſa to declare the contentment and pleaſure he had therein receiued, ſent to the captaine of this troupe two hundred duckets, which he would not accept, requeſting in ſtead of them to haue deliuered vnto him a certaine captaine by the Turks then kept priſoner; whom the Baſſa cauſed freely to be deliuered vnto him, and withall ſent backe againe the two hundred duckets to be diuided among the ſouldiours; which for all that Mansfeld refuſed, ſending them backe againe vnto the Baſſa. After which actions of joy and peace, euery man returned home well content and pleaſed.

Great joy and triumph in Hungarie for the peace concluded with the Turke.

Theſe things thus done, and the peace confirmed, the Baſſa of Buda forthwith ſent his Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, certifying the Great Sultan of the peace now made with the Chriſtians; who thereof conceiuing great joy, with a number of Ianizaries and others, in great magnificence went to the Church, to giue thanks therefore vnto his Prophet Mahomet, and ſpent the next day with great ſport and pleaſure, purpoſing from thenceforth to turne all his force and power for the ſuppreſſing of his Rebels in Aſia, and the ſubduing of the Perſian King.

The Great Sultan giueth thanks to his Prophet Mahomet, for the peace concluded with the Chriſtians.

Now albeit that there was a peace of late concluded with the Hungarians at Vienna (as is before declared) yet diuers ſtirres and Tumults were neuertheleſſe by the Haiducks in diuers places of the vpper Hungarie ſtill raiſed: inſomuch that about the end of Nouember the Inhabitants of the Countie of Bocotſie were through their inſolencies enforced to joyne battel with them, wherein a number were on both ſides ſlaine, and three countrey villages burnt: ſo that it ſhould ſeeme, no peace can be ſo well and indifferently made, but that ſome will be ſtill troubling and impugning the ſame.

Shortly after, viz. the thirteenth of December, Botſcay calling together an aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungarie, propounded to them to be conſidered of, firſt, That the late reuolt, almoſt generally made throughout all Hungarie, with all the ſtirres and troubles thereby raiſed, had all been hitherto to no other end made, but for the defence of their religion, and the maintenance of their antient Libertie: Then, That whereas they by their general good liking had made choice of him for their Prince, and that hitherto he had done nothing without their knowledge and conſent; and that euen now at this preſent hee was by their conſent readie to depart from the Caſtles and free Cities in the vpper Hungarie; and had now ſent his Letters vnto the Archduke Matthias, for the ſending of his Deputies to receiue them; whether hee ſhould from thenceforth relinquiſh the title of a Prince, or not. And that for as much as no warre could be made without great harme doing, that hee would therefore for the auoyding of further troubles about ſuch matters, that a Decree ſhould be made, That all ſuch wrongs and iniuries ſhould be forgiuen and forgotten, and that euery man ſhould ſtill hold all ſuch goods, whether they were moueable or immoueable, during the time of this late war. He wiſhed them alſo in the next general aſſemblie of the States, with all their power and endeauor, to vrge the repealing of the Article concerning the burning of Heretiques, with all other Articles contrarie to their Religion: and not to remit any thing concerning the choice of their Palatine, as had in former time been vſed: neither in this next general aſſemblie of the Eſtates to neglect any thing which might ſeeme to concern their priuiledges and libertie. And that therefore they ſhould be carefull to ſend thither wiſe and powerfull men, ſuch as ſhould not eaſily be ouercome with the clamors and outcries of the contrarie part. At length he wiſhed them to conſider of this alſo, how a true and ſincere confederation might be made betwixt Hungary and Tranſiluania, ſo that a ſafe and quiet traffique and commerce might in both places be vſed.

Theſe things thus done, Botſcay his ſickneſſe ſtill more and more encreaſing vpon him, ſo at length preuailed, that it made an end of him, to the great ſorrow and griefe of all the people in general, who had him in great honour and regard. He died at Caſſouia the 30 of December, in the yeare 1606. He was honorably diſcended, and a man of great ſpirit, ambitious, wiſe, and politique, a great louer of his countrey, but an extreme enemie vnto the Germans, and their gouernment in Hungarie.

A little before his death, he earneſtly perſuaded Iohn Iannſie his Chancellor to continue in his allegeance to the Emperor, and not to raiſe new ſtirres, or ſo much as in him was, not to ſuffer any to be raiſed. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch his wholeſome counſell not regarded, there were ſome who immediatly after his death were about to haue raiſed new forces, for to haue ſeiſed vpon Tranſyluania, and ſo to haue ſtirred vp new troubles. For preuenting whereof, Matthias the Archduke forthwith ſent a meſſenger vnto the States of the vpper Hungary; aduiſing them, That the great harmes and miſeries conſidered which that part of Hungarie had of late felt end endured, almoſt to the vtter ruine and deſtruction thereof (which proceeded not ſo much from the wars with the Turks, as from their owne ciuile tumults and ſeditions) they ſhould from thenceforth giue themſelues to quietneſſe and peace, and not againe inſolently to preſcribe vnto the Emperor what to do, or how he was to diſpoſe of the countrey of Tranſyluania; aſſuring them, that the Emperour would not hereafter winke at ſuch their rebellious plots and deuices, but forthwith turne all his power and forces to the vtter deſtruction and rooting out of ſuch rebellious and ſeditious perſons, the diſturbers of the common peace and quiet. By which the Archdukes warning, ſome, otherwiſe readie enough to haue raiſed new ſtirres and troubles, were not therein ſo forward as otherwiſe haply they would haue bin, but kept themſelues quiet.

The Emperour not to be blamed for making peace with the Turke.

Now many there were (and yet are) which much maruelled, that the Chriſtian Emperour would thus make peace with the Great Sultan (as is aforeſaid) he being then ſo much troubled with wars, both againſt his owne Rebels, and the Perſian King, in Aſia, moſt part of his forces being turned that way; ſo that a fitter time, or of more aduantage, could not haue beene wiſhed for the Emperor to haue done great matters againſt him in, and not onely to haue holden his owne (which he did not) in Hungarie, but to haue recouered ſome good part of his loſſes there before receiued alſo. And indeed true it is, that the time then well ſerued for both: but what auaileth opportunitie without power? And had the Hungarians (the greateſt ſtrength the Emperour hath hitherto had for the defence of that little which is yet left of that ſo great a kingdome) been at quiet and at his command, and he himſelfe a Prince which had reſted vpon his owne ſtrength and power, euer at his pleaſure to haue been raiſed, and as need ſhould require ſupplied, without depending vpon his friends and allyes, then haply it might haue bin in him accounted a great ouerſight, to haue omitted and ouerſlipped ſo faire an opportunitie. But the Hungarians being then not only reuolted from him, but taking part with the Turks, and the Turks with them, and he of himſelfe with his owne power not able to hold the field againſt them, or well to maintaine a defenſiue warre; and his friends and allyes, his wonted and greateſt ſtayes, then at his greateſt need failing of him alſo, what ſhould he in ſuch a caſe do but as he did? to accept of a reaſonable peace whileſt he might haue it; eſpecially againſt ſuch an enemie, as whoſe whole power being turned againſt him, might haue eaſily endangered his whole eſtate. For it is not reaſonably to be thought, how the Emperour ſhould of

A of himſelfe, without the great aid of the other Chriſtian Princes, his friends and allies, be able to withſtand the huge and dreadfull power of the Othoman Emperour: as (without ominous preſage be it ſpoken) it is to be feared it will too true appeare, whenſoeuer his wars and troubles in the Eaſt being ended, he ſhall againe turne his forces this way toward the Weſt.

Now Botſcay was no ſooner dead, but that ſome others of the Nobilitie both of Hungarie and Tranſyluania (happily no leſſe ambitious than was he) began by diuers means to ſeeke after and to aſpire to that principalitie. Of whom, though ſome either with the weakneſſe of their owne meanes or with the threats of Matthias the Archduke deterred, ceaſed further to ſeeke after it: yet were there ſome others, who better ſupported, and nothing afraid of the Archdukes great words, laboured vnder hand to haue obtained it. For the croſſing of whome, B and the auoiding of further troubles to be raiſed by theſe ambitious competitours, certaine of the Nobilitie of Tranſyluania gathered together at Claudionople the twelfth of Februarie, made choice of Sigiſmund Ragotſie for their Gouernor and their Prince of Tranſyluania, and the more to aſſure him of their loue and affection towards him, bound themſelues vnto him by the oath of their allegiance ſolemnely taken in the chiefe Church there. And afterward ſent meſſengers to the Archduke Matthias at Vienna, to certifie him what they had done, and to excuſe themſelues thereof: who comming to Presburg the twelfth of March, there openly proteſted this election of Ragotſie for their Prince to haue been made, not for that they were about to rebell, or to reuolt from the Emperour, whome they would alwayes acknowledge for their Soueraigne Lord; but for that their neceſſitie ſo required, many of the Nobilitie C both of Tranſyluania and of Hungarie gaping after this Principalitie, and going about, for the obtaining thereof, to raiſe new ſtirres and troubles. Howbeit, the ſame Ragotſie afterward doubting not to be able, without great trouble and danger, beſides the Emperors diſpleaſure, to hold the ſame Principalitie, of his own accord about a yeare after gaue the ſame vp again, and got himſelfe out of the way to Sarentum: who was no ſooner gone, but that Gabriel Bathor was about to haue ſtept into his place: vnto whome the States of Tranſyluania ſent word by two of the Noblemen, That the free election of the Prince belonged to them, and that therefore he ſhould not ſeeke by force to entrude himſelfe into the Principalitie, but quietly to come vnto the election, and not to bring with him aboue a thouſand horſemen, and fiue hundred foot.

Sigiſmund Ragotſie choſen prince of Tranſyluania, afterward yeeldeth vp the ſame Principalitie againe.

D About this time the ſtrong towne of Neuhuſe (otherwiſe called Neuheuſel) the laſt yeare ſo hardly woon by the Hungarian Rebels, was againe deliuered to Sigefrid Collonitz for the Emperour; who ſhortly after comming to Vienna, brought newes of a great number of the Turkes to haue riſen vp in rebellion at Belgrade, to haue rifled the towne, and to haue burnt another towne, called Aliſchria, downe to the ground, and ſo with a great prey to be gone ouer to the Rebels: and alſo Redeius, Botſcay his Lieutenant, in going to take poſſeſſion of certaine lands giuen him by Botſcay, to haue been by his owne tenants, lying in wait for him vpon a ſtrait paſſage, ſlaine.

Neuhuſe again deliuered vnto the Emperour.

Amongſt the articles of the peace before concluded betwixt the Emperor and the Great Sultan, one was for the mutuall ſending of Preſents one of them vnto another: With which E Preſents, when as the Embaſſadour, by the Emperour appointed for the carriage of the ſame to Conſtantinople, from day to day deferred to ſet forward, the Turkes and Tartars began to doubt, or elſe ſeemed to doubt, of the good meaning of the Chriſtians, for the obſeruing of the aforeſaid peace; and thereupon began againe not onely to roame abroad into the territories of the Chriſtians, but alſo cauſed the pledges left at Buda for the obſeruing of the peace, to be hardly handled and clapt faſt in priſon: whom when as the Baſſa of Buda ſhortly after ſuffered again a little to walke abroad, the proud Ianizaries were therewith ſo much offended that riſing in a tumult, they had almoſt ſlaine the Baſſa with ſtones, heaping vpon him many reproachfull words, and vnto his face calling him traitor and betrayer of his Prince and countrey, one of which pledges they grieuouſly wounded alſo. Which their inſolencie the F Baſſa in ſome ſort to chaſtice, and to deterre them from doeing the like againe, cauſed certaine of them the night following to be ſecretly taken, and beeing bound, to be ſo caſt into the riuer of Danubius. And yet ſhortly after, they purpoſing to make a road vpon the Chriſtians, to colour ſuch harmes as they ſhould therein doe, and to lay all the blame thereof vpon the Chriſtians, and to excuſe themſelues, they procured the Baſſa to write vnto the Archduke Matthias, of great wrongs done vnto the Turkes by the Chriſtians, when as there was no ſuch thing at all: the effect of which letters were, That whereas it was in the articles of peace ſet downe and agreed, that both parties ſhould abſtaine from roads and incurſions of each others countries, yet that the Chriſtians for all that had aboue an hundred times ſince the concluſion of the peace made roads into diuers territories of the Turkes, and ſlaine many of them: but eſpecially they of Leouen and Setſchin, who (as they ſaid) had ſlaine diuers Turkiſh merchants of Peſth, and taken from them great ſums of money, as they had alſo taken from them of Potſen a hundred and twentie horſes, with diuers other cattell. Beſides that, there were (as he ſaid) foure Turks more by the Chriſtians ſlaine, neere vnto Caniſa, and eight and twentie more taken priſoners: and that in the mid way betwixt Hatwan and Buda, fiue and twentie Turkes moe were ſlaine, and their horſes, with all that they had beſide, carried away. Which things for that they tended to the breach of the peace, he could not (as he ſaid) but aduertiſe his Highneſſe of, for that he thought the Chriſtian captaines vpon the borders of their territories to be men that hated peace, and to ſeeke by their excurſions, as heretofore they had done, ſo now likewiſe alſo, to diſturb this good worke begun, and by all meanes to encreaſe their owne priuat profit. And that therefore ſeeing that hee and the Turkes on their part wiſhed not to attempt or goe about any thing contrarie to the articles of the peace, that ſo likewiſe the Chriſtians ſhould containe themſelues within their owne bounds, and with all ſpeed by letters to giue him to vnderſtand, whether they would keepe the peace, or not.

The Baſſa of Aleppo after 3. notable incounters with the Viſier, flyeth.

The great Sultan (as is aforeſaid) hauing made peace with the Chriſtian Emperour, and now purpoſing to turne all his forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Perſian King (as we haue oftentimes ſaid) and deſirous firſt to appeaſe thoſe his troubles at home, before hee had further to doe with the Perſian, hee ſent a meſſenger vnto the Baſſa of Aleppo, to lay downe armes, and to deliuer ouer his charge vnto another, to whom he had appointed the ſame, promiſing, that if he would ſhew himſelfe obedient vnto this his command, hee would not onely pardon him all that was paſt, but receiue him into his grace and fauour alſo. Whereunto the Baſſa anſwered, That he had neuer taken vp armes againſt his Majeſtie, but to be reuenged of the Baſſaes of Tripolis and Damaſco, his ſworne enemies; who once taken out of the way, hee would not onely yeeld himſelfe vnto his Maieſtie, but redeliuer alſo the tribute ſent him from Caire and Alexandria, by him before intercepted, and (if he ſo pleaſed to employ him) to bring great forces in his ſeruice againſt the Perſian King. With which anſwere the Sultan not contented, ſhortly after ſent the Viſier Baſſa with a great armie againſt the Rebels into Aſia; who by his wiſedome and diſcretion, more than by force of arms, hauing appeaſed the Rebels in the leſſer Aſia, and receiued certaine of the chiefeſt of them into his fauour, with an armie of an hundred and thirtie thouſand men marched directly towards Aleppo in Siria. Of whoſe comming the Baſſa of Aleppo hauing intelligence, with an armie of fortie thouſand men, moſt part of them harquebuſiers, went againſt him, and in a place of aduantage, not paſt two miles from the citie, there encountered him, and in three notable battells one after another, withſtood his whole forces. But making himſelfe readie to haue encountred him the fourth time, vnderſtanding of great aid comming to the Viſier, from the Baſſaes of Damaſco and Tripolis, he with ſpeed retired, and returning into the city, and hauing truſſed vp his treaſure, with ſuch things as he made moſt reckoning of, fled into the mountaines towards Perſia, with the greateſt part of his armie yet left ſtill following him. After which vnfortunate battell, the Viſier Baſſa with his armie comming vnto the citie, at length by force tooke the ſame, and there to the terrour of the inhabitants put to the ſword all the garriſon ſouldiers which the Baſſa had there left.

The Baſſa of Aleppo by the Great Sultan pardoned, and again receiued into fauour.

But the Baſſa purpoſing with new forces to haue encountered with the Viſier, finding himſelfe, together with his better fortune, forſaken by many of his former friends and companions, thought it beſt at length to take his refuge vnto the mercy of the great Sultan: and ſo reſolued, by letters requeſted the Viſier Baſſa to write in his behalfe vnto the Sultan, and ſo, if it were poſſible, to procure his peace. Which the Viſier hauing eaſily obtained, hee was by letters from the great Sultan ſent for to Conſtantinople, with aſſured promiſe, that hee

A ſhould be employed in ſeruice againſt the Perſian King. Vpon receit of which letters, the Baſſa with an hundred horſe ſet forward; and comming to Conſtantinople, there in the preſence of many other of the Baſſaes humbled himſelfe vnto the Sultan; who not onely kept his promiſe with him in pardoning of him; but alſo, in regard of the antient familie whereof he was diſcended, as alſo of his great valour and faire conditions, receiued him againe into his fauour, and cauſed all the goods taken from him in Syria, to be againe vnto him reſtored.

The great Sultan ſeeketh in vaine by the meanes of the Tartar to make peace with the Perſian.

Now in the meane time the great Sultan had by the meanes of the great Cham of Tartarie ſought to make peace with the Perſian King; but all in vaine: for that hee demanded the Citie of Tauris, with all the Prouinces before taken from him by the Perſians, to be againe B vnto him reſtored: which the Perſian King vtterly denied, foraſmuch as hee had now by force of armes recouered the ſame, and which in former time belonged vnto his anceſtours.
At which time the ſaid Perſian King, the more to entangle the Turke, writ vnto the King of Spaine, for the turning of his forces alſo againſt the Turke their common enemie; the Letters beeing to this effect: That though they were in Religion diuided, yet that in power and in common hatred againſt the Othoman Empire they were conioyned: and that hee, conſidering the greatneſſe of his power and armes; whereby hee was become his neighbor in the Eaſt, he could not but moſt entirely loue and fauour of him: and that therefore he had commanded all his Prouinces, as well in India as in other places thereabouts, that they ſhould ſhew vnto his ſubiects all manner of courteſie, and to demand of them no tribute. And C that hee hauing by force recouered the fortreſſe of Aden, which Solyman the Turkiſh Sultan had ſometime by treaſon ſurpriſed, hee had appointed the ſame vnto the ſeruice of the Spaniſh Gouernour dwelling in Goa. And that his pleaſure was, That all the Chriſtians dwelling in his Kingdome ſhould enjoy the ſame libertie and priuiledges which his owne faithfull ſubiects had. And beſides declared, that hee had now for ſeuen yeares ſpace made continuall warres againſt the Turkiſh Sultan, who by treaſon had taken from him the ſtrong towne of Chiamon, for the recouerie whereof hee had now diuers times ouerthrowne his armies. But foraſmuch as hee was determined to make no end of this warre, vntill he had driuen the Sultan out of thoſe parts of the Eaſt, and recouered the ſeat of Iſmael and Inchel, his anceſtours in Babylon and Caire, hee therefore requeſted him, beeing a King of D ſo great power, to joyne in league with him, and to ſend his dreadfull fleet into the Perſian gulfe; promiſing, that by ſuch meanes the Othoman power driuen out, he could eaſily make himſelfe Lord of Syria and of Ægypt. Laſt of all, hee reckoneth vp the Preſents hee ſent him; to wit, the Images of Iſmael, Inchel, and of Ionas, together with his owne, caſt in gold, and ſet with moſt rich precious ſtones and pearles; a Perſian writing table, garniſhed with faire precious ſtones, foure dogs by nature wonderfully ſpotted with red, yellow, and blew ſpots, two pieces of Arras adorned with moſt precious ſtones and pearle, wherein the worthie acts of him that great Tamerlane were liuely to bee ſeene: foure hunters hornes verie ſmooth and richly garniſhed: twelue moſt gallant plumes of feathers of diuers colours: ſix drinking glaſſes which could not be broken, and couch-beds ſo cunningly made, as that they were like vnto chaires, hauing wrought in them the antient wars betwixt Aſcanius and Chiuſa

The States of Hungary about to depart from Presburg, by the perſuaſion of the Archbiſhop there ſtaid.

Now the Emperour, for the better appeaſing of all former troubles, and the preuenting of new, and the better aſſurance of the State, had about the middeſt of Auguſt called an aſſemblie of the States of Hungarie to Presburg; whither they being come, and hauing long in vaine expected the comming of Matthias the Archduke, by the Emperour appointed to haue beene Preſident in that aſſemblie, were in the beginning of September about to haue returned home, but that requeſted by the Archbiſhop to ſtay yet fifteene dayes longer, they were contented ſo to doe; but yet vpon condition, That if the Archduke then came not, they ſhould not be bound to ſtay any longer: For why, they by Letters certified of the attempts of the Tartars (who had requeſted to haue a place in the borders of Hungarie, appointed them to dwell in) were deſirous in any wiſe to haue that aſſemblie of Parliament put off to a further time, that ſo they might the better betime preuent and meet with ſuch
the Tartars deſignes, whom they were loth to haue for their bad and troubleſome neighbours,

The Turkes in great number repaire to Buda

bours. And now the Turkes in the meane time, in hope that the peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians would not long hold, were come to Buda in ſuch multitude, that the houſes in the towne beeing not able to hold them, they were glad to ſet vp tents for them to lye in within the citie: for that the Baſſa would not ſuffer them to ſet vp any tents abroad in the fields, leſt the Chriſtians ſhould ſuſpect them to be about the raiſing of an armie, and ſo to diſturbe the peace.

The States of Hungarie depart from Preſburg without any thing doing.

But the States of Hungarie hauing ſtaied full 15 daies, as the Archbiſhop had requeſted, and the Archduke not comming; made a ſolemne proteſtation before the Chapter of the Cathedrall Church at Preſburg, that they departed from Preſburg, and ſo returned home, not vpon any diſcontentment or contumacie, but for want of things neceſſary, and other their vrgent occaſions (hauing aboue 7 weekes expected the Archdukes comming, without whom nothing could be done) and yet that if it ſhould pleaſe the Emperor by ſolemne ſummons at any time after to call another Parliament, they would be readie vpon ſuch ſummons giuen, to returne againe to Preſburg, and there to conſult of all ſuch things, as ſhould be for the good and welfare of the Common-weale: ſo that nothing were propounded contrary to the articles they the yere before agreed vpon at Vienna, which they would haue in all points kept whole & inuiolat: ſo that if any man ſhould go about or attempt any thing in diſpoſing and ordring of the publique affaires contrarie to that agreement, they would not in any wiſe ratifie the ſame, although it were by the Emperor himſelfe allowed: which their proteſtation they requeſted to haue regiſtred, and ſealed with the Chapters Seale, and ſo not hauing done any thing at all for which they came, againe returned.

After whoſe departure from Preſburg, the Haiduckes (men vſed to liue by their ſwords, and not by their labour) of all others moſt diſcontented with this generall peace, began now to raiſe new ſtirres and tumults, and dayly to grow ſtronger and ſtronger, crauing aid of the Turkes and Tartars, and not of the other Hungarians their countreymen, now againe returned to their woonted allegeance vnto the Chriſtian Emperour: a number of which Haiducks flocking to Buda, the Baſſa there with ſome other of the Turks Captaines and Commanders, entered into conſultation what to doe with theſe ſo fit inſtruments for the troubling of the Chriſtians, and the diſturbing of the peace. To entertaine them he durſt not, and to caſt them off hee was loth; but yet purpoſing to vſe them and to ſet them a worke as occaſion ſhould ſerue, he to prepare an enterance thereunto, by letters threatened them of Comora, that except they better kept the capitulations and articles of the late peace, they ſhould ſhortly heare of new matters. But in the meane time letters were ſent from the great Sultan to the Baſſa of Buda, with charge, that although the Chriſtians were reported to encreaſe their ſtrength, hee ſhould yet keep himſelfe within his bounds, and to attempt nothing againſt them, except they ſhould proceed to manifeſt force: in which caſe he ſhould not faile by all lawfull meanes to reuenge himſelfe. Which the Sultans minde once made knowne, the Turkes againe departed from Buda, moſt part of the great ordnance that they brought with them being carried backe againe to Sigeth.

The Baſſa of Buda forbidden to make warres vpon the Chriſtians.

An aſſembly of the States of the vpper Hungary & the decrees by them there made.

But the States of Hungarie, beeing returned home from Preſburg, and againe aſſembled, the foureteenth day of October, by their generall conſent, decreed, That Tokay ſhould againe bee ioyned vnto their juriſdiction; and that the great ordnance throughout all the free cities ſhould be remoued and carried home vnto the places whereunto they before belonged: That the Vayuod of Tranſyluania ſhould be admoniſhed not to ſeperat Tranſyluania from Hungarie: That the Baſſa of Buda ſhould bee warned for to keepe his Turks within their owne bounds: and that the Nobilitie of Hungarie ſhould betime bee admoniſhed with all their force to repreſſe the Haiduckes, and all other their enemies. Howbeit the Haiduckes proceeding in their inſolent outrages more than before, tooke certaine forts, and with fire and ſword ſpoyled many places of the Countrey, cauſing the people to ſweare to be friends to them and the Turks, and enemies vnto the Germans and Wallons: and demanding of Humanoius the Crowne wherewith Botſcay had ſometime beene rewarded from the Grand Seigniour, had a purpoſe to haue crowned him, or ſome other for their King: who for all that, by a meſſenger ſent word vnto them, that hee would not at their hands accept that dignitie, but faithfully continue in his allegeance toward the Emperour. But when

when the States of the vpper Hungarie were about to haue gone againſt theſe ſeditious and rebellious people to haue ſurpriſed them; they were from ſo doing deterred by the Baſſa of Agria, threatening with his Turkes and Tartars to take their parts if they ſhould once take vp armes againſt them.

The Turks further the inſolet attempts of the Haiducks.

About the ſame time ſix hundred Haiducks going to the caſtle of Saint Andrew, and comming thither, could not be let in by the garriſon ſouldiers, as they had deſired; and perceiuing them to make no reckoning of their ſeruice, could no longer hold, but openly profeſſed themſelues to become the great Sultans ſeruants: who from thence marching to Budnoc, tooke it by force, and ranſacked it: and ſo ſtill ſeeking after bootie, ran out towards Tockay, where by the way they were in a ſtrait by Humanoius, lying in wait for them, entrapped, and almoſt all ſlaine; who afterward ſent two of the Turks Enſignes, taken from them, to Vienna, and to the the terrour of others, empailed ſome of them vpon ſtakes, being brought priſoners to Caſſouia. For which vnfortunat expedition, ſome other of the Haiducks lighting vpon two of the Captains, who by chance had eſcaped out of Humanoius his hands, put them both to death for the euil leading of their fellowes, hanging vp the one, and with their ſwords hewing the other all to pieces. Now by the report of ſome of the priſoners there taken, it was known this new rebellion of the Haiducks to haue bin raiſed by the procurement of the Baſſaes of Buda and Agria, who by their meſſengers had promiſed vnto them all helpe. Which report to haue been true, the euent did ſhortly after confirme: for the 27 day of Nouember almoſt 15000 of theſe Haiducks hauing before receiued from the great Sultan 300000 duckats for pay, came and moſt ſtraightly beſieged Filek, a ſtrong caſtle, the Turks ſending them great ordnance from Agria; vnto whom theſe Haiducks had promiſed to deliuer all ſuch places as they ſhould win. Howbeit, the euent of this ſiege anſwered not to their deſire: for Thomas Boſnias, Captaine of Filek, with his garriſon all of Germane ſouldiers, ſo valiantly repulſed them, and the extremitie of the Winter weather ſo diſtreſſed them, that they were glad to rayſe their ſiege, and be gone.

Six hundred Haiducks intercepted by Humanoius.

The Haiduks in their rebellion ſupported by the Turks.

Now much about the ſame time, viz. about the beginning of Nouember, a great fire aroſe at Conſtantinople, wherein almoſt fiue hundred ſhops of wares with many other faire buildings were burnt, ſo that the harme there by fire done was eſteemed to amount to aboue two millions of gold.

At the ſame time that the aſſembly of the States of Hungarie ſhould haue beene holden at Presburg (as is before declared) the Emperor had appointed alſo another aſſembly of the nobilitie and States of Auſtria to be holden at Vienna; where after they were aſſembled, certain articles were vnto them on the Emperors behalfe propounded for them in that aſſembly then to conſider of: as firſt, that for the keeping of the frontiers of Auſtria in quiet, the contribution by them graunted amongſt themſelues the laſt yeare, ſhould this yeare following bee doubled. Then, that if it ſhould fortune the enemie to attempt any thing of new againſt that Prouince, that in ſtead of the horſes and money which they were woont to ſend vnto the warres, they ſhould for the ſpace of twelue moneths, or of the greateſt part thereof, as occaſion ſhould require, of their owne coſts maintaine ten companies of German footmen, euery companie beeing three hundred ſtrong; and as many troupes of German horſemen, euery troupe conſiſting of an hundred horſe. And, that if for the better defence of the borders of Auſtria there ſhould happily need a greater ſtrength, the ſame ſhould be raiſed in no other ſort than was vſed in Hungarie, nor at greater charges maintained. And, that if it ſhould continue peace, theſe charges ſhould be conuerted to the payment of the ſouldiers wages: And that the States and other ſubiects of that Prouince ſhould ſo much as might be, be eaſed from the trouble of ſending either of horſe or foot for the defence of the frontiers. Thirdly, that Commiſſaries ſhould be maintained this yeare alſo to attend the armie, and certaine skilfull Captaines appointed for the chuſing of a fit Generall for the armie. That diligent regard and care ſhould be had for the prouiſion of corne and victuals for the vſe of the people in generall, as well in the time of peace as of warre. And that foraſmuch as it much concerned the good of the Common-weale, to haue the frontiers of the Countrey toward Caniſia diligently viewed, for feare of the Turkes great garriſon there ſtill lying, that therefore certaine good and expert ſouldiers, which knew thoſe places well, ſhould bee

In briefe, ſeeing that of the ſafetie of Rab, the welfare of the citie of Vienna and of the forts thereabouts depended,that for the repairing of the fortifications thereof, and the better ſtrengthening of the ſame, the ſumme of foure thouſand florens ſhould be appointed : and for the defence of the frontiers of Auſtria from the incurſion of the Turks gariſon of Caniſia,fiue thouſand : and for the furthering of the buildings at Nuſtorfe, fiue thouſand moe ſhould bee paied : and that thoſe who hitherto had beene ſlacke in paying of their contribution money, ſhould forthwith be enforced to pay the ſame. And alſo that it might be conſidered of, how that too much inhauncing of the value of monies might be reſtrained: that good orders might be kept,all the countrie cleered from the roberies of the ſouldiers,ſtragling here and there vp H and downe the ſame : that the counterfeit Hungarian and Polonian mony ſhould be prohibited, as not currant : that good order might be taken for the ſtaying of the Plague, which then began in many places in Auſtria.

The aſſembly broken vp, and nothing concluded.

Concerning which Articles,when as the States there aſſembled complained,all that countrie to be with the long wars againſt the Turke,the incurſions of the Rebels,and the outrages of the mutinous ſouldiers,already almoſt exhauſted,and miſerably bared of money ; no reſolution could then, according as the neceſſitie required,be made, but was vnto a further time deferred, and the aſſemblie broken vp.

A Diet of the Empire by the Emperour appointed at Ratisbone.

The Emperour at the ſame time appointed a Diet of the Empire to bee holden at Ratiſbone
: wherein he hauing appointed Ferdinand Archduke of Auſtria,to be chiefe in his place, I he with a notable traine of ſeuen hundred horſe, and a gallant guard of footmen,came thither the eighth and twentieth of Nouember, and was there by the citiſens honourably receiued.
Vnto which aſſemblie,when as the Deputies of the Electors,and of the other Princes and Cities of the empire,were in great number come,at length the twelfth of Ianuary Diuine ſeruice beeing done in the Cathedrall Church , Ferdinand the Archduke, with his Courtiers, the Emperours Counſellors,and other the Princes deputies being there preſent,taking horſe before the Church, with a great companie of the Nobilitie and princes deputies following of him,went to the Court;the citiſens in their armes ſtanding on both ſides: where Godfrey Ortelius the Emperours Secretarie hauing in a notable Oration ſet forth the Emperours loue and and affection towards the Electors, Princes, and States of the Empire;and why, the Emperor K himſelfe could not be preſent at this aſſemblie,as willingly he would haue been;he propounded in his name fiue articles for them in this their aſſemblie to be eſpecially conſidered of.

The articles by the Emperour propounded to be conſidered of in the Diet of the Empire at Ratisbone.

Firſt, how the Empire might hereafter be preſerued and defended againſt the violence of the Turks, and the dangerous rebellions by their procurement ſtirred vp in Hungarie, to the endangering of the whole Empire ; eſpecially ſeeing that the Turkes themſelues (with whome the peace was of late concluded) by their doings had heretofore more than ſufficiently declared what truſt or credit was to bee giuen vnto them : and ſeeing that it is moſt manifeſt, them therein to haue ſought for nothing elſe, than that hauing made or rather counterfeited a peace with the Chriſtians for a time, for the ſuppreſſing of the Rebels, and the repreſſing of the inuaſions of the Perſians , they might after ſuch victorie againſt them obtained, come L better prouided, and ſtronger to ouercome the Chriſtians. Which was eaſie to bee ſeeene :
for that whileſt they were yet intreating of peace,they had taken Strigonium, and hauing concluded peace,they ceaſed not as yet with their counſell and aid to helpe the Rebels in their rebellious tumults : which was manifeſtly to bee perceiued by the Haiduckes themſelues, who were not aſhamed openly to profeſſe themſelues to bee the Great Sultans ſeruants, to require Cities and fortreſſes to bee yeelded vnto the Sultan, and to conſpire againſt the verie name of the Germanes. For the ſpeedie remedie of which miſchiefe, the Emperour had thought good, that conſideration of this point ſhould ſo bee had, as that the Princes ſhould either conſent vnto a certaine ſtanding and perpetuall contribution, whereby a ſufficient ſtrength might alwaies bee readie,wherewith to withſtand the enemies attempts : M or elſe that for certaine yeares twentie thouſand footmen and foure thouſand horſe might there bee ſtill in readineſſe , to bee maintained at the common charges of the Empire;which the Emperour (neede ſo requiring) might vſe againſt the common enemie. Or that if this were

A were heauie or troubleſome vnto the States of the Empire, yet at leaſt they ſhould conſent yearely to contribute ſuch money as might ſuffice for the ſuſtayning of ſuch a power. Another poynt of this concluſion, was about the correcting and reforming of the adminiſtration of Iuſtice in the Imperiall Chamber. For ſeeing that in the former aſſemblies and meetings this matter could not be fully decided, by reaſon of certaine hinderances and impediments which then fell out, and that without the due adminiſtration and execution of Iuſtice no Empire could long ſtand or flouriſh, no more than the World could without the Sunne; his Imperiall Maieſtie therefore would not haue the deliberation of this ſo neceſſarie a point to be put off or referred vnto any other aſſemblie, but to bee done and concluded in this preſent aſſemblie. The third point to be conſidered of, was the warre which B hath beene now ſo many yeares made in the Low-Countries, and the inconueniencie thereof redounding vnto the Empire. For whereas in the treatie of peace in the Low-Countries, (at which treatie both hee and the whole Empire ought to haue beene there preſent) for the better concluding and ending of the ſame, hee had heard the confederate Princes to bee now acknowledged for a free State, he could not now any longer (as he ſaid) forbeare, but that (ſeeing the Low-Countries to bee a member and fee of the Empire, and by the antient Records of the Empire, and of the Emperors, and by many other proofes it appeareth, the Gouernours of the Low-Countries to haue beene vaſſals of the Empire) hee ſhould by Letters which were written vnto the King of Spaine, the Archduke Albertus, and the States of the confederate Prouinces, admoniſh them, That they ſhould not proceed to doe or deter- C mine any thing in this matter, which might any way tend to the hurt or preiudice of the Emperour, of the Empire, and of the houſe of Auſtria. And foraſmuch as that warre in the Low-Countries had hitherto done no ſmall harme vnto the Empire, if happily it could not be agreed vpon betweene the parties, and that it ſhould happen the ſame warre to be any longer continued, or rather againe renewed, it ſhould then bee conſidered vpon, how the Empire might bee ſatisfied for the great harme it had vntill this preſent thereby receiued, and how it might be from the like harme hereafter kept and preſerued. The fourth point in this conſultation, which was to be conſidered of, concerned the coyne. For whereas it is manifeſt, that the value of the money to bee dayly more and more inhaunced and rayſed, and that thereby not onely the Magiſtrates in the publique receipt, but the ſubiects alſo in ge- D nerall receiued great and manifeſt harme, foraſmuch as the price of ſuch neceſſarie things which wee muſt in this life haue ordinarie vſe of, muſt of neceſſitie bee ſtill more and more encreaſed, according to the value of the money, the Emperour thought good with mature deliberation to remedie this miſchiefe in this preſent aſſemblie of the Empire. The fifth and laſt point which was to be conſidered vpon, was the perfecting of the Matriculer of the Empire, for the giuing vnto euerie man that which of due belongeth vnto him: the perfecting of which Matriculer, the Emperour would haue in this aſſemblie to bee amongſt them conſidered of.

Which articles thus propounded, there fell a great controuerſie amongſt the Deputies of the Princes concerning the manner of their proceeding in theſe matters: as whether they E ſhould conſider of theſe articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, or otherwiſe. And when as many thought it beſt firſt to conſider of the article, for the reformation of Iuſtice, beeing the ſecond article propounded to be conſidered of, and afterwards to come vnto the reſt of the articles to be afterward conſulted of: when as the two and twentieth day of Ianuarie they came againe to Counſell, a writing was by the Emperours commaund read vnto them, whereby it was ſignified vnto the States of the Empire; the rebellious tumults by Botſcay and ſome others rayſed in Hungarie to bee yet by the Haiduckes continued, the Sultan himſelfe ſending of them rewards, and furniſhing them with ordnance and other things neceſſarie for the warres, by the Gouernour of Agria, and the Baſſa of Buda, threatening all F extremities vnto them which ſhould goe about to reſiſt them; and then augmenting the danger which thereby might enſue vnto the Empire, and eſpecially vnto the Germane name, ſeeing that it was manifeſt thoſe rebellious Haiduckes to haue eſpecially conſpired the deſtruction of the Germanes, and to haue confirmed that their league, by drinking of an health: It was requeſted, that leauing off theſe contentions, for the manner of their proceeding, they would turne their conſultations vnto the firſt article, and reſolue how remedie might in time G bee giuen vnto this miſchiefe, and how aid might bee ſent vnto the Emperour againſt his enemies.

But when as in their often meetings, nothing could be concluded, by reaſon of the diuers and different opinions betwixt the Proteſtants and Catholickes, Ferdinand the Archduke againe calling together the Deputies of the Electors, of the Princes, and of the Imperiall cities, cauſed it by letters to be declared vnto them, How that the Emperour not without his great griefe and ſorrow had heard, That for certaine diſſention among them, they could not yet come to conſult of the articles propounded in that aſſemble to be by them conſidered of, but to his great griefe to be from day to day protracted: and that therefore he requeſted them, That either they themſelues would quietly end thoſe diſſentions amongſt them- H ſelues, or elſe ſend their differences conceiued in writing vnto the Emperour to be decided, and ſo at length to come effectually to conſult of the propounded articles. And indeed the Deputies aforeſaid had in writing before exhibited their mindes concerning that point, for the manner of their proceeding, vnto the Archduke Ferdinand. But foraſmuch as that writing was acccording to the manner of the Catholickes and the Proteſtants, of two different ſorts; the former thinking it meet to conſult of the aforeſaid articles in ſuch order as they were propounded, and firſt of all, to conſider of the contribution to be giuen againſt the Turks, and other enemies in Hungarie; but the other labouring, firſt for the reformation of Iuſtice, and the confirming of the peace of Religion, and afterward to prouide for aid againſt the forreine enemies, that ſo remedie might firſt bee prouided for inward, then for outward I griefes; eſpecially ſeeeing that they had no expreſſe commandement firſt to determine of the contribution. Vnto whome the Archduke by writing againe anſwered, That hee had receiued no other inſtruction from the Emperour, than that hee ſhould conſult of the aforeſaid articles, with the Deputies there preſent, in ſuch order as they were propounded: Neither that it was conuenient, that the firſt article concerning contribution beeing neglected, they ſhould proceed vnto the ſecond, ſeeing that the enemies might eaſily, by the delay of putting off the ſame in effect, take occaſion in the meane time to doe the Chriſtians great harme. Beſides that, that hee had ſufficiently proteſted, That conſultation concerning the reformation of Iuſtice ſhould in this preſent aſſemblie be had alſo; neither that it was the Emperours minde to haue it deferred vnto any other aſſemblie. Wherefore he exhorted the K Proteſtants, That they ſhould forthwith endeauour by their Letters vnto the Electors and Princes, and other their ſuperiours, to obtaine leaue, that they might firſt determine ſome certaintie about the firſt article concerning contribution; that ſo giuing way to the opinion of the other partie, they might inſtantly prepare themſelues for the making of the contribution. Howbeit, this his perſuaſion preuailed nothing, by reaſon of their diſcord and diſſenſion about the order of their conſultation; the one part ſtill labouring for the contribution to be firſt agreed vpon, and the other part holding as hard for the reformation of Iuſtice: ſo that Ferdinand the Archduke out of hope of concluding any thing that good was, not in vaine to ſpend his coſt and time any longer, the fifth of May diſmiſſed the aſſemblie, and returned home, as did all the reſt of the Electors and Princes Deputies, no one ar- L ticle that was propounded beeing ſo much as once reaſoned of, but all left vndecided: ſo ſmall care was there of the common good, either for the raiſing of money for the withſtanding of the Turkes and Rebels, or for the reformation of Iuſtice; the neceſſitie of both, either on the one ſide or the other, ſo hardly vrged, and yet in concluſion bee neither reſpected or regarded.

The Diet of the States of the empire at Ratisbone broken off, and nothing concluded.

Matthias the Archduke commeth to Presburg.

Whileſt the Diet to no purpoſe (as is aforeſaid) was by the Archduke Ferdinand holden at Ratisbone, Matthias the Archduke with a great traine following of him, came in the meane time to Presburg, where hee was with much joy and triumph receiued: the garriſon ſouldiers in order ſtanding on both ſides the way as hee went vnto the caſtle: Napragius the Biſhop of Rab, with an eloquent an Oration welcomming of him, in the preſence of certain of M the Hungarian Nobility, who had gone out as far as Hainburg to meet him, and now alſo honourably welcommed him, much reioycing at his comming. The next day the Archbiſhop and Cardinall of Strigonium with a notable traine of Hungarian Gentlemen came to Presburg.

burg: who forthwith receiued into the Caſtle, and hauing ſaluted the Archduke, conferred with him of many things in this aſſemblie to be conſulted of. In the meane time Illiſhaſchius (that noble Hungarian of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken) arriued there alſo with twelue coaches, ninetie harquebuſiers, and forty Hungarian horſemen going before him, and three hundred Haiducks which had attended vpon him, being at the gate diſmiſſed. So the chiefe of the Hungarian States being come, the conſultation was begun the three and twentieth day of Ianuarie: where when as the Archduke had propounded vnto the Hungarian Nobilitie, what things they were eſpecially to conſider of; it was by them anſwered, The Haiducks before their comming out, to haue determined, not one whit to depart from the Articles the yeare before propounded and agreed of at Vienna; nor to admit any limitation at all of them: ſo that for the appeaſing of the tumults of the Haiducks, there was no need of any new conſultation, but onely to confirme ſuch things as was then and there conſulted and agreed vpon. From which their reſolution when as the Hungarians were not to be remoued, and being grieued with the ſcoffing at of certaine of the Clergie (thereupon refuſing in any wiſe to make their appearance, as they were commanded, before the Cardinal in the Caſtle) were about againe to depart; making a ſolemne proteſtation, themſelues to be guiltleſſe of ſuch harmes as ſhould thereof afterwards enſue; it was at length on all parts agreed vpon, That the whole matter ſhould be committed vnto ten choſen out of the Hungarian Counſellours, and ten moe of the Counſellors of Auſtria, to be conſulted and determined of. By whom, being met all together the eight and twentieth of Ianuarie in the houſe of Illiſhaſchius, it was concluded, That ſeeing that peace and quietneſſe in thoſe Countries of Hungarie and Auſtria could not otherwiſe be made, that thoſe Articles and conditions, concernrng which no agreement could the yeare before be made in the treatie at Vienna, being quite left off and neglected, the reſt of the Articles which were there agreed vpon, ſhould be ſtill entirely obſerued and kept: and that it ſhould be lawfull for euerie man to haue the free exerciſe of his Religion. Which thing the Commiſſioners of Auſtria by a ſpecial writing there confirmed vnto the Hungarians. Whereby they declared themſelues after long and mature deliberation, to haue perceiued not onely by the true relation and report of the Hungarians, but alſo by their owne experience, vnto how great inconueniences the whole Kingdome of Hungarie hath of long been expoſed, as well for the warres it hath had with the common Enemie of the Chriſtians, as for diuers the ciuile tumults and ſeditions therein; and that therefore they not willing that ſuch harmes ſhould in thoſe Countries againe encreaſe and grow, to the infinite effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, after the Articles of Pacification agreed vpon at Vienna, ſaw no other better remedie for theſe ſo great inconueniences, than that all parties ſhould ſtill hold themſelues contented with the ſame Articles of Pacification concluded and agreed vpon in the ſaid aſſemblie at Vienna. And that therefore they had decreed, thoſe articles to be ſincerely and inuiolately kept: and promiſed vnto the States of Hungarie, to giue their aid for the defence of theſe articles, againſt all their enemies, being readie to giue good reaſon thereof before God, the Church, the Emperour Rodolph, the Archduke Matthias, and his other brethren, and all the Houſe of Auſtria, as the neceſſitie of thoſe Countries ſhould ſeeme to require: hoping alſo that the States of Hungarie would reſt themſelues likewiſe in that Pacification of Vienna, and the aſſurance thereof, in all points obſeruing the ſame; and that they would alwaies giue their readie helpe and aid vnto the Countries of Auſtria againſt their Enemies in like manner. All which things thus agreed vpon and determined, Letters of Confederation were in the name of Matthias the Archduke, and of all as well the Eccleſiaſtical as Temporal States of Hungarie and Auſtria, to this purpoſe written, That whereas for the appeaſing and ſuppreſſing of the tumults and ſeditions which the Haiduckes by the inſtigation of the Turks had of late not doubted to raiſe, for the concluding of peace with the Great Sultan, they were met together at Presburg, and therein altogether buſied, to deuiſe how the Kingdome of Hungarie, with the Countries adjoyning, might from deſtruction be deliuered, in the Chriſtian Religion preſerued, and from waſting and ſpoyling, whereunto they had hitherto beene expoſed, ſaued: Vpon mature deliberation, had as well in the name of them that were preſent, as of them that were abſent, made ſuch a Confederation and League; That if heereafter it ſhould fortune any detriment of warre

to be by any man made or done vnto the Hungarians, or the countries thereabout, for the afore-ſaid articles of Pacification, which they had determined religiouſly to keepe, that they would G forthwith with their vnited forces come to aid their confederat brethren, and together with them to liue or die.

With theſe letters ſigned and ſealed with the hand of the Archduke, and of the Noblemen there preſent, the firſt of February, Illiſhaſchius with George Turſon, were ſent vnto the tumultuous Haiducks (who had now appointed their meſſages to be ſent vnto the Sultan and the Tartar Cham, to craue their aid) to diſſuade them from ſuch their purpoſe, and to perſuade them to quietnes; threatening them withall, That if they would not hearken vnto ſuch honeſt conditions, they ſhould all together, and at once, be ſet vpon and oppreſſed by the whole power of the States.

The States of Enſerec commanded by the Archduke Mathias to be alwaies in a readineſſe againſt the Haiduckes.

The Aſſemblie at Presburg thus ended, Matthias the Archduke returning to Vienna, and H forthwith calling together the States of Enſeric, declared vnto them all that was done in the Aſſemblie at Presburg. And for as much as that aſſemblie was chiefely to that end appointed, That the kingdome of Hungarie ſhould not altogether be pluckt away from the Empire; and that after the reuolt thereof, the greateſt harme to be done by the incurſions and ſpoyling of the enemies, would lie vpon the countries of Auſtria; he aduiſed them ſo to looke vnto themſelues, and carefully to prouide for the Commonweale, as that hauing money alwaies in readineſſe to maintaine an armie, they might with all conuenient ſpeed go to meet with the Haiducks, if haply they would not conforme themſelues vnto the articles of Pacification, but againe raiſe new broiles; that ſo they might defend and preſerue their countrey from their I outrages.

The Prince of Valachia dieth; whoſe widow notably preſerueth the Country for her ſonne.

About the beginning of this Spring, when as Ierome Prince of Valachia was dead, leauing behinde him a ſonne but thirteene yeares old, the Emperor admitted him, as yet not capable of the gouernment, vnder Tutors, vnto the ſucceſſion of his heritage. Which thing the Valachians being by no meanes willing to endure, and bearing themſelues vpon the helpe of the Turks, went about to make choice of another in ſtead of their Prince of late dead. For which cauſe, the Princeſſe widow by letters certified Polloſcie her ſonne in law, of this outrage and injurie of her ſubjects: and hauing obtained of him a great ſumme of money, and therewith raiſed an armie of ten thouſand good ſouldiers, went forth againſt the Valachians, and in open field ouercame them in ſo bloudie and terrible a battel, that hauing ſlaine fiue thouſand of the K Valachians and Turks, ſhe had ouer them a notable victorie, and by that meanes preſerued the principalitie of that Countrey for her ſonne.

The Great Duke of Florence had hitherto done great harme with his fleet vnto the Turks in the Mediterranean ſea: for which cauſe a Meſſenger about this time comming vnto him in the Great Sultans name, promiſed him great matters, if he would from thenceforth forbeare to hurt and purſue the Turkes Gallies. Which his requeſt ſerued the Turkes to no other purpoſe, but as it were to put oyle vnto the fire. For the Duke afterward cauſed new gallies to be made, and his fleet encreaſed, and therewith did more harme than formerly he had done.

The Haiduckes refuſe to admit of the Pacification made at Vienna.

Now although that after the ending of the Aſſemblie at Presburg, Illiſhaſchius and George L Turſon had deliuered vnto the Haiduckes the Articles of the Pacification, and commaunded them from thencefoorth to keepe themſelues quiet; yet for all that, could they not yet be perſuaded to hearken vnto ſuch their counſell: for that they being men ſtill accuſtomed to the warres, and liuing by their ſwords, could not endure to fall to husbandrie, and ſuch other labours. For which cauſe they of the Countrey about Gymeric, writ vnto them which dwelt in the Countrey about Nuſol, letters to this effect: That forasmuch as they beeing diuers times certified of the miſerable eſtate of their neighbors, had refuſed to come to ayd them, they ſhould yet now remember how neceſſarie a thing it were, with their conjoined mindes and forces to helpe one another; for that the Haiduckes hauing now paſſed the riuer of Teiſe, were broken into that Prouince, and M were runne as farre as Budnoc: neither were they minded ſo to ſtay, but to robbe and ſpoyle all the Countrey before them, if they were not with ſpeed encountered. And the rather, for that but a few dayes before, they had receiued thirtie thouſand Hungarian Duckets from

A from the Turks, whom they now acknowledged for their Lords, with horſes and other gifts to be diuided among their Leaders and Captaines: and moreouer, dayly expected aid from the Tartars, who in great number lay about Belgrade. Wherefore ſeeing it could not be expreſſed, what great harme and loſſe was by the Haiducks done, as well vnto the Noblemen themſelues, as to the common countreymen; that they ſhould therefore thereof giue their Neighbours to vnderſtand, and with all ſpeed to take vp armes againſt the ſame rebellious Haiducks.

Not long after, about the latter end of March, Proclamation was made by the commandement of Matthias the Archduke, throughout all Auſtria, That euery man ſhould prouide himſelfe to take vp armes. The cauſe whereof men diuerſly ſuſpected: howbeit that vnto B this Proclamation was this reaſon joyned, That the Archduke was determined himſelfe to go about the fourteenth of Aprill into Morauia, and there to gather together all his power, as well Hungarians, as Auſtrians and Haiduckes, for the warre hee was to take in hand. There were alſo Letters in the Archdukes name ſent vnto the Vaſſals of Auſtria, to giue them to vnderſtand, That whereas they were not ignorant, what, for the obtaining of peace, and defence of theſe Countries, had of late beene decreed at Presburg; and that all the States of Enſeric had approoued the report thereof receiued from their Deputies, and ſo promiſed their helpe and aid vnto the Archduke, as if that he himſelfe would take in hand any expedition, they would joyne themſelues vnto him, and together with him to liue or die: yet that there were ſome, which being more deſirous of war than peace, did not onely not reſt C vpon the former pacification, but gathered an armie alſo in the borders of Morauia; with a purpoſe to make an inroad as well into Morauia, as into Auſtria it ſelfe. For which cauſe the States of Morauia alſo were enforced, for defence of themſelues to raiſe an armie, and to craue helpe from their Neighbours. And that therefore ſeeing the Archduke, mindefull of his promiſe for the common defence of the Countrey, was reſolued to beſtow his life and all his fortunes, and in his own perſon to vndertake an expedition vnto thoſe places from whence the greateſt danger was to be feared to fall vpon thoſe countries; neceſſitie then required, that the States themſelues alſo ſhould ſuffer nothing to be wanting on their behalfe, but euery one of them together with their ſeruants forthwith to joyne themſelues vnto the Archduke, and to the vttermoſt of their power to endeauor themſelues to deliuer them and theirs from death D and deſtruction. That God, in whoſe name this expedition was by them to be taken in hand, as by the louers of peace, might ſo in ſhort time make an end of all tumults, and grant vnto thoſe Countries wiſhed peace and quietneſſe. And that therefore they were to be admoniſhed, That according to the tenor of the Decree made at Presburg, they with ſuch a number of horſe and foot as they could vpon the ſudden raiſe at a day to be ſhortly after vnto them named, ſhould joyne themſelues vnto the Archduke, and not to ſuffer any thing to let them in ſo doing. So that if haply any chance or ſickneſſe ſhould happen vnto their General, yet notwithſtanding that they ſhould ſend their power vnder the leading of ſome other man, ſeeing that the Archduke himſelfe ſpared not to aduenture his life and fortunes, and (if God ſhould ſee it ſo good) account it a great gaine euen to loſe the ſame, ſo that thereby he might doe his E countrey good.

The States of Auſtria warned by the Archduke to prepare themſelues for an expedition to be made into Morauia.

About the beginning of April, the Cardinal returning from Prague to Vienna, brought with him the Emperors anſwer and reſolution, viz. That he did ratifie and confirme all things that were done and concluded with the Hungarians and Turks; but that his will was, That the confederation made betwixt the States of Hungarie and Auſtria at Presburg, ſhould be void and of none effect. Which the Archduke proteſting that he could by no meanes like of, or ſuffer to be done, he the 15 of Aprill afterwards with a great number of the Peeres, Nobilitie, and Counſellours, and a multitude of good ſouldiers, going out of Vienna towards the monaſterie of Neoburg, ſet forward vpon his journey, carrying with him eight and twentie pieces of ordnance, there expecting his ſouldiers in all places leuied: by publique Letters proteſting, F That no man ſhould from his armie receiue any harme; or if that by chance any harme were done vnto any man by his armie, aſſuring his ſubiects it ſhould be againe vnto them reſtored and recompenſed.

But the rumor of this expedition being brought into Bohemia, the Nobilitie of the Countrey began to aſſemble themſelues the fifteenth day of April; whither when as many of the

The Nobility of Bohemia are by the Emperour commanded to be readie in armes.

deputies of the other Countries were aſſembled alſo, it beeing decreed, That the Nobilitie of the faithfull States there preſent, ſhould with all ſpeed returne home, and ſo prouide themſelues and their ſubiects of neceſſarie armes; that, need ſo requiring, they ſhould therewith be able to defend themſelues and their countrey, the aſſembly was diſmiſſed. Beſides that, the Emperour himſelfe carefull for all euents, cauſed many both horſe and foot, to be brought to Prague, and to be diuerſly bilited in the citiſens houſes: and furthermore, the eighteenth of Aprill, by letters directed vnto certaine Princes of the Empire, and to certaine Earles alſo, citiſens, and other vaſſals of the Kingdome of Bohemia, warned them with all ſpeed to ſend aid vnto him at Prague.

But Matthias the Archduke in the meane time marching forward with an armie of twentie thouſand horſe and foot, the foure and twentieth day of Aprill came to Zname, a citie of Morauia, and was there, by the States of Morauia (who the day before were come thither alſo with foure hundred horſe) honourably receiued and brought into the citie. From thence ſending out letters into the territories of Bohemia, and to the citie of Prague, hee requeſted, That they would ſend out of euery place two deputies for them, vnto the aſſemblie to be holden at Zaſlauia, the fourth day of May: promiſing withall, That hee himſelfe there beeing preſent, would yeeld vnto their deputies a reaſon of his doings, as alſo what he meant to do hereafter. Beſides that, hee by letters ſent vnto the Electors and other Princes of the Empire, declared the cauſe why hee was enforced to make this expedition: and withall ſending vnto them a copie of the agreement made at Vienna, the fiue and twentieth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1606, by the common conſent of the Archdukes; in moſt friendly manner requeſted them, That they would not intermeddle in this buſineſſe, but rather with their counſell and aid to further the ſame.

The Emperour ſendeth embaſſadours to the Archduke Mathias at Zname

But the three and twentieth day of Aprill, the Emperour ſent the Popes Embaſſadors, with the Embaſſadours of diuers other Princes and States, then lying at Prague with ſundrie of the Bohemian Miniſters, in Embaſſage to the Archduke Matthias, ſtill lying at Zname: whom the Cardinal the next day after followed alſo, to make ſome good pacification, if it were poſſible, with the Archduke. But the Emperor in the meane time calling vnto him the counſellors of the old and new towne of Prague (contrarie to his woonted manner) moſt courteouſly with his owne hand receiued them, and giuing them thanks for the faithfull duties by them hitherto performed; requeſted them, That hereafter they would continue in their like fidelitie and loyaltie alſo: moſt liberally promiſing vnto them all kindneſſe, with the reſtitution of the priuiledges concerning the ſhutting of the gates of the citie: which libertie they had before loſt in the time of the Emperor Ferdinand. And not long after, a general muſter was taken, not only in the Citie of Prague, and the townes thereabouts, but alſo throughout all the Kingdome of Bohemia, and three hundred musketiers appointed for the gard and keeping of the caſtle, vnder the command of Count Solmes, who had commiſſion for the raiſing of other ſouldiers alſo.

The Tartar Cham dieth.

The ſeditious Turkes raiſe new ſtrifes in the leſſer Aſia, and ſpoil Smirna with the countrie thereabouts.

At the verie ſame time it was from Conſtantinople certainely reported, the Tartar Cham to haue dyed, and the Turkiſh Sultan hauing receiued newes thereof, to haue diſmiſſed his ſonne, whome hee hitherto had detained as a pledge, and with diuers ſhips and gallies, to haue cauſed him to bee tranſported ouer the Blacke Sea, vnto the borders of Tartarie, there to take poſſeſſion of his fathers Kingdome. It was alſo then reported, certaine of the ſeditious Turkes making of a road, to haue ſurpriſed Smirna, a rich Citie of Aſia, and to haue forraged all the Countrey about it farre and neere, acd comming vnto Magneſia, a chiefe Citie of that Countrey, to haue had ten thouſand crownes by the inhabitants offered, from thenceforth to ſpare the Countrey thereabouts. The Perſian King alſo at the ſame time notably to proceed in his warres, and to doe the Turkes great harme, the Turkes and Tartars ſeeking in vaine to withſtand him.

Embaſſadours ſent from the Electours of Saxony and of Brandenbourg, for the appeaſing of the troubls betwixt the Emperour and Matthias.

In the meane time Embaſſadours comming vnto Prague from the Electors of Saxonie and Brandenburg, part of them the ninth of May, went vnto the Archduke Matthias to Zaſlauia, who ſtill lay there encamped with an armie of fiue and twentie thouſand men: of whome they requeſting a truce for the ſpace of eight dayes, for the making of a pacification betwixt the Emperour and him, and for friendly ending of this buſineſſe, eaſily obtained the ſame, eſpecially ſeeing that thoſe Princes Electors, being ioyned and bound vnto the Emperour rour in a double confederation, as well for their Electorſhip, as in reſpect of the Kingdome of Bohemia, could not, as they ſaid, otherwiſe do, but ſend preſent aid vnto the Emperor, his neceſſitie ſo requiring; to which end they had now in readineſſe certaine thouſands of ſouldiors in the frontiers of their countries, to be forthwith ſent vnto him: The other part of theſe Embaſſadors in the meane time ſtaying with the Emperor, where after the Germane manner they were well prouided of good cheere and wine.

About the ſeuenteenth of May Matthias the Archduke with eighteene thouſand men roſe and marched towards Prague, Collonitz with the reſt of the armie following him. And although that the Archduke had ſeuerely commanded his ſouldiers to abſtaine from robbing, ſpoyling, and burning of the countrey, and had diuers times ſeuerely puniſhed ſome offendors therein, by hanging of ſome, and heading of others, yet could he by no meanes ſo reſtraine them, and keepe them in, but that ſome of them would ſometimes be ſtragling abroad, and doing harme, eſpecially the Hungarians, who were ſtill running out euen as far as the Emperours campe, and the new citie of Prague. Whom for all that, the Emperors ſouldiers (being then twentie thouſand ſtrong) would not meddle withall, being ſo commanded by the Emperor. Howbeit ſome of theſe ſtraglers going too far abroad into the country, were by the countrey-men cut off and ſlaine.

The three and twentieth day of May an aſſemblie of the States of Bohemia was called at Prague, the Emperor himſelfe being there preſent; Adam Waldſteine carrying the drawen ſword before him. In which aſſemblie the Nobilitie and States of the countrey with one conſent promiſed to ſpend their goods and liues in the Emperors quarrell; yet in the meane time requeſting theſe things following to be granted and confirmed vnto them: viz. That Religion according to the confeſſion of Bohemia and Auguſta ſhould inuiolately be kept, and that they which profeſſed the one, ſhould not therefore ſcoffe or deſpiſe the other. That Bohemians only ſhould be preferred to Archbiſhopricks, Abbotſhips, and other ſpiritual preferments. That the Archbiſhop ſhould not meddle with ciuile and political affaires. That Eccleſiaſtical offices ſhould be permitted vnto the Proteſtant Miniſters, as in former time, the Catholickes in the meane time holding that they had. That the Pontificial diſpenſation in cauſes of Matrimonie, according to the Decree of the aſſembly holden in the yere 1602, ſhould be abrogated and taken away. That it ſhould not be lawfull for Prieſts and other Eccleſiaſtical perſons to buy lands or territories, without the expreſſe conſent of all the three States, but to hold themſelues contented with their tythes and other their reuenues. That it ſhould be lawfull for all men in their owne ground and territories to build Churches for religion, on both ſides. That Proteſtants and Patrons of the Vniuerſitie of Prague ſhould be joyned to the Conſiſtorie, as they were in the time of the Emperour Ferdinand. That one ſhould be choſen for Burgraue in this aſſembly. That chiefe political offices ſhould not be left void aboue a month. That vnto theſe political offices men of both religions ſhould be admitted: ſo that if the Burgraue were a Catholike, the chiefe judge ſhould be a Proteſtant. That euery man ſhould enjoy his right, and that no Decree ſhould be publiſhed againſt the ſame: neither that they which were of the Order of Knights ſhould be raſhly ſued, or bound to any areſt. That one of the Bohemians ſhould always be choſen into the ſecret Councel, and made acquainted with the Bohemian affaires. That euery man might haue acceſſe to the Emperour, and not all things to be done by his Counſellors. That it ſhould be declared to all men, what was to be vnderſtood by the crime of Treaſon. That a difference ſhould be made betwixt offences: and that no man ſhould for any light offence, together with his goods, loſe his life & reputation. That the ſuits of widowes, orphans, and others alſo, ſhould with expedition be diſpatched, and not from day to day deferred. That from henceforth the father ſhould not be bound to pay the ſons debt, which he was run into without his knowledge; neither yet the ſon himſelfe. That in political offices men ſhould not be too much grieued with too heauie exactions. That men ſued ſhould not be ſummoned but in good tearmes, and that ſuch as were in any reputation be bound vnto any arreſt, without the hearing of their cauſe, and much leſſe to be impriſoned. That the ſword vpon frowardneſſe or madneſſe taken out of the Church of Thine certain yeres before, ſhould be againe ſet in the former place. That Lawyers which pleaded mens cauſes, ſhould be contented with ſuch fees as were by common Decrees appointed them. And laſt of all to conclude, they they in any wiſe requeſted the Emperour, that it would pleaſe him to eaſe the Nobilitie and G States of Bohemia of theſe griefes, before they were compelled to anſwer vnto ſuch things as were to be propounded vnto them on his behalfe. Who eaſily granted vnto moſt of theſe articles, thoſe which concerned Religion only excepted; ſo that the Senators of the old town of Prague obtained the deſired ſword to be againe forthwith ſet in the wonted place. But as for the buſineſſe of Religion, it was altogether put off and deferred vnto the next aſſemblie to be holden at the feaſt of Saint Michael.

Matthias the Archdukes embaſſadors come to Prague.

About the end of May the Archduke Matthias his Embaſſadors hauing receiued ſafe conduct from the Emperor and the nobilitie of the kingdome of Bohemia, came to Prague: and being admitted into the councell of the Nobilitie, Charles Count Tſeratin to whome that charge was giuen, hauing in the Archdukes name firſt ſaluted the Nobilitie, cauſed what hee and the reſt had in charge, to be before them out of a long writing in the Bohemian tongue H read: which done, when as, the Nobilitie ſo requiring, they were put aſide, and almoſt an houre after were called againe, they receiued anſwer, That the points of the Embaſſage by them propounded, were greater and of more weight than that ſufficient deliberation could thereof in ſo ſhort a time be had; and that therefore it was by the Nobilitie thought meet, that Commiſſioners on both ſides meeting together in the open field neere vnto Debritſe ſhould there conſult of theſe articles, and by the conſent of the Emperor and Archduke to do what they might to end the matter: Vnto which anſwer the Archdukes Embaſſadors conſenting, the ninth of Iune returned againe vnto the campe. The Emperours Embaſſadors within two dayes after with fortie coaches and an hundred horſe following them vnto the place appointed: wo oftentimes going to and fro, at length ſo wrought the matter on both ſides, that I the buſineſſe quietly and friendly ended, they were againe made friends.

Commiſſioners appointed for the ending of the troubles betwixt the Emperor and Matthias the Archduke.

The articles of which pacification and agreement betwixt the Emperor and the Archduke were the ſeuenteenth day of Iune in the caſtle of Prage openly read in the Bohemian tongue, Lichtenſtein, Kintskie, and other Chiefetaines the Archdukes Embaſſadours, being there preſent, in order thus:

The Articles of pacification betwixt the Emperour and the Archduke Matthias.

That the Emperour refuſed not, but that the Crowne of Hungarie ſhould be deliuered into the Archduke Matthias his hands: and to yeeld vnto him the Kingdome of Hungarie, and to remit vnto his ſubjects the oath of their allegeance before giuen vnto him, ſo that the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie ſhould chuſe no other King but the Archduke. That in the K next Dyet of the Empire, he ſhould propound vnto the States of the Empire to be conſidered of, what contribution they ought to make vnto the Archduke for the defence of their frontiers, if happely longer warre were to be made with the Turke. That hee ſhould cauſe the Writings which concerned that Kingdome of Hungarie, within the ſpace of two months to be deliuered vnto the Archduke. That he ſhould likewiſe alſo ſurrender vp the Archdukedome of Auſtria, by himſelfe hitherto poſſeſſed, vnto the Archduke: yet ſo as that the Archduke ſhould take vpon himſelfe all the Emperours debt as well inungarie as in Auſtria, and within a yeare ſhould cauſe ſufficient Recognizance or Caution ſealed with his owne hand, to be deliuered vnto the Creditors. That hee ſhould cauſe all the Letters and Writings, as well concerning the vpper Auſtria, as the nether, within the ſame time to be deliue- L red vnto him, together with a Copie of the Priuiledges therein, vntill that deliberation might be had concerning them, to be transferred vnto him alſo. That the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia ſhould in the Emperors name ratifie and confirme the Treatie held at Vienna, for the making of the peace betwixt the Emperonr, the Turkes, and the Hungarians. That they alſo ſhould not refuſe at the Emperours requeſt, to promiſe vnto the Archduke a certaine ſucceſſion into the Kingdome of Bohemia; but yet with condition, ſo that if it ſhould happen the Emperour to die without heires male, before the death of the Archduke his brother: but if hee ſhould haue heires male lawfully begotten and vnder age: that in that caſe he ſhould onely haue the rule and gouernment of the Kingdome of Bohemia, yet with certaine Bohemian Councellors joyned vnto him. That the Archduke ſhould by writing M confirme vnto the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia, That hee ſhould after the vſual manner and faſhion demand the kingdome of Bohemia, being void of a King. That he ſhould take the vſual oath of a King, & alwaies haue like regard of all their priuiledges as the other Kings his predeceſſours had. That the States of Bohemia ſhould not gaineſay, but that the Archduke might heereafter vſe the title of the deſigned King of Hungarie. That the adminiſtration of the Marquiſet of Morauia ſhould be granted vnto the Archduke Matthias and his heires, together with the title of a Marqueſſe, vntill that after the death of the Emperor this Prouince was againe to reuert vnto him which was to enioy the Kingdome of Bohemia. But if it ſhould happen the Archduke to die before the Emperour, the States of Bohemia ſhould not refuſe, but that this Prouince ſeparate apart, might (as ſhould ſeeme good) chuſe vnto it ſelfe a patron and defendour, vnto the death of the Emperour. That the Biſhopricke of Almits, hitherto in temporalities ſubiect vnto the King of Bohemia, ſhould from thenceforth acknowledge the Archduke Matthias to be the Gouernour thereof, leſt there ſhould bee a confuſion of ſuites in Morauia; the Biſhop in the meane time hauing regard vnto his owne priuiledges. That the Emperour at the requeſt of the Archduke ſhould maintaine the priuiledges of them of Sileſia, and of the States of the ſix Cities, and augment them alſo with new priuiledges, beeing reaſonable and conuenient. That for the defence of the borders againſt the Turks, the Nobilitie and States of Bohemia ſhould not contribute more than hitherto they were woont; yet ſauing vnto the Archduke power and abilitie in the generall meetings and aſſemblies of the Kingdome to entreat thereof, as the Emperour had hitherto had. That the titles of all the Prouinces which the Emperor did now ſurrender vnto the Archduke Matthias, ſhould be ſtill vnto him reſerued. That the Archduke Matthias ſhould vtterly renounce the Countie of Tirali, and ſurrender his part thereof vnto the Emperour. That in the meetings and aſſemblies to come, the Archduke ſhould by all meanes endeauour, that the Emperour ſhould receiue a reaſonable yeerely contribution out of thoſe Prouinces which hee now departed with. That all offences hitherto committed, ſhould generally be forgiuen and pardoned, all and euerie the perſons on both parties, onely Verkauious excepted, concerning whome, as alſo concerning his debt, the Nobilitie of Morauia had vndertaken in their next aſſemblie to take order. And that armes ſhould on both ſides bee layed apart.

Which articles thus agreed vpon, and on both parts accepted of, the Crowne of Hungarie, with the ornaments thereto belonging, ſuch as are King Stephen his Sword, the golden Apple, with the Croſſe of the Kingdome vpon it, two paire of rich ſhooes, a verie antient Robe, with a Royall Scepter, were by the Emperours chiefe Lieutenant carried into the campe, and there in a broad and open field deliuered vnto the Archduke Matthias: who with his armie in order raunged, and ſixteene thouſand horſe and foot diuided into three battalions, after he had receiued theſe Royall ornaments, commanded three great vollies of ſhot to be diſcharged, and afterwards royally feaſted the Emperours Embaſſadours. Which pacification thus made, many out of the Archdukes campe, but eſpecially the Hungarians, went into the citie of Prague, there to buy things neceſſarie; and many came alſo out of the citie to ſee the Archdukes camp. But in the mean time certaine inſolent ſouldiers hauing by night broken vp certaine ſhops of the Iewes, and carried out of them much rich wares, were the cauſe of great ſtirres and tumults in the Citie; inſomuch, that diuers of the ſouldiers were therefore caſt into priſon.

The firſt of Iuly King Matthias riſing with his armie, departed from before Prague, taking his way with his chiefe Counſellors towards Lintze, and diuiding his armie into three parts, that ſo they might the more eaſilier paſſe through thoſe countries home. After the riſing of which armie, a certaine noble Bohemian and a good ſouldier, called Cottouits, vnto whome the Hungarians and Haiduckes had in this expedition done great harme, with ſix hundered harquebuſiers and a number of countreymen went foorth to a place called Partouitſe; where hauing cut off the paſſage, and cut downe trees croſſe the wayes, that none might that way conueniently paſſe, hee with ſuch furie in a place of aduantage charged the Hungarians, comming that way, that hauing ſlaine about nine hundred of them, ſome others were alſo carried away priſoners, with a great bootie of horſes, waggons, and other goods. With which deed the Hungarians grieued, trod downe the corne as they went, and began to ſet fire on the villages and houſes in the Countrie thereabouts. But the newes thereof beeing brought vnto the King, hee forthwith by Herbenſtein, Generall of the horſemen, commaunded the Hungarians and Haiduckes not onely to deſiſt from this their inſolencie, but themſelues alſo, vpon a great penaltie, to helpe to quench the fires by them raiſed.

King Matthias entereth into Hungary, & is royally receiued into Vienna.

In the meane time the comming of king Matthias being reported at Vienna, great preparation was there made for the receiuing of him and bringing of him into the citie, according to his royall dignitie: who the fourteenth of Iuly toward night being come thither, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, and 3000 horſe, the Archbiſhop of Hungarie, who with Count Trautſamius and many other the Emperors counſellors and ſeruants went out of the citie to meet him, and there amidſt eight Enſignes of German ſouldiers, and 1500 horſemen, as it were ſet in order of battell, receiued him with a long & eloquent oration; as did afterwards Trautſamius in the name of the States of Auſtria, the Emperors Counſellors alſo honourably welcomming him. Which don, mounting again to horſe, the King, with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, ſtayed vntill that two troupes of the horſemen of Vienna (each of them H conſiſting of 200 horſe (were all entred into the citie; and afterward, 1500 of Bucheime his horſemen and the aforeſaid eight Enſignes of Germans going before, and the Emperors counſellors following them, the King himſelfe with the Archduke his brother, and all his traine, ſet forward, and paſſing ouer the bridge, whereon three triumphall arches were moſt ſumptuouſly erected, hee was by three thouſand citiſens of Vienna, gallantly apparelled and armed, with much thundering of the great ordnance and vollies of ſmall ſhot, moſt magnificently receiued, diuers other triumphs and ſports, to manifeſt the joy of the people, being there made alſo, which for breuitie ſake we paſſe ouer. But being gone a little further, he was by the Senators of Vienna on horſebacke receiued vnder a rich Canopie, borne vp by ſix of the aunticnteſt of the ſaid Senatours, and ſo brought to Saint Stephens Church: whither hee was no I ſooner come, but that lighting from his horſe, hee was there receiued by the whole Clergie, and vnder a Canopie brought into the Church: where, after Seruice done, he was with like triumph and magnificence, through diuers other triumphall arches, brought to the caſtle, the great ordnance on all ſides ſtill thundering off from the caſtle, the walls, and bulwarkes of the towne.

The Proteſtant States in Auſtria require to haue the free exerciſe of their religion granted vnto them.

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria refuſe to take their oath of allegeance vnto the king vntill they might be ſecured of the free exerciſe of their religion.

But theſe triumphs and ſolemnities ended, ſhortly after when as they began to conſult about ſuch things as concerned the good gouernment of the kingdome of Hungarie, and the crowning of the King, and that the Proteſtant States of Auſtria in many places began to exerciſe their Religion according to the manner of the Confeſſion of Auguſta, and that the Miniſters began openly to preach in the Churches there, Leopold the Archduke and Biſhop of K Paſſauia comming to Vienna, with Melinus the Popes Nuntio (but a little before come to Prague) with Cardinall Forgatſius and the Biſhop of Vienna, with earneſt and importunat ſoliciting of the king, obtained from him a commandement, That that exerciſe of religion ſhould be againe abrogated, the Churches ſhut, and publique preaching forbidden. Which thing forthwith brought forth new ſtirs and troubles in Auſtria. For the Proteſtant States forthwith calling a counſell among themſelues, by generall conſent refuſed by oath of loyaltie and alleageance to binde themſelues vnto the new king, vntill they had of him obtained the liberty for the free exerciſe of their Religion; and combining themſelues together, reſolued euen with the loſſe of their liues and goods to maintaine the free preaching of the Word, and the exerciſe of their Religion, according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta; and to that end commanded all L their ſubiects and tenants to be readie in armes, that need ſo requiring, euerie thirtieth man, tenth, or fifth, might be preſt to come forth vnto the wars. But hauing ſent a ſupplication vnto the king, whereunto 180 of the Nobilitie had ſet their hands, and receiuing no anſwere, but that they ſhould deſiſt from their purpoſe, and without delay to make their appearance to take the oath of their alleageance vnto the king, they forthwith the 14 of September going to Horne, by letters ſent vnto the reſt of the Roman Catholicke States, proteſted themſelues to be cleare before God and the whole world of all the euils and miſchiefes that were afterward to enſue, if thoſe States not regarding the appeaſing and ending of thoſe troubles, or the ſafetie of them their countreymen, ſhould take their oath of allegeance vnto the king. And ſo forthwith raiſing an army, leſt vpon the ſudden they ſhould be at Horne oppreſſed, they began by all M means to prouide for their affaires. But the report thereof comming vnto the States of Bohemia and Morauia, their neighbors, they were from them giuen to vnderſtand, that they would become interceſſors for them vnto the King, and yet not to be wanting vnto them at their need, as occaſion ſhould require

In

A In the meane time letters were brought from Conſtantinople to Vienna, declaring King Matthias his Embaſſadors (hauing audience with the great Sultan) to haue in an eloquent Oration on the Kings behalfe promiſed religiouſly to keepe the peace, of late made betwixt him, the Othoman Emperour, and the Hungarians: and afterward in the Kings name to haue offered his Preſents vnto the Sultan, and hee in the preſence of his chiefe Baſſaes to haue receiued them. But when hee came to requeſt the gouernement of Tranſyluania, he would in no wiſe thereto conſent, but gaue the ſame to Gabriel Bathor, with commandement vnto the Baſſa of Buda for the eſtabliſhing of him in this Principalitie.

Preſents ſent vnto the Great Sultan from King Mathias.

About the beginning of October, the Counties of Trautſame and Furtſenburg were from King Matthias ſent vnto the Proteſtant States at Horne, and ſhortly after them, Maximilian the B Archduke followed alſo: who although they with moſt glorious promiſes ſought to appeaſe them, and by all means to draw them to take the oath of their allegeance; yet could they with them no whit preuaile, without granting of them the free exerciſe of their religion. But the 16 of October, the Catholicke States not expecting the conſent of the Proteſtant States, at Vienna tooke the oath of allegeance vnto Matthias the new King of Hungarie, the great ordnance in the meane time thundring off, with drums and trumpets in euery place of the city ſounding, and the reſt of the day being with great feaſting, triumph, and ſolemnitie ſpent.

Matthias ſendeth vnto the Proteſtãt ſtates at Horne.

The Catholique States take the Oath of allegeance vnto king Matthias.

K. Mathias hauing thus at Vienna receiued the oath of allegeance of the Catholicks, ſhortly after departing thence, the 22 of October comming to Presburg, was there by the nobilitie of Hungary receiued and brought into the city with 10000 ſouldiers: which States afterwards, C viz. the 6 of Nouember, offered in writing vnto the King certaine articles, whereof they deſired to be by him aſſured: moſt of which articles were drawne out of the pacification made at Vienna the 23 day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1606, the chiefe effect wherof was this: That the free exerciſe of religion ſhould be permitted vnto all men in all the cities and townes of Hungarie, not ſo much as that city excepted wherein the king ſhould be reſident: That no German Captaine ſhould be ſuffered in any the ſtrong forts of Hungarie, but that the ſtrong townes of Rab, Comora, Viuaria, and others, ſhould be committed vnto the gouernment of natural Hungarians borne: That the crowne of Hungarie ſhould ſtill be kept in Hungarie, and committed to the keeping of temporall men: That firſt and before all other things, a Count Palatine ſhould be choſen: That the king himſelfe ſhould alwaies reſide in Hungarie; or if not, that the D Palatine ſhould in his abſence haue full power, with the counſellors of Eſtate of Hungarie, to determine and conclude of all things, and that the King ſhould therewithall hold himſelfe contented: That no publicke office ſhould bee beſtowed vpon any, but vpon ſuch naturall Hungarians as had of their countrie well deſerued; nor permitted vnto any for money: That no Ieſuites ſhould be ſuffered in the Kingdome, neither that Eccleſiaſticall men ſhould bee ſo much fauoted as formerly they had been: That officers ſhould not be bound to giue account of the adminiſtration of their offices, but before the Treaſurers of Presburg, being naturall Hungarians borne: That from henceforth money ſhould not be carried out of the Kingdome, as hitherto it had beene: That the Palatine being dead, the King ſhould within a yeare chuſe another, the chiefe Iuſtice in the meane time after the old manner ſupplying his roome.

King Matthias goeth to Preſburg.

Articles by the Hungarians preferred vnto King Matthias at Presburg.

E The Proteſtant States of Auſtria had a little before ſent their Embaſſadors vnto the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie, then gathered together at Presburg; with requeſt, that foraſmuch as they could not by any intreaty obtain of the king the free exerciſe of their religion, as well within their cities as without, and that verie neceſſitie had driuen them by force of armes to ſeeke for the ſame, that they would by ſending of them men, affoord them ſuch aid as was vnto them due by the former pacification made at Vienna in the yeare 1606. Which troubles of Auſtria the Nobilitie and States of Hungarie deſiring to haue appeaſed, ſent George Turſon and ſome others with letters of interceſſion in their behalfe vnto the Archduke Maximilian: which when they had deliuered vnto him, they receiued from him this anſwer, that king Matthias neuer thought to diſturbe the common quiet of that countrie, or to attempt any thing F againſt the priuiledges thereof, granted by the Emperor Maximilian of happy memory: but to grant vnto the cities the libertie of religion, he could by no means, partly in reſpect of conſcience, partly for the danger that might thereof enſue from the Pope and the king of Spaine, and yet neuertheles, that he would promiſe to ſuffer and tollerat the free exerciſe of religion without the cities, and in the beſtowing of publike offices to haue no reſpect of religion: yet with this condition, that they ſhould lay downe armes, ſubmit themſelues vnto the King, acknowledge their fault, and craue pardon for the ſame; for that in ſo doing, the States ſhould haply preuaile more than by force of armes.

The Proteſtant States of Auſtria by the Hungarians aduiſed to lay downe armes, and to ſubmit themſelues vnto the King.

With which anſwer, ſeeing no better could be got, the Hungarian Embaſſadors going vnto the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, began by diuers reaſons earneſtly to perſuade them to ſubmit themſelues vnto the King. If the Hungarians ſhould (as they ſaid) giue aid vnto them of Auſtria, they ſhould in ſo doing, in ſtead of helping them, but do them more harme; for that the Hungarian power could not be brought into Auſtria but to the vtter deſtruction thereof. That the league betwixt the Hungarians and them of Auſtria was a general league, and concerned as well the Catholiques as the Proteſtants. That the Chriſtian religion was neuer with the ſword planted or defended, Chriſt himſelfe ſaying, them to be happie which therefore ſuffer perſecution, and commanding Peter to put vp his ſword into his ſcabberd. That it was an eaſie matter for euery man to raiſe ſtirs and tumults, but that againe to appeaſe them was a far harder matter. That by the taking vp of armes, the free exerciſe of Religion could not be furthered or prouided for, it being rather dangerous, leſt the contrarie part preuailing, it ſhould be vtterly ſuppreſſed. That by this meanes Hungarie it ſelfe ſhould be expoſed to many dangers, for that not only new ſtirs might vpon this occaſion by the ſubiects thereof be raiſed, but other forein Princes take vp armes againſt it alſo; the Emperour by force of armes ſeeking for his right, and the Turkiſh Sultan by a new inuaſion going about to bring the ſame vnder his ſubiection: and telling them further, the Archduke to haue promiſed to take good order for al things, ſo that they would lay downe armes: and that the clemencie and bountie of thoſe princes being knowne, they were not to doubt but that they would indeed performe what they had in word promiſed: and that the Hungarians could not now do or attempt any thing againſt the King: but that if it ſhould happen theſe two Archdukes being dead without heires male, the gouernment of theſe two Prouinces ſhould come vnto the Archduke Ferdinand, that then they ſhould haue more cauſe to helpe them of Auſtria againſt him. Morauia they ſaid to be a free countrey, and yet the King to haue thereunto giuen no more aſſurance for the libertie of religion, more than his bare promiſe. Wherefore ſeeing that both the fortune and chance of war was doubtfull, and that war was not without the great expence of mony to be maintained; that they were of opinion, it to be beſt for the Proteſtant States of Auſtria to lay down armes, and by way of requeſt to ſolicitie their cauſe with the King.

In the meane time, the griefes whereof the Hungarians complained being taken away, and all controuerſies happily ended, Illiſhaſchius was by a general conſent choſen to be Palatine, and Mathias the 14 of Nouember openly proclaimed King of Hungary; and the 19 of the ſame month in S. Martins church at Presburg in this manner crowned: Firſt, the royal Crowne was in a ſtately chariot carried out of the caſtle vnto the church, with a great number of the Counſellors and Nobilitie of Hungarie attending the ſame; in which chariot were alſo carried ten Enſignes, with the armes of the Kingdome in them frilled vp; foure of the Hungarian Counſellors taking it out of the charet in a little cheſt couered with cloath of gold, and ſo carrying of it into the Chancel of the church. After which, King Matthias, together with the Archduke Maximilian his brother, followed on horſebacke, both attyred in Hungarian apparell, and ſo going into the Chancel, there ſtayed about halfe an houre, vntill that he was by two Biſhops brought forth vnto the Altar, before whom ten of the Hungarian nobility caried the ten aforeſaid enſignes: after whom followed the Palatine with the Crowne, Endeodius with the royall Scepter, Forgatſie with the Apple of the kingdome, Turſo with K. Stephens ſword, Tſechius carrying the Pax, as they call it; Budian the Croſſe, the Cardinal Forgatſie ſaying Maſſe, with diuers biſhops and prelats helping of him; by whom the King was at the beginning of Seruice annointed with oyle: where, while the Epiſtle and Goſpel were in reading, the Cardinal ſet the crowne vpon the Kings head, all the people crying out, Long liue Matthias the King of Hungarie. But the King with the crowne vpon his head taking a drawne ſword out of Sigefred Collonitz the Marſhals hand, thrice brandiſhed it acroſſe ouer the Clergy mens heads, and receiued the ſacrament at the Cardinals hand. The Maſſe being ended, he by an high way couered with cloth, going in his royal robes from S. Martins church, vnto the bare-foot Friers church, as he went, cauſed mony to be caſt abroad among the people. In which church after the firſt chapter of the Goſpell of S. Iohn being read, he made 28 Knights. From thence the king with the crowne yet on his head, and in his ſtately robes, went out of the citie at S. Michaels gate, and there on horſebacke was brought vnto an high ſtage couered with cloath, whereon he was ſworne vnto the Hungarians as their King, and they vnto him as his ſubiects: And afterward thrice mounting vp to horſe vpon a little hill made for that purpoſe, and ſo downe againe, and thrice brandiſhing his ſword acroſſe, he returned backe againe into the caſtle, where hee with Maximilian the Archduke, Cardinall Forgatſie, the Popes Nuntio, and the Palatine ſat downe at one table, the reſt of the Hungarian nobility, to the number of 70, ſitting downe at ſix other tables, and ſo dining with great mirth; the Haiducks and common ſort of people beeing there bountifully feaſted alſo: where many of them, in ſcrambling for the money that was caſt abroad, and in taking vp of the cloth from the ſcaffold, hauing their hands and fingers cut off, and ſo lamed, carried from thence the wofull remembrance of that was there then done.

The ſolemnitie of this coronation thus paſt, king Matthias thought it good for him yet for a time to ſtay at Presburg, vntill that the new building in the caſtle was ended, which the nobilitie of Hungarie had appointed for the keeping of the Crowne of Hungarie, to the intent that he himſelfe might ſee the ſame, with other the royall ornaments, put thereinto, and ſealed vp with his owne ſeale: he in the mean while labouring to appeaſe diuers contentions, and to place fit men againe in the great offices of the common-weale: for that the Hungarians would by no means ſuffer the Germans to enioy any of the ſame: for which cauſe many of the chiefe officers, men of great authoritie, were diſplaced; and amongſt them, Sigifrid Collonitz alſo, a man who had moſt well deſerued of the kingdome of Hungarie: howbeit, ſhortly after he by the counſell of Maximilian the Archduke was by the Hungarians themſelues (repenting them of that they had done) not only reſtored vnto his former offices, but had by them (and that not without his iuſt deſert) euen greater preferments offered him alſo; ſo mutable a thing the iudgment of the common people is. But Illiſhaſchius, now the Palatine of Hungarie, the 28 day of Nouember talking with the king Matthias at large, and earneſtly entreated with him in the behalfe of the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, eſpecially for that the other Proteſtant States of Hungary ſeemed now in their behalfe to be much moued alſo; and the Morauian Embaſſadors openly at the ſame time proteſting, that their ſtates could in no wiſe forſake them their friends the States of Auſtria, if their need ſo required. And albeit that both the Elector of Saxony, and other Princes of the Empire, were become earneſt interceſſours alſo vnto the king for them, yet the Popes Nuntio ſo hardly withſtood them, as nothing could as then be granted.

Illiſhaſchius & others in vaine intreat for the States of Auſtria.

About the beginning of December the king returning againe from Presburg to Vienna, about the 16 of December the Proteſtant States of Auſtria at length ſent Erneſtus the free Baron of Landau, Maximilian Polheime, Sebaſtian Grobner, Charles Forberger, Pilgram Sitſendorff, and Chriſtopher Buchner, their Embaſſadors vnto the king, to bring them anſwer whereunto to truſt: who the 27 of December receiued anſwer, That they ſhould hold themſelues contented with ſuch anſwer as they had before receiued, and to ſubmit themſelues to the kings pleaſufe, or els to do what they themſelues ſaw good. With which anſwer they returning, the ſtates forthwith began to leuie new forces, and to perſuade their ſouldiers, that mindfull of their othes, they ſhould faithfully ſerue whitherſoeuer and againſt whomſoeuer they were led.

The ſtates prepare themſelues for war.

And now a great army of the Proteſtant States of Auſtria lay in the villages about Crembſa and Spaine, ſo that thoſe two townes were thought to be in great danger of them: for the ſtrengthening of wich places, Bucheime was by the king ſent thither with 1500 horſe and certain pieces of great ordnance, and an Edict withall publiſhed the 10 of Ianuary, charging the States to be preſent at Vienna the 21 day of the ſame month, to take the oth of their allegeance to the king. Howbeit, they moſt ſtifly ſtill refuſed ſo to do, or to remit any thing of that which they had before required: inſomuch, that Maximilian the Archduke, who hitherto had not a little laboured in this cauſe, was quite out of hope to bring them to any conformity, or make any good end thereof. In the mean time certain of Bucheime his horſemen on the kings part being about to haue taken vp a place, ſuch as they thought conuenient for them to lodge in, had like to haue bin diſappointed of the ſame by the horſmen of Gerrane, on the States ſide. About which matter Bucheime comming forth with 7 troups of horſmen, and Gerrane but with three troups of horſe, and 3 companies of foot, there was betwixt them an hot skirmiſh for the time fought the 13 of Ianuarie: in which skirmiſh 100 of Bucheime his horſemen were ſlaine, but of Gerrane his men not ſo many, they hauing the aduantage of the ground, and ſo therewith in the skirmiſh holpen both for the defence of themſelues and the annoying of their enemies. G Whereof the king hauing knowledge, and therewith much moued, beſide the aforeſaid Edict, cauſed another to be proclaimed at Vienna, againſt ſuch ſouldiers as ſerued the Proteſtants; proſcribing them all, and pronouncing them Rebels, except before the 21 day of Ianuary, they laying downe armes, departed out of the Proteſtants campe. Howbeit, the Proteſtant States were ſo far from diſmiſſing their forces, as that they with new ſupplies ſtrengthened the ſame: and hauing taken an hill not far from Hallenbynne, and from thence diſcharging three tire of 20 pieces of great ordnance, ſtrucke a great feare and terror into the minds of the kings ſouldiers within the towne.

About this time alſo the States of Morauia (that nothing might on their part bee wanting for the making of an attonement betwixt the king and the Proteſtant States of Auſtria) ſent H ſome of their Embaſſadors vnto thoſe States at Horn, and otherſome vnto the king at Vienna; who hauing acceſſe vnto the king, declared vnto him the States of Morauia, from whom they came, to be earneſtly importuned by the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, to ſend them aid, according to the agreement made with them the yeare before: and told him moreouer, That this manner of his proceeding tended not vnto peace and quietneſſe, but rather vnto the trouble and deſtruction both of the kingdom and of all the other Prouinces to him belonging: all that error, the ground of thoſe troubles (they ſaid) to depend of a peruerſe interpretation or miſconſtruing of words, rather than of the matter it ſelfe; ſo that it might by men deſirous of peace eaſily be compoſed and ended. And that therefore their requeſt vnto his Maieſtie was, That he hauing regard not onely vnto the good and welfare of his prouinces and ſubiects, but I euen of himſelfe and of his honour alſo, would of his clemencie and goodneſſe vouchſafe to giue remedie vnto the preſent danger, and auert the miſerable calamities now hanging ouer them, and euen readie to fall vpon their heads. The Proteſtant States they ſaid to be content to put the controuerſie to be decided and compoſed by certaine graue and wiſe men, to be choſen arbitrators on both parts; yet with this condition, That for the ſpace of 14 daies no hoſtility ſhould on either ſide be vſed: that the inhabitants both aboue and beneath Amiſum ſhould be compriſed within this truce: that ſuch as were kept in durance for their religion, ſhould be ſet at libertie: and that all high waies and paſſes ſhould be from all ambuſhes, and other dangers cleared. Vnto which their requeſts the king condeſcending, gaue leaue vnto the States of Morauia, vpon they moſt equall conditions the could deuiſe, to compoſe and end all matters: K who ſo laboured in this buſineſſe betwixt the king and the Proteſtant States of Auſtria, that at length, viz. the 12 of March, a pacification was made betwixt the king and them his ſubiects; Leopold the Archduke, Melinus the Popes Nuntio, the Biſhop of Vienna, and other great men of the contrarie Religion and faction, ſeeking in vaine to haue letted the ſame: the chiefe articles and points of which pacification were theſe: That the nobility in their caſtles & towns, as alſo in their houſes in the cities, ſhould for themſelues and their people haue the free exerciſe of their Religion: That the free exerciſe of preaching might be vſed the in 3 Churches at Iſerſdore, Trihelſuincell, and Horne: That the other Churches ſhut vp, might againe bee opened by three of the Romiſh and three of the reformed Religion, and the free exerciſe of Religion in them vſed: That counſellors and other publicke officers ſhould from thenceforth L indifferently be choſen of men of both Religions; but that ſuch offices as were hereditarie ſhould ſo ſtill remaine: That the Election of Magiſtrates and other publicke officers in towns and cities, ſhould from thenceforth be made by the Magiſtrates and citiſens themſelues, & not to be nominated from the Court, as hitherto they had bin: That no Church ſhould hereafter be ſhut againſt either part, but their owne Churches to be left vnto them both, quietly to vſe: That the townſmen and citiſens in their townes and cities ſhould from thenceforth haue power to make choice of their Miniſters and preachers: and that for them it ſhould be lawfull to viſit the ſicke, and to adminiſter vnto them the Lords Supper: That the oath of allegeance ſhould be taken of them of the reformed Religion, in like manner as it had bin before taken of them of the Romiſh, but yet not with the ſame ceremonies of the Romiſh church; all vnion & M confederation with them to be had, to be taken away: that all grudging hatred, and quarrell ſhould be on both ſides forgiuen, & for euer forgotten: Wolfgang of Hoffkirch, Volſegius and others remoued & put from their offices, for not taking the oth of alegeance, being again receiued into fauor, and reſtored into their places: That it might be lawfull for the towns & cities

The articles of the pacification in Auſtria.

A aboue Amiſum, to haue the free exerciſe of the reformed Religion in their Suburbs and Hoſpitals.

It was not long after this Pacification ſo made, but that King Matthias the ſeuenteenth of May going to Lintze with three hundred horſe, was there with eight troupes of horſemen, and fifteene companies of foot, by the States ſent forth to meet him, moſt honourably receiued, and by three triumphal Arches brought into the citie: where he receiued of the States of the Religion, the Oath of their obedience: which with much joy, triumph, and feaſting performed, hee the ſeuen and twentieth of the ſame moneth againe returned to Vienna. The aforeſaid States of Auſtria in the meane time with great zeale continuing the free exerciſe of their Religion at Horne; a great multitude of people dayly reſorting vnto the Sermons there B made: they of the Romiſh Religion much grieuing and fretting thereat. The King himſelfe alſo being come to Vienna, put diuers of the Romiſh Catholiques out of their Offices, and placed others of the Reformed Religion in their roomes, to the great diſcontentment of many.

The States of the Reformed Religion in Auſtria take the oath of obedience vnto King Matthias.

About this time the Baſſa of Agria, notwithſtanding the peace, had for the ſumme of twentie thouſand crownes before hand payed, ſecretly compacted with one Andrew Drake, to haue the ſtrong towne of Fileck in the vpper Hungarie deliuered vnto him. Which the traitor had intended (as he himſelfe confeſſed) to haue performed, by ſetting of the houſe wherein hee himſelfe dwelt, by night on fire: vnto the quenching whereof the garriſon ſouldiers reſorting, his purpoſe was in the meane time to haue ſecretly let in the Turks, and ſo to haue deli- C uered the towne into their hands. But this his ſo wicked a purpoſe in good time diſcouered, and by him confeſſed, he was therefore, as he had well deſerued) aliue cut into foure pieces: a iuſt reward for his foule intended treaſon. The Baſſa of Buda alſo, contrarie to the treatie of peace, about the ſame time went about to haue exacted the Oath of allegeance of aboue foure hundred countrey villages of the Chriſtians, being not compriſed within the foreſaid treatie. But as the Turkes for their part were ſecretly plotting how to encroach vpon the Chriſtians, and to do them harme; ſo the Haiduckes on the other ſide in great numbers gathered together in the vpper Hungarie, began here and there to moleſt and trouble the Turkes, vntill they were by their Superiours commanded to deſiſt from ſo doing, for diſturbing of the Peace.

The Turks ſeek ſecretly to encroch vpon the Chriſtians, and the Chriſtians ſeeke againe to annoy them.

D Now about this time alſo, Illiſhaſchius the Countie Palatine of Hungary died at Vienna; a man much beloued of the Hungarians his countreymen, and now by them no leſſe lamented for: whoſe dead bodie was with great honour afterward conueyed from Vienna, vnto his owne territorie in Hungarie, and there with all funeral pompe buried with his Anceſtors. In whoſe ſtead George Turſon was afterward by the general conſent of an hundred and fifty of the Hungarian Nobilitie choſen Countie Palatine of Hungarie, and ſo with the vniuerſal and ſolemne acclamations of the people ſaluted.

Illiſhaſchius the Palatine of Hungarie dieth.

And now the troubles for Religion were ſcarcely wel ended in Auſtria (as is aforeſaid) but that the like, or rather worſe, began forthwith, euen for the ſame quarrel, to ariſe in Bohemia; the Huſſites (as they call them) moſt earneſtly importuning the Emperor for the free exerciſe E of their Religion, or rather for the taking away of certaine grieuances done to their Religion: and the Romane Catholiques euen at the ſame time leauing nothing vnattempted, which might ſerue to bring them of the Religion into hatred with the Emperour, and others ſitting at the helme of the gouernment of the Eſtate, and ſo to fruſtrate whatſoeuer the Emperour had in the general Aſſembly of the States, the laſt yeare granted vnto them of the Religion, for the free exerciſe and aduancement thereof. The compoſing of which controuerſie, (tending vnto the rending in ſunder of the whole Kingdome) when as the Emperor had referred vnto certaine of his chiefe Counſellours, and they altogether fauouring the Romane Catholiques, would giue them of the Religion no certaine anſwer whereon to reſt; they therewith much diſcontented, as out of hope to be by them relieued, and in great feare to be by F their Aduerſaries, as enemies vnto the State, oppreſſed, layed their heads together, and after good deliberation taken, what were beſt for them to do, both for the ſafetie of themſelues, their wiues, children, and Religion; they by a general conſent, of themſelues appointed the fourth of May to hold a general meeting of them of the Religion, in the new court at Prague, there to conſult of all matters concerning the buſineſſe of Religion. And yet in the meane time openly in Parliament proteſting, by the mouth of Wentceſlaus Bodonitſius a Baron of Bohemia, Them to haue appointed this Aſſemblie for the Emperors good, and for the common quiet of the whole Realme; as alſo for the better informing of the Emperour of all matters: and to prouide that the Emperor and the kingdome might not through the meanes and perſuaſions of thoſe his euill Counſellors be brought into extreme perill and danger. Immediatly after, the States of the Religion, with all ſpeed diſpatched their Embaſſadors vnto King Matthias, the Electour Palatine, the Duke of Saxonie, and the Duke of Brunſwicke; to requeſt them, by their interceſſion to become mediators for them vnto the Emperor, for the obtaining of the free exerciſe of their Religion, which in all points agreed with the confeſſion of Auguſta, and which long before was exhibited vnto Maximilian the Emperour, and by him allowed. Now in the meane time theſe the States of the Religion were by ſome for theſe their proceedings commended; but by other ſome not onely blamed, but alſo accuſed of rebellion againſt the Emperour and the State. But the matter being declared vnto the Emperour, he complaining vnto himſelfe of the inconſiderateneſſe of his Counſellors; to maintaine his authoritie, cauſed the parliament then in hand to be prorogued; and to ſeeme of himſelfe to grant that which he could not well withſtand, commanded by a Decree, that ſame verie day to be appointed for the concluding of that article of Religion, on which the States themſelues had before appointed their aſſembly to be holden in the new court at Prague. Notwithſtanding which Decree, many troubleſome ſpirits publiquely ſet forth other their conceits in writing, to far other purpoſe, grieuouſly therein reprehending the States of the Religion, for that of themſelues they had appointed a day for their aſſembly into the new Court at Prague: Which (as they ſaid) was nothing els but in a rebellious manner to riſe againſt the Lawes of the Kingdome, and the authority of their lawfull Prince: and therefore aduiſed them to forbeare from making any ſuch aſſemblie as was by them appointed. Hereof aroſe great troubles euen vnder the Emperors noſe, in Prague the chiefe citie of Bohemia, they of the Religion not daring to truſt the Roman Catholiques, neither they them; being ſtil ready vpon euery falſe report, or vaine ſurmiſe, to go together by the eares: vntill that the Emperour for the ſtaying of theſe troubles, and the auoyding of further danger, was glad to cauſe it to be openly proclaimed in the new Court at Prague, That his Imperial Majeſtie hauing receiued and vnderſtood the Apologie of the States, now did abrogate that his Edict publiſhed againſt them but a few dayes before; and now by this his new Edict did account all the States of the Religion for his faithfull and well beloued Subiects; and as of them vnto whom the right of the Kingdome, and the King his oath belonged, as wel as to all other States of the kingdome. And that he alſo had thoſe the ſame States excuſed, in that they for the good of his Majeſtie, and of the whole Kingdome, had appointed their aſſemblie in the new Court at Prague: and that therefore he denounced them in ſo doing, not in any thing to haue done any thing contrarie vnto his Majeſtie. And that he appointed the fiue and twentieth day of May for the general aſſembly of Parliament to be holden in the caſtle of Prague, for the ending of the Article concerning Religion, and the reforming of other the publique grieuances of the Commonweale: yet with this prouiſo, That the ſaid States ſhould ſafely and quietly come vnto the ſaid Parliament, without entertaining of any forreine ſouldiers; as that his Majeſty ſhould alſo, not by himſelfe nor any other, for pay entertaine any, or ſuffer any forreine ſouldiers to come into the Kingdome. Which the Emperors Edict being proclaimed, the States of the Religion hauing made their publique prayers, and ſung certain Hymnes and Pſalmes vnto the glory of God, for the good ſucceſſe of their buſineſſe, left the new court at Prague, and returned euery man home to their owne houſes, to make themſelues readie to come vnto the Parliament to be holden at the appointed day.

The Emperor maketh faire weather with the States of the Religion in Bohemia.

The States of Bohemia by writing declare vnto the Emperor their purpoſe for the defence of their Religion.

But the day appointed for the Parliament being come, and the Emperour ſtill delaying the matter, the States of the Religion wearie of ſuch long delayes, and in doubt to bee therewith deluded, as hauing not receiued from the Emperour any ſuch anſwer as whereon to reſt, the third of Iune offered vnto the Emperour a ſhort writing, concerning their griefe and further purpoſe, to this effect. They had (as they ſaid) expected, and well hoped, that regard being had not onely of ſo many requeſts of ſo great and moſt noble Princes, made in

A their behalfe ; but euen of the Emperour his promiſe alſo, made vnto them, both in the generall aſſembly of the States the laſt yeare, and in the late precept of the Emperours alſo, they ſhould at length haue receiued ſuch anſwer vnto their petition, concerning the free exerciſe of their Religion, as whereon they might haue ſafely reſted. Which for that it had not beene yet done, they referred the doing thereof vnto God and future time ; imputing the blame thereof not vnto his Imperiall Majeſtie, but vnto the vnquiet and troubleſome natures of ſome as well the Eccleſiaſticall as Temporall magiſtrates and perſons. But foraſmuch as they meant not longer to be deluded by their enemies, and much leſſe to be defrauded of his Majeſties royall promiſe, which was now vnto the World knowne, they had thought good to offer and preſent vnto his Maieſtie a writing conceiued in the Bohemian tongue : according B vnto which they deſired to be ſecured, concerning the free exerciſe of their Religion ; moſt humbly requeſting his Maieſtie to accept of the ſame, and at length to ſatisfie their requeſts. Which if it might not be granted (the Emperour his Maieſtie hauing more reſpect vnto the troubleſome Clergie men, and ſome other his euill affected counſellors, than to the faithfull States and ſubiects of his Kingdome) that then they would reſt themſelues vpon the Decree made in the aſſembly holden in the yeare 1608, and vpon the laſt edict of his Maieſtie : yet with this ſolemne proteſtation, That ſeeing they had by certain information vnderſtood, much warlike preparation (but eſpecially in Bauaria) to be made, and diuers conſultations in many places to be holden againſt the States of the Religion (his Imperiall Maieſtie and the other his faithfull Counſellours, thereof not knowing) which might tend vnto the ruine and deC ſtruction both of his Maieſtie and of the whole Kingdome: they themſelues would take vpon them the defence thereof, and to doe their endeauour, that furniſhed with men and armes, they might to the vttermoſt of their power defend him their Soueraigne, together with themſelues, and the whole Kingdome, againſt the force and inuaſion of their foreine enemies.

In the meane time while theſe things were thus in doing, an Embaſſadour came from the Duke of Saxonie to Prague, to intreat the Emperour for the States, and for the granting of them the free exerciſe of their Religion : the Embaſſadours of the States of Sileſia forthwith following of them alſo, who in like manner requeſting alſo of the Emperour, to haue the libertie for the free exerciſe of their Religion by him confirmed vnto them ; promiſed their D moſt readie help and aid vnto the States of Bohemia, if need ſhould ſo require. But the States of Bohemia hauing from day to day in vaine expected anſwer from the Emperour, turning themſelues vnto their former reſolution for the defence of themſelues and of their Religion ; forthwith raiſed a great number both of horſe and foot, whome with their well knowne captaines and Commanders they brought euen vnto the citie of Prague. Howbeit at length, viz. the eleuenth of Iuly, the Saxon Embaſſadors earneſtly ſoliciting their cauſe, and vrging their requeſt, they according to their deſire receiued anſwer from the Emperour, by letters from his Maieſtie written to this effect.

The States of Bohemia raiſe their forces.

Hee gaue all men (as hee ſaid) to vnderſtand, and by theſe his letters witneſſed to eternall memorie, That after that all the free States of his Kingdome of Bohemia, which, in the E receiuing of the Lords Supper, participate the bodie and bloud of our Lord Chriſt Ieſus vnder both kindes, his faithfull ſubiects, had in the aſſemblie holden in the caſtle at Prague in the yeare 1608, in all humilitie requeſted, That it might be lawfull for them to hold, and freely to exerciſe their Religion, according to the Confeſſion of Auguſta (as ſome call it) exhibited vnto his father Maximilian the Emperour of moſt happie memorie, and by him vnto the ſaid States allowed : and that he then and at that time, by reaſon of other moſt weightie buſineſſe, for which that aſſemblie was then called, and ſuch as could ſuffer no procraſtination or delay, had thought it good to deferre the allowing and ratifying of this their petition, vnto this preſent aſſemblie of Parliament : and that the ſame States now againe aſſembled, inceſſantly renewing this their former petition, and hauing thereunto joyned alſo the requeſt and F interceſſion of certaine noble perſonages, had requeſted to be therein ſatisfied : and that hee with his Counſellours would conſult how prouiſion might bee made for his ſubiects in the Kingdome of Bohemia, as well communicating vnder both kindes, as vnder one ; now at length to haue effected the ſame. Wherefore ſeeing that his will and deſire was, that both in

in theſe nad future times peace and quietneſſe might for the increaſing of the Kingdome be G preſerued and kept amongſt his ſubiects of all the three eſtates of the Kingdome of Bohemia, communicating as well vnder the one, as vnder both kindes : that both parties might freely and without any impediment or let, hane the free exerciſe of their Religon, whereby they were both in hope to obtaine euerlaſting ſaluation. And to the intent that accompliſhment and ſatisfaction might in all poynts bee made, as well according vnto the breaking vp of the aſſemblie of Parliament in the yeare 1608, as to the performance of his owne precept, of late publiſhed (whereby hee hath acknowledged, and euen yet acknowledgeth, thoſe ſame Eſtates communicating vnder both kindes, and ſubſcribing to this confeſſion, for his faithfull and loyall ſubiects, vnto whom the rights and immunities of the Kingdome of Bohemia belonged) hee by the common conſent of the Councellours, H and other Magiſtrates of the Kingdome did determine, That his ſubiects communicating both vnder one and both kindes, ſhould friendly and peaceably liue together, without wronging or reuiling of one another ; and that vpon the payne and penaltie in the Law ſet downe, to be inflicted vpon them that ſhould otherwiſe doe. And moreouer, ſeeing that they which communicated but vnder one kinde, enioyed the free exerciſe of their Religion in all poynts throughout the Kingdome of Bohemia, that hee gaue leaue and commaunded, that they alſo which communicated vnder both kindes, viz. all the States of the Religion, with all ſuch as embraced the Confeſſion of Bohemia, ſometime exhibited to Maximilian the Emperour his father, in the Parliament holden in the yeare 1575, and now againe to himſelfe preſented, ſhould euerie where and in all places of the Kingdome, haue the free exerciſe of their Religion, without the let or interruption I of any ; to retaine the ſame, vntill a generall vnion of Religion, and an ending of all diſſention and controuerſies might bee made. Moreouer, That hee did grant vnto the States of the Religion this fauour, That they ſhould haue the lower Conſiſtorie at Prague, with power to conforme the ſame according to their owne Confeſſion. That they might lawfully make their Prieſtes, as well in the Bohemian as Germane Tongue, and ſet them ouer their Churches, without any let of the Archbiſhop of Prague. That hee did alſo reſtore vnto them the Vniuerſitie of Prague, which for many yeares agoe belonged vnto the States of the Religion vnder both kindes : giuing them power againe to open the ſame, to furniſh it with graue and learned men of their owne Confeſſion, to beautifie it with good K Lawes, and to appoint certaine of their owne companie and profeſſion for Gouernours and defendors as well of the Conſiſtorie as of the Vniuerſitie : whome ſo by the States appointed and choſen, hee without any ſtay or delay, or other inſtruction or information than they ſhould from the States receiue, would confirme in that their office, and pronounce them for the lawfull Defendours : yet ſo, as that if hee beeing letted by other greater buſineſſe, cannot performe the ſame within the ſpace of foureteene dayes, they ſhall neuertheleſſe continue Defendours, and as well enioy the charge of the office committed vnto them, as if they had beene therein by him confirmed : and that one or other of their number beeing dead, it ſhall bee lawfull for the States to chuſe other in their places. And if that beſide the Churches which they now hold, they would build other moe, or erect moe L ſchooles for the inſtructing of the youth, it ſhall bee lawfull for them freely and without any let ſo to doe, as well in the Cities as in the Countrey Townes and villages. And foraſmuch as in ſome of the Cities of the Kingdome of Bohemia, men of both religions dwelt together, hee therefore did will and commaund, That for the preſeruation of peace and quietneſſe, either part freely exerciſing their religion, and obeying their Prieſts, ſhould by no meanes either hurt or trouble them on the other part ; and much leſſe to hinder them to burie their dead in their Churches or Church-yards, with the ringing or tolling of the Bels, or goe about to turne any man from his Religion, of what ſtate or condition ſo euer he bee, whether hee dwell in the Citie or in the Countrey towne or village ; or by force to draw them to their opinion, or to take their part. For that he onely reſpected, that peace and M quietneſſe might be kept, and that mutuall loue might ſtill grow amongſt all the three States:
Vnto which end and purpoſe, that hee for himſelfe and his heires, and the Kings of Bohemia his Succeſſours, in the Faith and word of a King, did graunt and promiſe vnto the

A States of the Religion, vnto whom this common peace of Religion (as they call it) belongeth, as to a principal member of the Empire, all theſe things to be for euer inuiolably kept (the Eccleſiaſtical and temporal perſons whoſoeuer in vaine reſiſting) ſo that no contrarie precept or Edict, ſhould either by himſelfe, or any other his heires or ſucceſſors be publiſhed againſt the States of the Religion; or being publiſhed by any, ſhould be accounted effectual and ſtrong: eſpecially ſeeing that he by theſe his letters, pronounceth all the Edicts hitherto publiſhed againſt theſe the States of the Religion, to be voyd, fruſtrate, and of none effect. Neither would that any thing of thoſe which were done by the States of the Religion whileſt they ſought for the confirmation of this Article concerning Religion, ſhould for euer be layed to their charge, or by any man by way of reproch objected vnto them. And that B therefore he ſtraightly charged and commanded all Magiſtrates, and ſuch as bare rule in Bohemia, to the vttermoſt of their power to protect and defend all the three States, together with them of the Religion; and neither themſelues to trouble them, nor ſuffer them to be by any others for the exerciſe of their Religion moleſted or troubled: For that he and other the Kings of Bohemia his Succeſſours, would moſt ſeuerely chaſtiſe all ſuch as ſhould offend againſt theſe his Majeſties letters (which to be for euer remembred, he would cauſe the ſame to be enrolled in the publique Records of Parliament) whether ſuch offendors were Eccleſiaſticall or Temporall men; to bee ſharpely puniſhed as the troublers of the Common Peace.

This was the ſumme of his Majeſties Letters, which he cauſed to be publiquely ſet vp in C the Caſtle of Prague the thirteenth of Iuly, that it might be to all men knowne, this Article of Religion, which was the firſt of the Articles in this Parliament propounded, to be concluded and agreed vpon according to the minde of the States of the Religion, and ſo their requeſts to be in all points ſatisfied. Who forthwith thereupon, the fifteenth day of Iuly cauſed the firſt publique Sermon according to the confeſſion of Auguſta, to be preached in the German tongue in a Church of them of the Religion, which had for a long time before beene ſhut vp. At which time they alſo ſent vnto the Elector of Saxonie, to ſend vnto them certaine learned men, for the ſetting vp of the Vniuerſitie, and the gouerning of the Conſiſtorie at Prague. And yet for all this, the Embaſſadors for the States of Sileſia ſtill earneſtly laboring with the Emperor for the libertie of Religion to be granted to the ſaid States and the reſt D of the inhabitants of the Prouince; the States of Bohemia refuſed in any wiſe to diſmiſſe their ſouldiers whom they had muſtered neere vnto Roggenſon, vntill the Sileſians were of their requeſt in that point ſatisfied: offering alſo vnto the Emperor a large libell of the griefes of them the ſaid States.

Now it may be that ſome hauing read ſo much as is before written concerning theſe late troubles about the free exerciſe of the reformed Religion, but eſpecially in Bohemia, Auſtria, Morauia, and Sileſia, may deeme the ſame both tedious and beſide our purpoſe: vnto whom indeed it is not written; but rather vnto ſuch as who together with my ſelfe (the wars betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks ended, & the peace concluded as is aforeſaid) deſire yet to know in what ſtate thoſe frontier Countries ſtand; which being the greateſt Bulwarkes of E that ſide of Chriſtendome, and the chiefe Territories of the Houſe of Auſtria, are (the peace being either expired, or otherwiſe broken off) moſt ſubject vnto the furie of the puiſſant enemie, as neereſt vnto him, and ſo like ſooneſt to feele of his great force and power, prefining vnto it ſelfe neither bounds nor meaſure, ſo long as there is any thing farther. Againſt whom the Chriſtian Emperour had no other Forces of his owne to oppoſe, more than ſuch as hee could raiſe out of the reliques of Hungarie, and the aforeſaid frontier Countries. All together but weake helpes againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemie, as neuer commeth into the field but with a world of men following of him: but yet much weaker, being (as now of late they were) euerie one of them apart diuided in themſelues about matters of Religion, the incurable maladie of the Chriſtian Eſtates and Commonweales; the heauie and lamentable effect whereof too F much of late appeared in the loſſe of Strigonium, won by the Turks with a far leſſe army than euer the Grand Seigniors Lieutenant General was woont to come into Hungarie withall: and yet the Chriſtian Emperour by reaſon of the reuolt of the Hungarians (vpon a diſcontment about the exerciſe of their Religion) not able of himſelfe to relieue the diſtreſſed citie of Strigonium, or yet to put an armie of any ſtrength into the field, for the defence of the reſt of his cities or territories. So weake are euen the greateſt Princes, their ſubjects being among themſelues in mindes diuided.

The Turks Embaſſadour commeth to Vienna, and from thence to Prage

But not to ſtray farther, the Turks Embaſſador in the meane-time with a notable traine of an hundred and fiftie Turks comming from Vienna the one and twentieth of September, and there hauing ſaluted, and with great gifts preſented the King, ſet forward toward Prague, where he was by the Citiſens and certaine Noblemen of the Emperours Councell the 12 of October honourably receiued; and the 19 of the ſame moneth admitted vnto the Emperors preſence, firſt preſented vnto him from the Great Sultan his Maſter, a rich Tent of diuers colours, moſt curiouſly wrought with faire Orient Pearle of great value; and then foure couragious horſes, all furniſhed with moſt rich and ſumptuous furniture. He preſented vnto him alſo certaine Turkiſh weapons ſet and garniſhed with pretious ſtones, and a Princely Turks robe ſuch as they vſe at their marriages, gliſtering with gold and pretious ſtones, with diuers other rare things of leſſe value: together with which he deliuered vnto him the Great Sultans Letters; and withall deſired the confirmation of the Peace before made for twentie yeares, to be now againe renewed. Vnto which Embaſſadour Letters were afterward deliuered from the Emperor, together with certaine other rich Preſents to be by him preſented vnto the Great Sultan: viz. certaine Caroches lined within with Damaske, and couered without with blacke Veluet; ſix faire and gallant horſes moſt richly furniſhed; a Clocke of wonderfull workmanſhip; two faire Desks to write vpon of Ebonie; with diuers other like Preſents of no ſmall price. Who ſo charged with Preſents, and bountifully rewarded, and to his good liking anſwered, was afterward in the beginning of Ianuarie with a traine of 200 horſe from Prague honourably diſmiſſed.

Here followeth a Continuation of this preſent Hiſtorie (containing thoſe occurrents which haue happened to the Turkiſh Empire ſince the yeare of our Lord, 1609, vnto the yeare, 1617, &c.)

By EDWARD GRIMSTON, Sargeant at Armes.

THe Turkiſh Emperour, hauing beene freed ſome yeares from the care of warres in Hungarie, in regard that hee had concluded a truce for twentie yeares with the Emperour Rodulphus, he now bent all his forces againſt his Rebels in Aſia, and the Sophie of Perſia, where hee had no good ſucceſſe this yeare. For the Perſians hauing formerly extended their monarchie farre into the Turkiſh Empire, and defeated Cicala Baſſa and others in diuers battels; now they entered into the Prouince of Babylon, with a deſigne to joyne it to Perſia. Achmat to ſtay the courſe of their proſperitie, ſends a mightie armie thither, vnder the command of Naſſut Baſſa: but his fortune was no better than thoſe that went before him. The Perſians came to meet him, gaue him battell, defeated him, and ſlew 20000 of his men. Theſe mournfull newes comming to Court, did much diſtemper the Sultans minde; he could not endure it ſhould be ſaid, that the Perſian had defeated his mighty armies thrice in open battel; and much leſſe that it ſhould be ſo, and that hee ſhould ſeiſe vpon his countries: wherefore to repaire this loſſe, hee leuies new forces to be commanded by Gambolat Baſſa of Aleppo, who had beene the moſt powerful Rebell in Aſia, and was newly reconciled and brought into fauour with the graund Seignior. This man came to the Port to receiue the Sultans commandements, and to paſſe his armie into Aſia: but whether hauing ſome ſuſpition, that hee had intelligence with the Perſians, or that ſuch as enuied his greatneſſe, had giuen ſome bad impreſſion of his loyaltie to the Sultan; within ſome few daies after his arriuall, Achmat cauſed him to be ſlaine by his Capigi. Whereby wee may well obſerue, that hee that is a Rebell to his Prince, which hath ſo violently oppreſt his ſubiects, and ſet his countries on fire by ſedition, the which he hath been forced to quench with the bloud of innocents, cannot but end his daies violently and miſerably, ſeeing that God reuengeth the bloud of innocents vpon the guiltie.

The Perſians enter into the Prouince of Babylon.

The Turkes defeated.

The Turke makes Gambolat Generall of his armie.

Hee commands him to be ſlaine.

The Perſian ſeeing what aduantage hee had gotten of the Turke, laboured by the bruit of his victories, to draw the Chriſtian Princes vnto his partie, and with them wholly to ruine the Othomans; the which he had ſo happily begun. For the effecting whereof, he ſent his Embaſſadors to the Emperor being at Prague, to perſuade him to breake the peace with the Turke, and to joyne with him. The Embaſſadors arriued at Prague this yeare with rich and rare Preſents: firſt a croſſe of gold inricht with many precious ſtones; amongſt which there was one piece of amber, whereon was ſeene the figure of the Virgin Marie, holding her young Babe in her armes; the which was ſo artificially grauen, as it might be thought the worke of nature: a Topas of exceeding greatneſſe, giuen to the king of Perſia by an Indian king: two kniues of damaske, with hafts of jaſper, and their ſheaths couered with diamonds: a certaine kind of Indian wood of moſt excellent vertue, moſt ſoueraigne to cure the paines of the breſt, and to purge the ſtomacke: the gall of a pellican excellent to cure the pleuriſie, appoplexie, and feuer: two topazes the one white, and the other violet; this laſt was ſo big, as it was capable to make a cup: an Amathiſt as big as a hens egge; a Perſian bow inlaid with the veines of a cammell, and a rough diamond exceeding great; a white ſtone of the colour of water, which was a preſeruatiue againſt plague, beeing hung about ones necke; three orientall pearles exceeding big; three rich eſcarbuncles, and three marueilous faire diamonds; and withall this a ſerpents horne, much eſteemed for the rare vertues. All theſe Preſents were very wel accepted, and the embaſſadors much honored. But what apparance was there for the Emperor, who had ſo great differences with his brother Matthias king of Hungarie, who ſaw the greateſt part of his ſubiects rebelled againſt him, his Prouinces in diuiſion, Tranſyluania in combuſtion by the conſpiracie which had bin diſcouered againſt Battori, and finally a generall diſorder ouer all, to breake the peace with the Turk, (who was at his dore, retained only with this bar) and to allie himſelfe with the Perſian ſo far from his countries, from whom he could draw no ſuccors, but Embaſſadors come from the Perſian to the Emperour.

Preſents ſent to the Emperor

His affairs wil not ſuffer him to ioyne with the Perſian onely that he might keep the Othoman buſie in Aſia: Thus the Embaſſadors returned, carying G home nothing but good words.

The proceedings of Leopold in Bohemia.

Since the troubles which happened in Bohemia, made him ſee of what importance it was to entertaine peace with the Turke: for if he had broken it by the Perſians perſuaſion, he had giuen his enemy an aſſured means to ruine him: for the Archduke Leopold entred into Bohemia with an armie of 9000 foot, and 3000 horſe; he ſurpriſed pettie Prague, attempted the old towne, and ſeeking to force it, he ſlew many which made reſiſtance. Matthias king of Hungarie aduertiſed of this diſorder, parts from Auſtria with a powerful army, & aduanceth ſpeedily towards Bohemia. It was to be feared, that if Matthias army & Leopolds had met neere vnto Prague, it had been the loſſe and ouerthrow of the one, and the deſolation and ruine of the country. The Emperour foreſeeing this danger, cauſed 300000 florens to be deliuered to Romeo, H Leopolds Lieutenant, for the paiment of his army, and ſo ſent him out of Bohemia. This diuiſion betwixt the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria, grew by the practiſes of ſome of the Emperors Counſel, who being delegated judges to compound the differences of the Bohemians of diuers religions, in ſtead of labouring to reconcile and vnite thoſe people, for the good of the publique, they made themſelues partiſans to the one to oppreſſe the other, and thereby they drew the Princes into a dangerous diuiſion, for the ſupport of parties. And moreouer, the Archdukes Ferdinand and Leopold, practiſed to depriue Matthias king of Hungarie of the ſucceſſion which he pretended of Bohemia; leſt that being maſter, hee ſhould take reuenge vpon their partiſans for the troubles wherewith they had formerly afflicted the countrey. Such was the eſtate of affaires in Germanie, giuing the Turke a faire opportunitie, if he could haue embraced ſo rich an occaſion, to make his profit of their combuſtions. But the confirmation of the I truce, and the affaires of his houſe, kept him in Thrace.

Cauſes of the troubles of Bohemia.

The gallions of Malta defeated by the Turkes.

Let vs ſee how the Turke ſpeedes at ſea; where he hath the knights of Malta, the Sicilians, and Neapolitanes, and the Florentines, vigilant and valiant enemies to annoy him, and croſſe his deſignes. The laſt yeare, which was 1609, the Chriſtians had no good ſucceſſe, loſſe fell particularly vpon the knights of Malta: for he that fights often, can hardly vanquiſh alwaies: The gallion of the Order, commanded by Chiualier Guidoti, an Italian, had made two voyages to ſea very fortunatly, and brought to Malta 300 Turkiſh ſlaues. The encouragement of this good ſucceſſe engaged many knights to diuers enterpriſes. They armed certaine gallions, and made a fleet of ten good ſhips of war, as vnfortunat in their courſes as the gallion of the Order K had beene before ſucceſſefull: for meeting with the Turkes fleet in the ſeas of Cyprus, they were ſet vpon, and moſt of them ſlaine or made ſlaues. The knight Freſſinei was ſlaine, and the red gallion wherein he commanded taken by the Turks; but it was after a whole daies fight. Ambuſon otherwiſe called Fueillade another knight, was made a ſlaue, and his gallion taken: the knight Ouges ran the ſame fortune, with the loſſe of a gallion. Freſſinet hauing brought a pinnace with him to attend his ſhip, after ſome fight neere vnto the gallion, it eſcaped by night. In this voiage vnfortunat for them of Malta, the gallion of the Order would needs ſeek ſome better aduenture: the knights of Baillou, and Rhodes did accompanie him either of them with a ſmall gallion. He ſet vpon the carauan of the Turks fleet, neere the Iſland of Rhodes; his ſucceſſeful beginning of this combat made him hope for victory, and the number of the enemies L veſſels for a rich bootie: for there were among the reſt 2 great gallions of the Sultans; theſe are ſhips which belong to the great Seigiors women, loaden commonly with great riches: but 20 gallies of Rhodes ſeeing this fight, came out of their port to ſuccor them, and by the fauor of a faire wind, drew them into ſafetie.

The gallion of the Order ſets vpon the Turks Carauan.

At Malta the bruit was, That the Turkes armie conſiſting of fourſcore gallies, ſhould goe and beſiege the Iſle of Goza, whereas a Knight called Saint-Liger commanded. Whereupon the Great Maſter had reſolued to fortifie the Caſtle of the Iſland, with a good counterſcarfe, which hee cauſed to bee made, ſending thither two hundred ſouldiers, and thirtie Knights for ſupplie, all braue ſouldiers, who might haue made a great reſiſtance, if the Turkes had attempted it: but the enemies fleete paſſed on, and gaue them time M to reſt.

But this yeare 1610, Vignancourt the Great Maſter of Malta, ſent the fiue Gallies of the Order into Barbarie, towards the Port Farino, memorable, for that it was the hauen where Saint Lewis the French King ended the nauigation of his dayes, and at his returne from Hieruſalem and Paleſtina, went to receiue in Heauen the glorious palmes of his holy actions. The gallies of Biſerta had beene accuſtomed to fetch palmes there in that ſeaſon (which was in the Spring time) whom the gallies of Malta had a deſigne to ſurpriſe. But the contrarie winds, and the tempeſtuous ſeas ouerthrew that enterpriſe, yet their voyage was not altogether vnprofitable; for returning towards Malta, beeing within the channell, which diuides the Iſland from that of Sicilie, they encountered with a great gallion of Tunes, armed by a Turke called Carouſinan, beeing in view of the gallies of Malta: The Rayſe (who commanded) aſſured his companie, and (ſmiling) promiſed to free them from their enemies. Being ſo tranſported with vanitie, as he ſpake confidently, that he would not feare twentie of the gallies of Malta: but this his pride was ſoone abated with his ruine; for the fiue gallies came cloſe vnder him, and plied him ſo furiouſly with their cannon, as they ſunke him. The gallie wherein Verdelli an Italian Knight commanded, had like to haue been loſt, for beeing grapled with the gallion, if the diligence of Verdelli had not ſpeedily retired it. The Turks after the loſſe of their veſſell, began to ſwim away, but they were all made ſlaues to ſerue in the gallies of Malta, who this yeare had no other fruits of their generous enterpriſes.

They ſink a gallion of Tunes.

The courſes of the Duke of Tuſcanie his gallies

They take a Turkiſh ſhip.

The gallies of Coſmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuskanie, parted from Ligorne, vnder the conduct of the Commander, and Admirall Inghirami, and running alongſt the coaſt of Barbarie, they tooke a Turkiſh ſhip in the ſight of Algier, loaden with merchandiſe, armes, and munition of warre, freeing many Chriſtian ſlaues which were in it. This happie beginning promiſed them better fortune. They paſſe on, and ſome twentie fiue leagues beyond Algiers they goe to ſurpriſe the towne of Biſquerre, a ſmall towne in circuit, but ſtrong and well walled. Inghirami drawing neere vnto the coaſt, tooke downe his maſts, leſt they ſhould diſcouer his comming. In the meane time he ſent two long boats to finde ſome place fit for their landing; the which being carefully obſerued, Colonell Bindy landed his men, and about eleuen a clocke at night marched in good order towards the towne, and forced it. The darkneſſe of the night kept them from ſpoyling it; beeing content onely to ſet their guards and Sentinels in the moſt important places of the wall: but day beeing come, the ſouldiers made themſelues maiſters of the towne, which they ſacked and ſpoyled. Certaine Moores and Turkes, during the obſcuritie of the night, had retired themſelues into a Moſque which they fortified: They were ſummoned to yeeld; but the feare of beeing ſlaues, (which they could not auoid) made them reſolue to die in their owne defence; ſo as the Florentines hauing forced the place, put them all to the ſword; and then embarqued their troupes, hauing filled Biſquerre with fire and bloud. The night following, beeing in the Gulph called the Bad woman, they met with a pinnace loaden with corne, the which they tooke, and ſent to Ligorne, and then they paſt on to encreaſe their conqueſt. Beeing vpon the coaſt of Sardinia, two Galliots of Biſerta did furniſh them with a faire occaſion. Inghirami ſendeth his gallies to purſue them, who hauing had them in chaſe threeſcore leagues, tooke the one, wherein they had one hundred and twentie ſlaues, and freed many poore Chriſtians from the chaine, who ſuffered the tyrannie of the Turkiſh ſeruitude. They alſo tooke a Turkiſh Gallie within halfe a league of Algier, and ſpoyled it. And thus triumphing ouer their enemies, they tooke their courſe towards Ligorne, hauing taken foure Turkiſh veſſels, ſpoyled the towne of Biſquerre, and twice braued that of Algier.

They take diuers Turkiſh Veſſels.

The Moriſques or new Chriſtians chaſed out of Spaine.

This yeare was fatall for the Moriſques or new Chriſtians in Spaine, who being in number nine hundred thouſand perſons, as the originall writes, and had continued there from father to ſonne, for the ſpace of almoſt nine hundred yeares, were now in an inſtant baniſhed, and made vagabonds with the blaſt of the Kings mouth: Men diſcourſed diuerſly heereof. Some ſaid, that the King had reaſon to do it, for that they had ſecret practiſes and intelligence with the Turke his capitall enemie. Others affirmed, that he did wiſely to preuent their attempts againſt his Eſtate, which were to bee feared conſidering their numbers were ſo great. And ſome ſaid plainely, that it was to haue their lands and inheritances, which had continued ſo long in their races. But the King declared his owne intent by his Edict, the which he publiſhed in theſe termes.

The King of Spaines Edict.

The King: For that reaſon doth in conſcience binde a good and Chriſtian gouernment, to G expell out of all Realmes and Common-weales thoſe things which breed ſcandall, and bring hurt to our good ſubiects, & danger to the Eſtate, but eſpecially which are offenſiue to God, and preiudiciall ro his ſeruice: for this cauſe experience hauing taught vs, That the reſidence of the new Chriſtian Moriſques, and their abode in the Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andeloſia, hath beene the cauſe of all theſe inconueniences: For that beſides the manner of their proceeding, which joyned in the rebellion of Granado, the which began by cruell murthers of all the Prieſts and old Chriſtians which liued amongſt them, calling the Turke in to their aid; yet hauing drawne them out of the ſaid Countrey, and ſuffered them to liue in our other Prouinces, ſo as they would repent them of their faults, and liue faithfully and Chriſtian like, according to the precepts and iuſt ordinances which H were giuen them: They haue not obſerued and kept them according to the ſtrict and direct rules of our Holy Faith: but haue alwayes made ſhew to contemne it, and to haue no feare to offend God; as hath beene ſeene by the great numbers which haue beene puniſhed by the Inquiſition: and beſides, they haue committed many thefts and murthers againſt the old Chriſtians. And not content herewith, they haue conſpired againſt my Royall Crowne and Realmes, ſeeking aid and ſuccours from the Turke, certaine interpoſed perſons beeing ſent to that effect, and doing the like with other Princes, promiſing vnto themſelues ayde and aſſiſtance, offering vnto them their perſons and meanes. And ſeeing that during ſo many yeares, in which they haue practiſed theſe treaſons and conſpiracies, not any one hath come to reueale them, but they haue alwayes couered, concealed, and denied them; I it is a moſt apparant ſigne, that they haue all beene of one minde and will, againſt the ſeruice of God and of mee, and againſt the good of this Realme; yet they might haue imitated many Knights of theirs, of generous extraction, who haue done ſeruice to God, to the Kings our progenitours, and to vs, like good Chriſtians, and moſt loyall vaſſals.

Wherefore conſidering all this, and how much I am bound to ſet downe ſome good order, and to procure the preſeruation and increaſe of my Realmes and ſubiects, and deſiring to prouide for all; I haue decreed, with the aduice and counſell of many iudicious learned men, and others, that are verie religious, wiſe, and jealous of Gods ſeruice and mine, to chaſe out of the ſayd Realmes of Granado, Murcia, and Andeloſia, and out of K the Towne of Hernache (although it bee not within the limits of the ſaid Realmes) all the new Chriſtians Moriſques, both men, women, and children. For when as a great or deteſtable crime is committed in any Colledge or Communaltie, it is fit that Colledge or Communaltie ſhould be ruined, and that the leſſe for the greater, and one with another, ſhould bee puniſhed: And that ſuch as peruert the good and ſincere life of Common-weales, and of their Townes and Cities, ſhould be baniſhed from other inhabitants, leſt their contagion infect them.

For this cauſe, by vertue of theſe preſents, wee ordaine and commaund, That all the new Chriſtians Moriſques, without any exception of age or ſexe, of thoſe that liue and reſide in the ſaid Realmes, and in the Towne of Hernache, except ſuch as be ſlaues, ſhall L within the ſpace of thirtie dayes after the publication heereof, depart out of all our Realmes, and Dominions of Spaine, with their wiues, children, ſeruants, and others of their Nation: and that they ſhall not preſume to returne nor to make any reſidence in them, in any ſort whatſoeuer, And wee forbid them to depart by the realmes of Valencia, or Aragon, nor to enter into them, nor to ſtay in any of our Realmes or Countries after the time prefixed, vpon paine of death, and confiſcation of all their goods. And wee command, that no perſon within our realmes and Seigniories, of what eſtate, qualities, or condition ſoeuer, ſhall preſume to receiue, conceale, or defend publiquely nor ſecretly any Moriſque man or woman, after the ſaid tearme, vpon paine to loſe all their goods, vaſſals, forts, and lands; and moreouer to loſe all the graces, and benefits which they haue from mee, to be M applied to my Exchequer.

And though I may juſtly confiſcate all the goods moueable and vnmoueable of the ſaid Moriſques, as belonging to traitours, and guiltie of high treaſon; yet vſing clemencie, I am content, that during the ſaid terme of thirtie daies, they may diſpoſe of their moueable goods, and carrie them away, not in gold, ſiluer, iewels, nor letters of exchange, but in merchandiſe, which is not prohibited, bought of the naturall ſubiects of this realme, and not of others: or in the commodities of the ſaid countrey. And to the end they may during the time of thirtie dayes diſpoſe thereof, and of their mooueable goods, and employ it in merchandiſe, or in the commodities of the countrey, and tranſport what they ſhall buy (for as for their lands, that muſt be annexed to my reuenues, to be employed in the ſeruice of God and the common weale, as I ſhall thinke moſt fit) I declare by theſe Preſents, that I take them into my royall protection, and aſſure them and their goods, That during the ſaid time they may goe and come, to ſell, exchange, and alienate all their mooueable goods, and to employ their money, gold, ſiluer, and iewels, in merchandiſe not prohibited, or in the commodities of the Countrey, and to tranſport the ſame freely, without any let or interruption, by land or by ſea, paying vſuall cuſtomes; ſo as they carrie no gold or ſiluer coyned, or to coyne, nor any other thing prohibited by the lawes of my realme. Yet we are content, they ſhall carrie ſo much money as ſhall be needfull for their paſſage by land, and embarking by ſea: commanding all our officers and louing ſubiects to ſee this preſent Edict duely obſerued, &c. Signed, I the King.

After the publication of this Edict, the tearme of thirtie dayes was reſtrained to twentie, ſo as the Moriſques were haſtened to depart: and the ſhips and veſſels of what countrey ſoeuer, were ſtayed in all the ports of Spaine, to tranſport them whither they would goe. Many paſſed from Spaine into Barbarie: but during this yeare there came aboue 150000 of theſe Moriſques into France; the King ſending Commiſſaries, to ſee them well vſed, and orderly tranſported away.

Warre in Barbarie.

There was a warre fallen out in Barbarie betwixt Muley Xequy, King of Fez, and Muley Sidan his younger brother, both Mahometanes; in which warre the younger forced the elder to flie his Countrey, and to come and craue ayd from Philip King of Spaine: But the vnfortunate loſſe of Don Sebaſtian King of Portugall, was a good preſident for the Spaniard not to truſt in barbarous Kings, without good aſſurance: Hee treated with the Barbarian, and promiſed him ſuccours, with an hundred thouſand Duckats to returne to Alarache, (a place which held for him) where by money or other practiſes, hee ſhould draw vnto him as many ſouldiers as hee could: And that for the ſafetie of the ſuccours that hee ſhould giue him, hee ſhould put Alarache or Arrache into his handes. This Arrache is a ſtrong Towne in the Realme of Fez, in the Prouince of Algar, ſeated vpon the Ocean, at the mouth of the Riuer of Lucus, whereon part of it is built, and the other part vpon the Ocean: It hath a goodly Port, and hard to take for that it is defended by a Fort, in the which the Kings of Fez doe vſually entertaine a garriſon of three hundred light horſe, and three hundred harquebuſiers: for that the Portugalls and Caſtilians, hold in a manner all the Sea Townes of the Prouinces of Habat, and Erif, where they haue great Garriſons. This Prouince is from the Riuer of Nocor along the Mediterranean Sea, vnto the ſtraight of Gibralter, the other is vpon the Ocean from the ſaid ſtraight vnto the riuer Lucus, in the which the King of Spaine holdeth at this day the ſtrong Townes of Tanger, Arzilla, and others. According to the former accord, the Barbarian returned to Arrache, with his money in one of the King of Spaine his ſhips; to whome in a ſhort time repayred many of his friends and ſeruants. The Spaniard in the meane time hauing prepared a fleet of a great number of gallies and ſhips, and embarqued ten thouſand ſouldiers therein, he gaue the command thereof vnto the Marqueſſe of Saint Germaine, who arriued on the twentieth of Nouember in the euening at the Port of Arrache, and there rode at anchor all the night. The next day in the mornining, the Marqueſſe calling all the Captaines to a Counſell, imparting vnto them his deſigne for to force Arrache, in caſe that the Mooriſh King did not keepe his promiſe; they gaue him aſſurance, that they would carrie themſelues like vnto braue and valiant ſouldiers. But ſee what happened: The King of Fez hauing no meanes to goe from his word, ſeeing the Spaniard ſo ſtrong as hee might well force it, many of his followers and people, fearing to fall vnder the power of Spaine, they would haue abandoned him: but hauing the Gouernour of the caſtle at his deuotion, hee thruſt out the garriſon,and deliuered the keies himſelſe vnto the Marqueſſe of S. Germanie. Vpon the firſt bruit that the Spaniards were entered into the caſtle,all the inhabitants ran to armes, and thinking G to reſiſt them, after that many of them had ended their daies valiantly,during 3 houres combat,they were forced to yeeld vnto the Marqueſſe, who preſently planted the croſſe and armes of Caſtile vpon all the Towers and Steeples. Thus this ſtrong towne which the Caſtilians and Portugals had ſo long deſired, and whereas the inhabitants receiued a great ruine, is in the end falne vnder the domination of their king. The newes of this exploit being brought into Spaine, pleaſed the King much,and the people made bone-fires for joy: theſe are the alterations of times. The Moores in old time were woont to ouerrun Spaine,and now the Spaniards take their pleaſures in Mauritania.

A great battell in Tartarie.

About the end of this yeare newes came to Conſtantinople, of the great warres which had been between the Vncle and the Nephew,by the death of the great Cham of the Tartars: the H ſonne,who during his fathers life time,had continued at Conſtantinople as an hoſtage,and was now ſent backe into his countrie by the Sultan Achmat,thinking to enioy his fathers eſtate;his vncle,brother to the deceaſed Cham, practiſed to ſeize vpon the crowne: but either of them hauing drawne an armie of 60000 men together,in the end,they ioyned battell,whereas after the ſlaughter of 40000 men vpon the place,the ſonne had the victorie,and by that meanes obtained the Crowne of Tartaria.

I will conclude this yeare 1610, with the relation of a particular buſineſſe, to ſhew the greedie deſire of the Turkes to get by any vniuſt meanes whatſoeuer, and their infidelitie and falſhood to ſay and ſweare any thing for bribes. Some yeares before,one Maſter Willoughbie an Engliſh Gentleman, hauing rigged vp a ſhip for war into the Leuant, hee came into Algier in I Barbarie to ſell his prize, where at that time one Solyman Catania was Baſſa. This ſhip,was ſuddenly ſeiſed on,and rifled by the command of this Baſſa,vpon no other ſubiect,but that the Baſſa pretended this ſhip had burnt a Caramouſall of his, which in truth the Baſſa himſelfe had cauſed to be ſet on fire,that vnder colour thereof he might ſeiſe vpon the ſhip and goods. Maſter Willoughby went to Conſtantinople, and there made his complaint to Sir Henrie Lilloe, then Embaſſadour for the Engliſh, but yet could get no ſatisfaction: whereupon he returned into England,and obtained letters from his Majeſtie to the Grand Seignior,and to Sir Thomas Glouer,then Embaſſador,reſiding at Conſtantinople; which hauing receiued, he went preſenly to the Chimacham (who was Lieutenant to Murath Baſſa the grand Viſier, hee beeing then K imploied in the warres againſt the Perſian.) The Chimacham hauing read theſe letters,would not ſuffer them to be deliuered to the Grand Seignior; promiſing to doe juſtice vpon Solyman Catania, whom he diſcharged from his place,and ſent for him to Conſtantinople; who beeing come, and called in queſtion, he denied the fact: Maſter Willoughbie (hauing no certaine proofe of his loſſe) ſuborned one Oſiſh Baſſa a Turke, who had beene at Mecha, and was therefore held a verie holy man, who ſet a brother of his to procure falſe witneſſes, vpon promiſe to haue the tenth part of what ſhould be recouered: The witneſſes being readie to ſweare to his aſſertion, Solyman Catania hearing their Oath, compounded with Maſter Willoughbie, and gaue him foure or fiue thouſand Dollars; ſo the buſineſſe ended. Which ſhewes the corruption of the Turks,and that the holieſt of them for mony will not ſticke to beare falſe witneſſe, L and take falſe Oathes.

200000 perſons died of the plague.

This yeare 1611 the citie of Conſtantinople was wonderfully afflicted with the Plague, the which diſperſed it ſelfe ouer all, and crept into the Grand Seigniours Seraglio, whereas one of his ſonnes died of that infection: whereupon the Grand Seigniour was forced to retire for his ſafetie, and to paſſe the remainder of the Summer in his pallace or Seraglio of Darut Baſſa, about a league and a halfe diſtant from the citie, this violent contagion did ſo rage in Conſtantinople for the ſpace of fiue moneths,as there were numbred two hundred thouſand perſons dead within the time, and they did commonly carrie euerie day twelue or fifteene hundred bodies to be buried. The greatneſſe of this mortalitie is not to be imputed ſo much to the corruption of the aire,as to the wilfull negligence of the Turks, who would not vouchſafe M to turne away from a bodie dead of this diſeaſe, when it goes to buriall, nor to forbeare to viſite their friends beeing infected.

The Turkes obſtinate beliefe touching predeſtination.

The obſtinate beliefe they haue of Predeſtination maketh them bruitiſhly contemne all ſorts of dangers: For ſay they, as ſoone as man comes out of his mothers wombe to inioy the light of the world, God writes in his forehead al the good or euill ſhall happen vnto him, and particularly of what death he ſhall die, the neceſſity whereof no humane power can auoid. All is gouerned (ſay they) by Deſtinie, and therefore they regard not any infection, but contrariwiſe when any one is dead, another takes his cloathes and weares them: which is the cauſe that Conſtantinople and the grand Caire are ſeldome free; and when as the aire is any thing diſpoſed to contagion, there dies ſuch multitudes of people, as they do not number them but by hundred thouſands.

Before the beginning of this plague, the Baron of Salignac Embaſſadour for the French King at Conſtantinople, ended his embaſſage with his life. His moſt Chriſtian Majeſtie ſent the Baron of Mole, eldeſt ſonne to the Baron of Sanſie, to ſupplie his place. Hee arriued at Pera this yeare in the beginning of September, and about the end of October the Sultan being returned to Conſtantinople, after that hee had viſited the Muphti, (who is the chiefe of their Law) the Graund Viſier, the Deftorda, (who is the Sultans high Treaſurer) the Boſtangi Baſſa his chiefe Gardiner, with other Great men of the Port which were highly in fauour; in the end he was admitted to audience, and to kiſſe the Sultans hand. A ceremonie which in mine opinion I owe vnto the Hiſtorie, to ſhew that the Majeſtie of the Turkiſh Emperours is ſo great, as to approch neere vnto them, the Embaſſadours of forreine Princes are forced to diſguiſe themſelues, and leauing the habits of their nation, to attyre themſelues and their Traine after the Turkiſh manner. Thus the Embaſſadour of France parted from his Lodging at Pera, wearing vpon his French apparell a long Turkiſh Robe of cloath of gold curled, furred with Sables: his Gentlemen and Secretaries to the number of ſixteene had the like Robes, but of meaner ſtuffe, wearing caps of blacke Veluet: hee had twentie Seruants in long caſſockes of skarlet, called in Turkiſh, Ferrages, and vpon them long Robes of the ſame ſtuffe, with caps of Taffata; the foure Dragomans or the Kings Interpreters, the Captaines, Maſters of Ships, and other Frenchmen attyred all in long Robes, accompanied the Traine. Hee paſt the channell which doth ſeparate Pera from Conſtantinople: being come to the other ſide, he found many goodly horſes for him and his Traine, which ſome Turkes that were friends to France, had ſent him to conduct him to the Citie; at the gate whereof many Chiaus and Ianizaries attended him to conduct him to the Seraglio: two Chiaus Baſſa's went of either ſide him, accompanying him thither, the reſt of the Turks going before. His arriual was no leſſe honorable at the Palace Royal, than his comming to the towne: Two Capigi Baſſa's, or chiefe of the Porters, receiued him at the entrie of a great Court, and conducted him to the Graund Viſier, who attended him at dinner in the hall, where he was feaſted, being accompanied onely with one Dragoman or Interpreter: the reſt of his Traine were conducted into a low gallerie, whereas dinner was prepared for them after the Turkiſh manner: That is to ſay, a great Tapeſtrie vpon the ground without cloath or napkins, and ſome diſhes thinne ſet. The meat was water-gruel with ſugar, and ſome pottage with pullets: there were two men either of them holding a certaine inſtrument of ſodden leather, in which there was a beuerage which they call Cerbet, made of the juice of Lymmons, water, and ſugar, and withall they held a cup of blancht copper, giuing to euery one drinke, and going among the diſhes to ſerue them more commodiouſly. From this feaſt, diſtaſtefull to them that had liued after the French faſhion, they paſt into another gallerie, whereas the Embaſſador and ſixteene of his companie receiued each of them a robe of Tinſell, the which hauing put on vpon their other, they were conducted thorow a little court paued with marble, towards the Grand Seigniors chamber, which was enricht on the out ſide with many pillars of marble, & ſquare ſtones of the ſame ſtuffe, and beautified with two little fountaines of either ſide: The Chamber within was about ten paces ſquare, the planchard was gilt, the walls enamelled with flowers after the Turkiſh manner, and the floore couered with Tapeſtrie of gold and ſilke. At the entrie of this Imperial chamber ſtood ſix Capigi or Porters, whereof two of them tooke the Embaſſador vnder the armes, and led him to kiſſe the Sultans hand, or rather his Robe; for hauing ſaluted him from the greateſt of Chriſtian Kings, he kiſt but his Robe, and then was led on the one ſide, going backewards, to the end he ſhould not turne his backe to the Emperor. The French gentlemen were conducted after the like manner to kiſſe his robe. But they could hardly ſee the Sultan, for his face was turned towards a window that was grated, before the which, during the ceremonie there paſt 30 Capigi, euery one carrying a piece of the Preſents which the Embaſſadour had brought: during the which, the Frenchmen could not ſee him but on the other ſide. This ſalutation being ended, the Embaſſador made a ſhort ſpeech, and preſented vnto the Sultan the principal letter of his embaſſage, written in the Tur- G kiſh tongue.

Troubles in Tranſyluania.

The Valachian expelled his Countrey by Battori.

Battori defeated by the Valachian.

This paſt at Conſtantinople, whereas the Sultan did willingly ſee an Embaſſador his Allye, whom he honored aboue all others. But in Tranſyluania the affaires went after another ſtrain;
the combuſtions which ſeemed inſeparable to this miſerable Prouince, made it ſtill the theater of all diſorders. Gabriel Battori, who gouerned it ſince the ceſſion of Ragotzi, had put him-ſelfe into the Turks protection, againſt King Matthias, who pretended a title, by reaſon of the ceſſion made by Prince Sigiſmund vnto the Emperour, as King of Hungarie, and had recouered Hermſtad, and chaſed Raduille Vayuod of Valachia out of his Countrey; where hauing ſettled a new Gouernour, and filled the garriſons with Haiduckes, he returned toward Tran- H ſyluania, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt Fortgatſie King Matthias his Lieutenant, who came with Troupes out of high Hungarie, and paſt the riuer of Tibiſce. The Vayuod Raduille had retyred himſelfe into Moldauia to Prince Conſtantine, whom he gaue to vnderſtand, That Battori had an intent to ſeiſe vpon his Country, and to make but one Monarchie of their three Prouinces; whereupon they joyned their forces together, and in the end of Iune entered into Valachia, from whence they expelled Battori his Lieutenant with all the garriſons. This exploit made them to hope of a continuance in the proſperitie of their armes; they entered into Tranſyluania, whereas they purſued Battori with ſuch diligence, as they forced him to come to a battell neere vnto Cromſtat, the which he loſt with part of his troupes, being conſtrained to ſaue himſelfe with his horſemen in Hermſtad, whereas ſome of the chiefe inhabitants ſee- I ing him receiue this diſgrace, attempted to ſubmit themſelues vnder the obedience of king Matthias: but the practiſe being diſcouered by him, he did ſuch execution, as he purchaſed to himſelfe the name of Cruell.

Fortgatſie lieutenant to King Matthias, enters Tranſiluania.

Battori his practiſes.

Fortgatſie expelled Tranſiluania by Battori.

In the meane time Fortgatſie Lieutenant to King Matthias, maketh vſe of this defeat to ſeiſe vpon Tranſyluania; hee made an Accord with Andrew Nage (who had drawne high Hungarie into rebellion, and cauſed the Haiduckes to reuolt) ſo as being freed from that feare, he entereth into Tranſyluania; where hauing taken ſome Townes and Caſtles, he layed ſiege to Clauſenburg, the which he battered ſo furiouſly, as the garriſon and inhabitants ſeeing themſelues readie to be forced, yeelded, and tooke the Oath of allegeance to King Matthias the fiue and twentieth of Iuly. But as theſe proſperities of Fortgatſie were hu- K mane, ſo did they not long continue. Battori being ſhut vp in Hermſtad, conjures all his friends to come vnto him, and entreated the Baſſa's of Buda and Temeſware to ſuccour him, according to the commandement which they had receiued from the Grand Seigniour: he practiſed with Nage (a man which did ſwimme continually in the floats of inconſtancie) and makes him to reuolt againe in high Hungarie, vpon a ſurmiſe, That Fortgatſie had not kept promiſe with him; ſo as Nage tooke armes againe, ſeiſed vpon the Fort of Bayens, and filled all high Hungarie with combuſtions; ſo as Fortgatſie could expect no ſuccours at his need from thence:
then hauing receiued ſome forces from the Turkes and Tartarians, he went to field, purſuing Fortgatſie with ſuch heat and furie, as he forced him to abandon all that he had taken in Tranſyluania, and to retyre into Valachia. What deſolations did this warre bring vnto theſe Pro- L uinces by ſo many priſes and repriſes? Battori going with a thouſand horſe to ſurpriſe Tocai, vpon the frontiers of Valachia, whereas they then held a great faire, he found the garriſon ſo watchfull vpon their guard, as hauing loſt part of his horſemen, he was forced to returne into Tranſyluania.

Fortgatſie his miſerable retreat.

On the other ſide, Fortgatſie with his Hungarians, thinking from Valachia to recouer high Hungarie by the Countrey of the Zeclerians, could not effect his deſigne: for Battori being aduertiſed thereof, ſtopped his paſſage; and in like manner the Earles of Bucheime and Dam-pier had paſſed the riuer of Tibiſce to meet him: ſo as Battori ſet ſuch guards in all the paſſa-ges and ſtreights, that Fortgatſie was forced to retyre towards Polonia by the ſteep mountains, and deſart places, whereas his armie was ſo oppreſt with famin and all other neceſſities, as they M periſhed miſerably, there remaining few aliue; with the which he ended his paſſage into Po-lonia, and from thence ſoone after he returned into Hungarie, but with a verie poore equipage.

Troubles in Moldauia.

tempeſt riſeth in Moldauia, to the end that theſe vnfortunate Regions ſhould neuer be without ſome touch of miſerie: For the Turke hauing vnderſtood, That Conſtantine Prince of that countrey had relieued the Valachian againſt Battori his allye, or rather his Tributarie, he ſends a new Prince into Moldauia, the ſuppoſed ſonne of one Thomas, or Aaron as ſome write, who had in former time commanded there, and with him fifteene hundred ſouldiers, with Letters of command to the Turkes and Tartarians thereabouts, to aſſiſt him with their Forces. This new Prince was ſometime in France, and afterwards detained priſoner in the Fort of Iaques in Spaine, within the Pyrenean mountaines. Thus two Princes contend for Moldauia, the one ſupported by the Polonian, and the other by the Turke. But behold, a third Prince commeth in and pretends a title, being ſonne to one Ianicolo who had commanded there. This man had beene a priſoner in the blacke Tower at Conſtantinople, to which he was committed by the Sultan Amurath, for that hee had loſt a battell in the yeare 1601, againſt Michael, who then poſſeſt Moldauia; who eſcaping from thence, wandred through diuers countries, and at laſt comming into England, his Maieſtie of Great Britaine pittying his miſerable eſtate, recommended him by his Letters to Sir Thomas Glouer his Maieſties Embaſſador, then reſiding at Conſtantinople, with commandement to aſſiſt him, and to ſolicite his reſtitution with the Grand Seigniour. Vpon the receit of which Letters, he retyred this wandering Prince into his houſe at Pera, where he entertained him, with many of his friends and followers which repaired vnto him, for a long time; and in the meane time hee ſolicited the Grand Seigniour for his reſtitution, hauing good acceſſe vnto him, by reaſon that hee ſpake the Turkiſh tongue perfectly, and needed no Dragoman or Interpreter. To whom the Sultan ſtill gaue good anſwers, but with delayes, that it was not yet time; but hee ſhould haue ſatiſfaction. His Competitor (who was in poſſeſſion of Moldauia) hearing of this practiſe, made friends at the Great Turks Court, and corrupted ſome of the Baſſa's by bribes, (they beeing all by nature verie couetous) to the end he might croſſe his deſigne, and make him away if it were poſſible: and among the reſt he had woon Murath Baſſa the grand Viſier, a man of great power and authoritie, who practiſed many meanes to get the Moldauian into his hands. Firſt, he ſent word vnto the Embaſſador, That the Sultan hauing a meaning to reſtore him, deſired to ſee the man, if he were capable of the place or no: but being aduertiſed of their intent, and well acquainted with their practiſes, hee refuſed to ſend him. After which, he wrot vnto him, That it was the Graund Seigniours pleaſure hee ſhould ſend the Moldauian vnto him, that hee might confer with him. To whom the Embaſſador made anſwer, That vnleſſe he might ſee a Warrant vnder the Grand Seigniours owne hand, he would not deliuer him. Murath Baſſa ſeeing that none of theſe practiſes could preuaile, reſolued to fetch him out by force. For the effecting whereof he drew together two thouſand Ianizaries. The Embaſſador hearing of his intent, fortified his houſe, and armed his people with the Moldauians which were with their Prince, meaning to ſtand vpon his defence. Murath Baſſa deſirous to know what the Embaſſadour did in his Lodging, diſguiſed a Ianizarie like vnto a Greekiſh Sheepheard; who entering into the Embaſſadours houſe, found them all in armes: then returning vnto the Baſſa, hee told him that he had to do with a mad man, and if he proceeded in his enterpriſe, hee would hazard the loſſe of many Ianizaries: whereupon hee gaue it ouer. After which, the Embaſſadour being called home into England, the Moldauian deſpairing of reſtitution from the Turkiſh Sultan, he turned Turke; and being preſented to the Grand Seigniour, was made Bey of Burſia in Aſia: the which he enioyed not long; for Naſſuf comming from the Perſian warres, diſcharged him. Thus Moldauia hauing many pretending Soueraignes, ſuffered many miſeries, and was a prey to Turke, Tartarians, and Polonians, all partiſans to theſe Soueraignes.

The voyage of the Gallions of Florence against the Turkes.

Theſe were the troubles which the Turkes cauſed at land for the ruine of the Chriſtians. But behold what hee ſuffered at ſea by the Gallies of Florence, Malta, and Naples; the Florentines made their enterpriſe apart. The Great Duke of Tuſcanie being aduertiſed, That the Carauan which tranſported the Tribute of Ægypt to Conſtantinople, prepared to put to ſea, he reſolued to diuert this tribute, and by the valour of his armes to bring it to Ligorne: and for the effecting hereof, hee ſpeedily armed foure Gallions, vnder the command of Beauregard a Frenchman, who was Admiral. The firſt was called the new Gallion, in which the ſaid Admiral went: the ſecond, the great Ligorne, commanded by Brandequedor, dor, Generall at land, and allied to the Duke; and the other two were commanded by two G French Captaines. Beauregard hauing receiued commandement, to paſſe with this fleet into the Leuant, to meet with the Carauan, hee bent his courſe towards Candie, a fertile Iſland inhabited by the Græcians: Beeing arriued in the port of Caliſmene to water, he continued there ſix daies. Leauing this Iſland, he ſailed towards Cyprus, which is held by the Turks, and ſo coaſting Siria, they learned of a ſhip of Marſeilles, that the Carauan was yet in the port of Alexandria, where they prepared for their voyage to Conſtantinople. To attend them, the Admirall Beauregard, went and caſt anchor at the fort of Sidon, called Sarepta, gouerned by Emir, or Armil Facardin, a Rebell to the Turke, and a great friend to the Florentines, where hee ſtayed twelue dayes, to take in Bisket, fleſh, and other neceſſarie refreſhings. And hauing made a more ſtrickt league of friendſhip with Facardin, hee honoured him with a coffer full of armes, whereby the Florentines ſhips came as freely into thoſe parts, as into their owne H countrey.

The enterpriſe to take the carauan of Ægypt.

Beauregard hauing well victualled and munitioned his gallions, hee returned towards the Iſle of Cyprus, whereas he found a Chriſtians ſhip called the flying Dragon, which came from Damietta, by whom he was aſſured that the Turks army, conſiſting of a great number of gallies, was gone out of the port of Rhodes, and had taken a Flemiſh ſhip. Theſe newes made him thinke that hee ſhould meet the fleet, and that he muſt of force defend himſelfe. Wherefore he made all things readie, and preſcribed the order which his Captaines ſhould hold during the fight; cauſing his ordnance to be mounted as if they were to ioyne. He had foure as good gallions, and as well furniſhed, as any were in the Leuant ſeas, either of them beeing armed I with 40 pieces of ordnance, and 400 good ſouldiers. Betwixt the Iſland of Cyprus and Caramania they encountered this Turkiſh fleet, conſiſting of fortie gallies and two galliaſſes, vnder the command of Baſſa Muſtapha Grego, who was Generall of this fleet, which was in ſight of the Florentines ſhips: the galliaſſes aduance to take view of them, and to find how far their cannon would reach; and in the meane time the gallies put themſelues into the forme of a Croiſſant, readie for the combat. Beauregard an old ſea Captaine, and well practiſed in ſea fights, would not make a ſhot againſt the gallies, but attended vntill the whole fleet came cloſe vp to him; which being neere, he ſaluted them ſo furiouſly with his cannon, giuing them the broad ſides, as the Turks (who expected no ſuch reception) were all amazed; and making a ſtand, would proceed no further. Their Generall hauing well obſerued the reſolute counte- K nance of the Florentines, diuided his gallies into two ſquadrons; giuing charge to the one to giue an aſſault to the Florentines gallions; and in the mean time the reſt ſhould prepare themſelues to fight.

The Florentines meet with the Turkes fleet.

The Turks aſſaile the gallions of Florence.

Being thus diuided, they came one after another to the aſſault, the which continued for the ſpace of ſix houres, and yet could not boord them. Muſtapha ſeeing fiue of his gallies ſunke by the enemies cannon, with the loſſe of all the men that were within them; but ſuddenly the wind changed, and proued fauorable to the Florentines, who embraced this aduantage, giuing chaſe to the Turks gallies, forcing them to ſeeke their ſafetie in the hauen of Famaguſta, the chiefe fort of Cyprus; ſo of aſſailants (being beaten) they became run-awaies: ſo inconſtant are the accidents of war; and eſpecially at ſea, whereas the good or bad ſucceſſe many times L dependeth of a little winde.

The Turks put to flight.

This Turkiſh fleet, hauing loſt fiue gallies, and recouered a port in Cyprus, the Admirall Beauregard ſeeing his deſigne againſt the Carauan diſappointed, he reſolued to return towards Ligorne with his gallions: being at ſea, he encountred a Turkiſh veſſell called a Caramouſall, which came from Rhodes, to go vnto Cyprus: they chaſed it, & in the end ouertook it; which they preſt ſo with their ordnance, as they ſlew 130 Turkes, and tooke 300 ſlaues. The bootie was verie rich, being valued at 140000 crownes. After this prize, their victuals beginning to faile, hauing beene ſo long at ſea, they bent their courſe for Ligorne: but the winde falling contrary, they were forced to ſtay eight dayes in the Iſland of Scarpante, paſt the bar of Meſſina, and hauing giuen chaſe to certaine gallies of Tunes, they arriued at Ligorne the fifteenth M of Iune, where there was great ioy for their returne, and the prize which they had brought, the which according to the cuſtome was to be diuided; one third to the ſouldiers and mariners, and the other two parts imploied for the entertainment of the ſhips, and the paiment of the captaines.

The Florentines take a rich ſhip of the Turkes.

This Carauan which goes from Ægypt to Conſtantinople, is euerie yeare attended for, not onely by the gallions and gallies of Florence, but by thoſe of Malta and Naples, and by all the Pyrats of the Mediterranean ſea: like vnto the Engliſh and Hollanders, who yearely lay in wait for the Indian fleet before the concluſion of the peace and truce with the Spaniard. And although their principal deſigne was to take ſome part of the Carauan, yet they had other enterpriſes vpon the Turkes Countrey, beſides the ſpoile of merchants which they met by chance, which many times payed the charge of their voyage; and ſometimes, they that thought to take, were taken, and loſt both their ſhips and liues.

The exploits of the Galleyes of Malta and Naples.

The gallies of Malta, commanded by the Bailife of Venouge, and thoſe of Naples by the Marquis of S. Croix, joyned together ſoone after, with a deſigne to ſet vpon the Carauan which carried the reuenue and tribute of Ægypt to Conſtantinople, or els to put in execution the enterpriſe which they had long before projected, vpon certaine places of Albania, or to ſurpriſe or ſpoile ſome Iſland in the Archipelague which might pay their charges. But the firſt failing, they met with a Venetian ſhip laden with merchandiſe, to the value of 100000 crownes. The Spaniards who commanded in the gallies of Naples ſeiſed vpon this ſhip, but the General of Malta would by no meanes conſent vnto it, nor ſuffer any of the merchandiſe to be put into his gallies, for that he would not vniuſtly violate the friendſhip which was betwixt his Order and the State of Venice. This example did touch the Spaniards conſciences, ſo as within few dayes they ſent away the Venetian ſhip, but in curteſie they had vnloden all the merchandiſe.

A Venetian ſhip taken.

The Chriſtians Galleyes go to the Iſland of Lango.

After this prey of a Chriſtian ſhip, the fleet diſcouered two ſailes at ſea, ſending preſently after them, they were two Barks, the one comming from Candie loaden with wood, and the other from Scarpante charged with wine, the which being brought vnto the Generals, gaue them to vnderſtand, that the Carauan of Ægypt was not yet paſt, being aduertiſed that fiftie Chriſtians gallies attended them in their paſſage. Vpon this aduice, the Chriſtian Generals being out of hope to ſurpriſe the Carauan, preſently reſolued to vndertake a more great and glorious enterpriſe, and to ſurpriſe the Iſland and caſtle of Lango in the Archipelague, vpon the coaſt of Natolia; and about ſeuen of the clocke at night they ſet ſaile with a good winde, but being changed in the morning, they were forced te returne to the Iſland of Porcherne: from whence they parted againe at eight of the clocke at night, and continuing their courſe, in the morning they diſcouered three Florentine ſhips, who told them, that they had entred into the Iſle of Nigropont with ſeuen gallies; but hauing been diſcouered, they could not effect any thing; and that their gallies were ſeparated from them in the chace of foure galliots. The Chriſtian fleet continuing their courſe, they arriued about eleuen of the clocke in the morning at S. Iean de Seruaë, where hauing caſt anchor, there was a Councel called in the Admiral: where they reſolued to petard the caſtle of Lango, toward the ſea: for the execution whereof they ſhould land 200 men; viz. thirtie Knights and fiftie ſouldiers out of the gallies of Malta, and 120 Spaniards out of the gallies of Naples; and that they ſhould carrie two petards with them, the one giuen in charge to Captain Beaulaigue in the troupe of them of Malta, and the other was conducted by the Spaniards; the reſt of their men which they ſhould land, ſhould go and aſſault the towne of Lango. With this reſolution they parted from S. Iean de Seruaë, with a good winde, and arriued at the Iſland of Lango on the ſixt of Iune, an houre after midnight, whereas they landed three miles from the towne: they that were appointed for the enterpriſe, marcht on with their petards, according to direction; but the night being very darke, the troupe of Malta ſtrayed from their guide, but their valour brought them directly to the walls of the Towne; where after many turnings and windings to finde a fit place to plant the Petard, (notwithſtanding that they were diſcouered and much ſhot at) Beaulaigue ſet it to a Port next the ſea, well flanckt with the Caſtle, the which he forced, and his men entering with furie, went from ſtreet to ſtreet, and put all to the ſword that made reſiſtance. The Spaniards on the other ſide made another breach with their Petarde, and entered the Towne; notwithſtanding that at their firſt approach, the Turkes (hauing diſcouered them) played vpon them with their great ordnance and ſmall ſhot. The Troupes being joyned together, hauing cut all the Turkes in pieces they met with, they came to the place before the Caſtle, which they thought to ſurpriſe: but the bridge was drawne, and they lay open at the mercie of their ſhot, ſo as there were fifteene Knights of Malta hurt, one ſlaine, with a Spaniſh captaine, and ſome ſix and thirtie ſouldiers of the gallies of Naples, and as many wounded. Day being come, the Bailiſe of Venouge General of the gallies of Malta, came vnto the towne with the foreward, wherein were 150 Knights, and 450 ſouldiers: the Marquis of S. Croix followed him with the two ſonnes of the Viceroy of Naples, and 1500 Spaniards, who ſpoiled the towne and ſuburbs, and tooke all that were liuing captiue: but the Caſtle being well fortified, they found it impoſſible to force; whereupon embarking their men and ſpoile, they reſolued in their return to Malta and Naples, to make an enterpriſe vpon ſome towns of Albania: but vpon the way they were aduertiſed, That the Turks had diſcouered the intelligence which the Spaniards & knights of Malta had with the Grecians of the country; wherupon they tooke reuenge vpon them, putting many of them to death, and amongſt others a Patriarch, who being accuſed to haue practiſed the Chriſtians reuolt againſt the Turks, was cruelly fleied aliue, and his skin ſent to Conſtantinople. So dangerous a thing it is to ſeeke for liberty with this Mahometane nation.

The Baſſa's recompence that brought it.

The Carauan of Ægypt was ſtill in the port of Alexandria attending a paſſage, and to be freed from ſo many Chriſtian gallies which lay in weight for it; and it ſtayed the longer by reaſon of the great plague, wherwith Conſtantinople was afflicted. But in the end of October, Mechmet Baſſa of Caire (who would conduct it in perſon) hauing a conuoy of fiftie gallies wel armed, put to ſea, and arriued at Conſtantinople without any encounter. At his landing, this Baſſa cauſed to march before him 60 mules, euerie one laden with 20000 Sequins in kind, being a whole yeares tribute of the kingdome of Ægypt, the which he cauſed to be carried to the Sultans Serail. This money was welcome to the Port: for the former wars both in Hungarie, Tranſyluania, in Aſia againſt the Rebels, and in Perſia, had ſo waſted the Emperors treaſure, as it would hardly entertaine one of his armies. The Baſſa who had gathered this tribute together faithfully and with great diligence, was at his comming to the Sultans Port honored with the charge of Baſſa of the ſea, (he who had it before, being aduanced to the dignitie of Viſier) and moreouer the Sultan promiſed him his daughter in marriage, being but three yeres old.

Newes came to the Port, that certaine ſhips, gallies, and galliaſſes of the Chriſtians, to the number of fiftie, came neere vnto the Helleſpont; which put the Turkes in great feare: and complaints being brought vnto the Grand Seignior, That certain Caramouſals had been taken by the Chriſtian gallies; he ſent preſently for the Captain Baſſa or Admiral of the ſea, demanding of him, Whether the report of theſe loſſes were true or no? To whom he anſwered yes. Why are not you then at ſea, ſaith he? He anſwered, For that I can get neither men nor money. Whereupon the Deftardar or Treaſurer was ſent for, who had loſt his head, had not the Aga of the Grand Seigniors women entreated for him.

Graſſehoppers at Conſtantinople ſpoyle the Countrie.

Violent raine in the Citie.

This Summer Conſtantinople and the Countrey thereabouts was ſo plagued with ſuch clouds of graſſehoppers, as they did ſhadow the verie Sunne beames, and fell vpon the Citie and countrey round about. The Turkes conſulted with their Wiſemen, what it might portend: Who anſwered, That they did foreſhew great plentie to follow. But indeed they left not a greene hearbe nor a leafe in all the Countrey adjoyning, nor in the citie, where they entered into their verie chambers, and annoyed them much, being almoſt as bigge as dormice, with red wings. And ſoone after there fell ſuch extraordinarie great haile in Conſtantinople and Gallata, with ſuch aboundance of raine, as the violence of the water did ſuddenly ſhut vp one of the gates of the citie, and ſo rebounding filled their ſhops and houſes, that verie manie were in great danger of drowning. Some houſes fell downe, and ſome people were ſlaine; the pauements of the ſtreets were torne vp, and the ſtones carried together into great heapes.

We haue formerly made relation of the Perſians victories, and of the defeat and death of Cicala General of the Turkes armie, in the yeare 1605. And that the yeare following, the Sophy hauing recouered whatſoeuer the Turkes had taken from his Predeceſſors, had extended the bounds of his Empire vnto the blacke ſea, from whence he ſent an Embaſſadour vnto the Grand Seignior, to let him vnderſtand, that hauing recouered what had beene vnjuſtly vſurped from him, he would proceed no further, but deſired to liue in peace; the which might now be the better aſſured, the one holding nothing from the other. Moreouer, this Perſian Embaſſadour hauing remained ſeuen moneths at the Sultans Port, was in the end forced to retire into Perſia without audience. And laſtly, That Amurath Serder the Grand Viſier, was afterwards forced to conuert his armes againſt Gambolat and the Rebels of Aſia, and to neglect the war of Perſia.

A Perſian Embaſſador comes to Cōſtantinople

Notwithſtanding the Perſian war, there arriued this yeare at Conſtantinople an Embaſſadour from Perſia, who according to the Turkes manner, was attended on by a great troupe of Chaoux on horſebacke, Capigi's, Ianizaries, and other Captaines, ſent by the Sultan to conduct him to his lodging. Within few dayes after his arriuall, there was a great ſhow made in Conſtantinople, by the ſeuerall trades of the citie, euerie one marching by themſelues before the Grand Seigniors Serrail, and repreſenting vnto him their manner of marching in the wars, and the order of their prouiſion; ſome carrying on their ſhoulders ſheepe, others lambs, calues, beefe, &c. All which was done of policie to daunt and diſhearten the Perſian Embaſſador, and to encourage their owne people; and withall to let him know, that there ſhould be as great plentie in their campes, as he ſaw at that preſent. And to abuſe him ſtill with the imagination of their great preparation, the Chimacham or Viſiers Lieutenant, ſent the next day for this Perſian Embaſſador, and during their conference had taken order, That the Emperor of Tartaria's brother (who was then in the Sultans court) ſhould come in: at whoſe entrance the Chimacham aroſe from his place; Oh (ſaith he) I know for what you come, It is for money for your ſouldiers: you ſhall receiue it at ſuch a place. Which words were heard by a Dragoman to the Engliſh Embaſſador, being then preſent: the which was done to terrifie the Perſian Embaſſador: and at the ſame time and to the ſame end they ſent ouer diuers troupes of ſouldiers to Scudaret, as if they had been ready to march with an armie.

The Turkes army againſt the Perſian.

The Turks great armies are not raiſed in haſte, neither doe they march in poſt: when as the Spahi's, that is to ſay the horſemen, which make the greateſt part of his armie, and haue no other pay or entertainment than the reuenues of certain land, are diſcharged, they muſt haue a whole yeare to recouer their reuenue, and to put themſelues in equipage; and moreouer, it is threeſcore dayes march for an armie, from Conſtantinople into Perſia.

The death of Amurath Serder.

Alſo in the yeare 1609 and 1610, the Turke had not attempted any thing againſt the Perſian, who ſtill ſolicited him for peace. The greatneſſe of the Othoman Empire could not reſolue to make a peace, hauing receiued ſo great defeats; they would giue it but as victors, not as vanquiſhed. But this yere Achmat reſolued to ſend a puiſſant armie of aboue 150000 men, againſt this antient enemie of his houſe, vnder the command of Amurath Serder his Grand Viſier: But before the armie entered into Perſia, it was without a commander, by the death of Serder, in the end of Iuly; ſo as they were forced to ſtay and attend the Sultans pleaſure from Conſtantinople.

It was ſuſpected that hee had beene poyſoned by Naſſuf Baſſa, one that ſtood out in rebellion againſt the Graund Seigniour, and yet hee had many friendes in the Turkes armie: Wherefore to preuent all mutinies, and conſequently, the ouerthrowe of the whole armie, Amurath Baſſa in his ſickeneſſe aduiſed the Graund Seigniour (by letters which hee ſent vnto him) to make Naſſuf Generall of the whole armie, and ſo by faire meanes to drawe him home, and then to diſpoſe of him at his pleaſure. The Sultan with his Baſſaes approoued well of this aduice, and choſe him Graund Viſier, and Generall of the armie; who hauing receiued the Seale and Authoritie, did forthwith put many of Amurath his friends to death, and with their money payed all the ſouldiers, which had wanted pay, whereof ſome had beene without fiue yeares before: hee alſo ſent vnto the Graund Seigniour threeſcore and ten Mules loaden with money of Amuraths treaſure, and threeſcore with goods; all which the Sultan gaue to Amurath his wife and children.

Seueritie of the Sultan.

It is ſtrange to read, how the Grand Seigniour doth tyranniſe ouer his ſubiects, and how ſeuerely he doth puniſh the leaſt omiſſion in any of his officers: for I find it obſerued, that the ſeuenth of Ianuary in the end of this yere 1611, the grand Seignior being abroad in the ſnow, and not well prouided for of fuell, he cauſed Stambol Aga who had that charge to be ſtript naked, and ſet in the ſnow foure or fiue houres. Indeed this Winter was very rigorous, and there fell aboundance of ſnow throughout all Turkie, with great ſtormes, manie houſes were beaten downe; and amongſt other the French Conſull at Aleppo was ſlaine with the fall of his owne houſe.

captaine, and ſome ſix and thirtie ſouldiers of the gallies of Naples, and as many wounded. G Day being come, the Bailiſe of Venouge General of the gallies of Malta, came vnto the towne with the foreward, wherein were 150 Knights, and 450 ſouldiers: the Marquis of S. Croix followed him with the two ſonnes of the Viceroy of Naples, and 1500 Spaniards, who ſpoiled the towne and ſuburbs, and tooke all that were liuing captiue: but the Caſtle being well fortified, they found it impoſſible to force; whereupon embarking their men and ſpoile, they reſolued in their return to Malta and Naples, to make an enterpriſe vpon ſome towns of Albania: but vpon the way they were aduertiſed, That the Turks had diſcouered the intelligence which the Spaniards & knights of Malta had with the Grecians of the country; whereupon they tooke reuenge vpon them, putting many of them to death, and amongſt others a Patriarch, who being accuſed to haue practiſed the Chriſtians reuolt againſt the Turks, was cruelly fleied aliue, and his skin ſent to Conſtantinople. So dangerous a thing it is to ſeeke for liberty with H this Mahometane nation.

The Carauan of Ægypt was ſtill in the port of Alexandria attending a paſſage, and to be freed from ſo many Chriſtian gallies which lay in weight for it; and it ſtayed the longer by reaſon of the great plague, wherwith Conſtantinople was afflicted. But in the end of October, Mechmet Baſſa of Caire (who would conduct it in perſon) hauing a conuoy of fiftie gallies wel armed, put to ſea, and arriued at Conſtantinople without any encounter. At his landing, this Baſſa cauſed to march before him 60 mules, euerie one laden with 20000 Sequins in kind, being a whole yeares tribute of the kingdome of Ægypt, the which he cauſed to be carried to the Sultans Serail. This money was welcome to the Port: for the former wars both in Hungarie, Tranſyluania, in Aſia againſt the Rebels, and in Perſia, had ſo waſted the Emperors trea- I ſure, as it would hardly entertaine one of his armies. The Baſſa who had gathered this tribute together faithfully and with great diligence, was at his comming to the Sultans Port honored with the charge of Baſſa of the ſea, (he who had it before, being aduanced to the dignitie of Viſier) and moreouer the Sultan promiſed him his daughter in marriage, being but three yeres old.

The Baſſa's recompence that brought it.

Newes came to the Port, that certaine ſhips, gallies, and galliaſſes of the Chriſtians, to the number of fiftie, came neere vnto the Helleſpont; which put the Turkes in great feare: and complaints being brought vnto the Grand Seignior, That certain Caramouſals had been taken by the Chriſtian gallies; he ſent preſently for the Captain Baſſa or Admiral of the ſea, demanding of him, K Whether the report of theſe loſſes were true or no? To whom he anſwered yes. Why are not you then at ſea, ſaith he? He anſwered, For that I can get neither men nor money. Whereupon the Deſtardar or Treaſurer was ſent for, who had loſt his head, had not the Aga of the Grand Seigniors women entreated for him.

The Perſian offers conditions of Peace, and a tribute.

Naſſuf parted from Aſia, and marched with his armie vnto the frontiers of Perſia, where he committed ſuch ſpoiles, as the Sophie was conſtrained to draw all his forces together, to preuent the ruine of his countrey, beeing then about the midſt of Auguſt. But when they were come to a battell, the Perſian finding the partie vnequall for him, and dangerous, offered conditions of peace, and promiſed to giue the Turke a quantitie of ſilke which ſhould make the charge of 200 cammels, for a yearely tribute, in acknowledgement of ſome countries which he had conquered from the Othomans. Theſe offers were accepted at Conſtantinople, but there was added, that the Perſians ſonne ſhould bee called Baſſa of Tauris, and that the magiſtrat and Iudge of that citie, called the Cady, ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. We ſhall ſee in the following yeare the effects of theſe propoſitions, by the Embaſſadour of Perſia, whome Naſſuf ſhall bring to Conſtantinople; in the meane time let vs returne to the Mediterranean ſea, to take a ſuruey of the valiant exploits of the Knights of Malta againſt the Turkes.

The falſhood of a Turke puniſhed by the Iuſtice of God.

On the 26 of Aprill, a Turke hauing lent a good ſum of money to a Chriſtian, to be paid at a certaine day; he came before the appointed day with another Turke, and willed the Chriſtian to pay the mony to that other Turke when the day came; which the Chriſtian promiſed to do, and performed it accordingly: but the Turke denied the receit thereof: whereupon he to whom the mony was properly due, came and demanded it: to whom the Chriſtian anſwered, that hee had paied it to that partie to whom he had aſſigned it: whereunto the Turke replied, that if it were ſo, he was ſatisfied: but yet the other Turke denied it: wherupon the matter was brought before the Iudge, and the Turke who had receiued the money, taking an oath to the contrary; the Chriſtian according to the Turkiſh iuſtice, was enforced to pay the mony again: the which he did, but withall he praied God to ſhew ſome publique ſigne which of them had done the wrong. And thereupon the Turke going forth to repaire home to his houſe, fell downe dead in the ſtreet.

The Great Maſter Vignancourt continuing his generous deſignes to ruine the Turke, had an enterpriſe againſt Nauarrin, a place importing this common enemy of Chriſtians: for the execution whereof, he ſent the fiue gallies of his Order, vnder the charge of Vaqueras, great commander of the order, and chiefe of the nation of Prouence. They came within ſome miles of the ſhore, but found their landing very difficult, for that they had bin diſcouered by one of the caſtles of Nauarrin, which had giuen the alarme vnto the whole countrey, ſo as they were forced to paſſe on to ſome more eaſie conqueſt, to the end their voyage might not proue vnprofitable: wherefore they ſailed into the Archipelague, and came neere to the coaſt of Morea, ten leagues from Corinth, where in the night they landed 800 men vnder the conduct of the commander of Cremeaux, generall at land; this troupe marched towards Corinth, and an houre before day were at the town gates to force them. Some Turks tooke armes, but their weake reſiſtance could not ſtay the knights from entring with their troupes; they ſackt the towne, and hauing taken what ſpoile was portable, they carried away with them 500 ſlaues. After this triumph, the Chriſtians made a happie retreat, & in good order, notwithſtanding all the attempts of the Turks horſe and foot, who were drawne together in great numbers, making 10000 ſoldiers, for the country is very populous; in view of whom they imbarked their ſpoile and ſlaues. Hereby it appeares, that this was one of the moſt deſperat enterpriſes that hath been of long time ſeene. For to attempt a place ſo far from their retreat, in ſo populous a countrey, which vpon the leſt alarme, may draw together ten or twelue thouſand Turkes, and to make their retreat with ſo ſmall a number, againſt ſuch great troupes which purſued them: doubtleſſe we muſt confeſſe, that as they ſhewed great valor, and had good fortune, ſo they vndertooke a very dangerous enterpriſe. Thus the knights of Malta vanquiſhed, whom we might terme the maſters of the Mediterranean ſea, if the reuenues of their Order would ſuffer them to ſet forth ſhipping and forces equall to their valour.

But to follow the variable courſe of the Hiſtorie, let vs obſerue the different occupations of Chriſtians. At Prague the Germanes entertained themſelues, with the conſideration of a Crowne which appeared in the Firmament, ouer that Citie about the middeſt of October, giuing a verie great light, and about it armies of men fighting who ſhould haue it. At that time the Emperour Rodulphus was vpon the Weſt, or declining of his dayes, and Matthias who ſucceeded him in the Empire, then King of Hungarie, was vp-

A on the ſunne-riſing of his triumphes. Many expounded this heauenly apparition, as a preſage of happineſſe and good fortune to Matthias: hee enioyed the Crowne of Hungarie alreadie, and by deſignation that of Bohemia, and now they did prognoſticate vnto him that of the Romanes. Doubtleſſe men which aſpire after great fortunes, doe rather adorne the Sunriſing, than the ſetting; and mans life when it declines, taſtes of the lees. The flouriſhing glorie of Matthias, his age, and his actions in the warres, did adde nothing to the authoritie of other men in the countrie, but did mightily ſettle his owne. Three Sunnes which were ſeene in the firmament ouer Vienna, the chiefe citie of Auſtria, confirmed the Germanes more in this their hope, that he ſhould haue the third crowne of the Romans. This laſt apparition happened the yeare following.

B About the end of the yeare, ſome of the Engliſh Embaſſadors men entering into quarrell with certaine Iamoglans of the next Serail: from words they fel to blowes; during which tumult one of the Embaſſadors men threw a ſtone, and ſmote a Iamoglan on the forehead, whereof he died within few houres after. The Aga of the ſeraill complained hereof to the grand Viſier, who preſently ſent the Subbaſſa of Galata, to make inquirie of the fact: the Embaſſadour went himſelfe to the Seraill, and ſent for his men which had been in the quarrell, willing the Turks to deſigne the partie which had thrown the ſtone: who all with one ſhout ran vpon one Simon Dibbins, a man that was newly come from Candie, where hee had ſerued in the Venetian garriſons, and was now entertained into the Embaſſadors ſeruice. This Simon was not hee that threw the ſtone: notwithſtanding the Turkes would none but him; on him they laied C hands, and dragged him away. The Embaſſador interpoſing himſelfe, and offring to pledge for him, was thruſt away by them, his men beaten, and one of his pages wounded: whereupon he complained to the grand Viſier, but preuailed little; for to priſon they dragged this Simon, and there kept him a whole month; neither could he be releaſed, albeit the Engliſh nation offered great ſums to ranſome his life: for the Turks would needs haue bloud for bloud. The day of execution being appointed, the Embaſſador ſent his chaplaine to the priſon where this Simon was, to prepare him for death: vnto whom (examining him how he had formerly liued) hee confeſſed, that in England ſome few yeres before he had killed a man, for which fact he fled thence into Candie: from whence he came to Conſtantinople, where he was to ſuffer for that which he did not: the juſt judgement of God purſuing him to the ſhedding of his bloud in D Conſtantinople among Turkes vndeſeruedly, for the bloud which hee ſhed in England wilfully. He was hanged at the Embaſſadors gates, his head and heeles the next night were ſtollen away by the Turks, as it was thought, to vſe in ſome kind of Sorcerie; the other parts of his bodie they had leaue to take downe and burie.

This yeare 1612 they did celebrate at Conſtantinople a double nuptiall feaſt; for the marriages of Baſſa Mehemet ſonne to the deceaſed Cicala, with the Sultans ſiſter; and of Baſſa Mechmet, Admirall at ſea, hee whom we haue ſeene lately returne from Ægypt, and bring to Conſtantinople the reuenues of that rich kingdome, with the eldeſt daughter of his Emperour. For the feaſts of yong Cicala, the Spahi made courſes on horſebacke with battleaxes and barres, in the open place neere vnto the Seraill, where they made diuers fire-workes of verie great E charge, but of ſmall inuention; and they gaue Preſents to aboue 20000 perſons, beſides the charge of the banqueting ſtuffe which amounted to aboue 20000 crownes. The pompe was double; for the Sultans women did celebrat that day with the greateſt ladies of the Port, and the men ſeparated in other places did ſolemniſe it in like manner. But the magnificence of the marriage of the Baſſa Admirall at ſea with Achmats eldeſt daughter, had far more luſtre at the Port. The ceremony was performed on the 30 of Iune, 20 daies after the other; and the order of this pompe, as well as ſome other which we haue deſcribed in this Hiſtorie, requires a particular relation.

The ceremonies at the daughters marriage.

The day before the conſummation of the marriage, they ſent the brides moueables and jewels, from the Seraill to the bridegroomes lodging, with this order and ſtate that followeth: F Firſt there marched 500 Ianizaries on foot, being followed with the grand Prouoſt of Conſtantinople, and the generall Surueiour, both on horſebacke and attired in cloth of gold: the Aga or Colonell of the Ianizaries verie proudly adorned, and enuironed with ſome Ianizaries, marched alone on horſebacke: after theſe, two hundred men of qualitie well mounted, and richly attired, followed with a ſlow pace. monie,where the Taliſmans,Centons,Emirs,,and other Miniſters of Mahomets Clergie. And G preſently followed after the Baſſa Achmat, Deſtarda, or high Treaſurer, who conducted the moueables,as choſen by the Sultan to be Godfather or Sagois to the bride, being enuironed with twelue footmen attired in long robes of gold. After him followed the moueables, apparell,and jewels,which made the brides truſſe, hauing in the head excellent muſicke after the Turkiſh manner, of Hoboyes and Kettledrums on horſebacke, wherein the brides moueables conſiſted.

Theſe moueables,or this truſſe,conſiſted of 27 Preſents.The firſt was a little hat all of gold, couered with precious ſtones, and with pantofles or womens ſhoes after the Turkiſh faſhion of pure gold,enricht with Turquoiſes, and rubies: A booke of Mahomets Law, the couering whereof was of Maſſie gold all ſet with diamonds,many bracelets,and other rare deuiſes for women,of pure gold,with many precious ſtones:a little coffer a cubit long,and halfe as broad, H all of chriſtall of the rocke,hauing the corners of gold, in the which were to be ſeene great diamonds and huge pearles, to the value of 80000 pounds ſterling: After this precious coffer, were carried many ſmockes embroidered with gold and pearle,and head-bands for the forehead,with many robes of cloath of gold. All this was diſtributed into 27 Preſents as we haue ſaid, and carried with great pompe by 27 men on foot.

The brides ſlaues.

After theſe Preſents followed 11 caroches full of yong maidens,ſlaues to ſerue the bride: theſe caroches were couered and ſhut, and either of them attended by two eunuchs Moores; after theſe followed 28 virgins ſlaues, attired in cloth of gold,and accompanied by 28 blacke eunuches all on horſebacke,and richly clad. After which were ſeene 240 mules,loaden, with tents of tapeſtrie,cloath of gold, ſattin, veluet, with the ground of gold, with many cuſhions, I which are the chaires the ladies of Turkie vſe; with many other rich and ſumptuous mooueables.Such was the Truſſe which this yong Princeſſe brought to her ſpouſes houſe.Doubtleſſe this equipage was ſtately, and did well become the pompe and greatneſſe of the Othomans houſe, from whence ſhee had iſſued, the mightieſt and richeſt of all the royall houſes in Europe,yea I dare boldly ſay of all the World.

Emirs & their priuiledges.

The marriage day being come,the bride was conducted to her husbands lodging with no leſſe pompe and State than her moueables. The Ianizaries marched firſt as they had formerly done,being followed by the grand Prouoſt,the Surueior their Aga,and many other officers of the Port. The Emirs (who are deſcended from Mahomet,and alone carrie greene turbants) marched after to the number of 80:this name of Emir is as much to ſay as lord. They which K weare them anſwer not,and obey none but their chiefe, called Mirabachi,and their voice in judgement ſtands for two: they were followed by the Taliſmans or Prieſts of Mahomets law, and by a great number which ſtudie it, and which aſpire to the offices of Cadi's or Iudges, of Cadileſquiers or Mufti. The Viſiers or ſupreme Iudges of the Turks eſtate, who judge of all affaires in counſell,came after with the grand Viſier,who is Lieutenant Generall to the Turkiſh Emperor throughout his whole Empire,and keeps the ſeales of his Empire.He had on his left hand (which is the moſt honourable ranke in Turkie) the grand Mufti, or ſupreme Biſhop of their Law. The muſicke followed after on horſebacke conſiſting of thirtie men with drums and Hoboies, beeing followed by eight Ægyptians, which carried Biſcaine tabors,and did a thouſand apiſh trickes. Theſe were followed by 40 muſitians,marching two and two, ſome L playing of citerns, others of harps,and ſome of lutes after the Turkiſh manner. A foole (held for a Saint amongſt them) being mufled with a cap and a cloke couered with mutton bones, danced and ſung with theſe inſtruments: 50 of the chiefe officers of the Arſenall marcht after them,and 30 men with hammers & other iron inſtruments,to breake down whatſoeuer aduanced too far in the ſtreets,and might hinder the free paſſage of 2 trees of an immenſe height, laden with diuers ſorts of fruits all of wax,carried by many men,& ſupported from the top and the midſt with ropes. After theſe trees came 20 officers belonging to Achmat Baſſa the high Treaſurer,Godfather to the bride. And he himſelf alone richly attired, & proudly mounted: after whom came 2 great torches light,caried by many ſlaues, & then a third torch of a wonderfull bigneſſe,all couered with plats of gold,& ſhining more with precious ſtones than the M flame which burnt.The Raiſſer Aga with 50 of the princeſſes officers,followed theſe lights,& after them was carried a great canopie of crimſon veluet, and after it another greater,couered with plates of gold,whoſe curtaines being ſhut on all ſides, hung downe to the ground. Vnder this canopie was the princes on horſebacke,with ſome of her black eunuches,her caroch followed couered with cloth of gold, and drawne by foure great white horſes, wonderfull beautiful. Then followed eight other caroches, in which were a great number of the brides maids, with many Negroes gelt; and finally, 25 virgin ſlaues, choſen amongſt the faireſt, all on horſbacke, hauing their haire confuſedly hanging vpon their ſhoulders. Such was the pompe of this marriage: but many times the nuptiall feaſt is intermixt with funerall mourning. For not many daies after, the Sultans ſecond daughter, promiſed to Naſſuf Baſſa, was carried to her graue without any pompe or honour: for the Turks make no great eſteeme of women.

The death of the Sultans daughter.

The day after the marriage, the Grand Seignior did cruelly beat his Sultana, the mother of this daughter, whom he had married to the Captaine Baſſa; he ſtabbed her with his handjarre or dagger thorow the cheeke, and trod her vnder his feet. The reaſon was, becauſe ſhee had ſtrangled a fauorit of his, which was one of his ſiſters ſlaues, whom the grand Seignior hauing ſeene, and being enamoured with her, ſent for her. The Sultana hearing thereof, cauſed her to bee brought to her lodging, where ſhee ſtript her of her apparell, ſtrangled her, and put her clothes vpon one of her owne ſlaues, whom ſhe ſent to the Sultan inſtead of the other, and at her returne ſtrangled her alſo; as ſhe had done many others when they once appeared to bee with childe by the Grand Seignior.

The grand Seignior beats his Sultana.

The plague beginning furiouſly to ſpoile the city of Conſtantinople, the Sultan was forced to returne to his countrey pallace, called the Serail of Darut Baſſa, to auoid the danger of this violent contagion: the which makes mee thinke, that the Turkiſh Emperours for their owne profit diſpenſe with ſome articles of their faith; for as we haue ſaid before, The Turkes are ſo obſtinatly tied to the beleefe of Predeſtination, as they will not vouchſafe to turne from a peſtiferous bodie, when it is carried to the graue, and much leſſe forbeare to viſit his friends being ſicke of the plague, for that (ſay they) if we muſt needs die of this contagion, it is in vaine to flie it, for it will find vs whereſoeuer; if not, our health ſhall neuer be empaired, although wee conuerſe with thoſe that are ſicke of this diſeaſe. But their Sultans know well how to flie the danger; yea and to cauſe them to be led vnder the arms that come to kiſſe his hand, leſt they ſhould offer him ſome violence. Thus we ſee the defect of falſe religions, when as we ſee this marke of vniuerſalitie in the faith taken away; for there euery man beleeues according to his priuat intereſt, as well as among many others which haue ſeparated themſelues from the truth, to canton themſelues in their errors, where we doe often trie the diuerſitie of their beliefe.

A great plague at Conſtantinople.

Sultan Achmat being in his palace of Darut Baſſa, and going to viſit a ſtately Moſque which he cauſed to be built there, a Deruis or religious Turke thruſt on by ſome deuilliſh fury, caſt a great ſtone at him to beat him downe; but the blow of this deteſtable traitor, fell vpon his ſhoulder, and hurt him but lightly. Achmat commanded they ſhould draw from this wretch the confeſſion of his confederats: but the officers of the port cauſed him to be executed the next day, ſomewhat too ſuddenly, and by a death too honourable, for a crime ſo ful of abomination, for they cauſed his head to be cut off. A Deruis of the ſame order had in former times ſought to murther the Emperor Mahomet the ſecond.

A Deruis ſeeketh to kill the Emperour.

On the 14 of April, the ladie Anne Gloner, wife to ſir Thomas Glouer, Embaſſador reſiding at Conſtantinople for the Engliſh, was buried with very great ſolemnitie, the like had not beene ſeene in that countrey, ſince the Turks conquered Conſtantinople. There were preſent at this funeral of moſt nations in the world; the ſermon was preached in a large garden vnder a Cypres tree: and although but few of thoſe preſent did vnderſtand it, yet it wrought this effect, that whereas the Ieſuits and Friers had formerly poſſeſt both Turks, Iewes, and other people, that the Engliſh nation ſince the change of their Religion, had neither churches, nor any forme of diuine ſeruice; hereby they perceiued, that they had both, and ſerued God far more decently and deuoutly than they themſelues; inſomuch that the Ieſuits being aſhamed of their impoſtures, and ſlanderous vntruth, durſt not for a while after walke the ſtreets; for feare of the Turks, who threatned them for ſo much belying the Engliſh. The Sermon being ended, the bodie was caried from Pera vnto the Engliſh graues, which were almoſt a mile from the place; it was cloſed in lead, and layed in a Caroch couered ouer with blacke veluet, and the horſes with blacke cloth. The Dutch Embaſſador, the Hungarian Agent, the French Colonell, with a great number of all nations both men and women followed her to her graue. The tombe was of faire marble built foure ſquare almoſt the height of a man, hauing an Epitaph engrauen thereon.

The caſtle of Lango taken by the Florentines

Wee haue ſeene the yeare before, the Iſland and towne of Lango ſpoiled by the gallies of G Malta and Naples, but the caſtle was ſaued from ruine, by the reſiſtance it made againſt the Chriſtians attempts: but this yeare in Iune the great Duke of Tuſcans gallies running ouer the Archepelague, aſſailed it ſo furiouſly, as they forced and ſpoiled it, carrying away twelue hundred priſoners. Mechmet Baſſa Admirall at ſea, whom we ſaw euen now buſied at his nuptiall pompe, with the Emperours eldeſt daughter, beeing aduertiſed of theſe ſpoyles of the Florentines, by the dayly complaints of the Turks which loſt their ſhipping, and of many other enterpriſes attempted vpon his maſters countries lying neere the ſea ſhore; hee departed from Conſtantinople in Auguſt with three and thirtie great gallies, hauing commanded all the Beyes of the Iſlands and townes in the Archipelague, to joyne with him, with as many gallies as they could make, to ſtop the Chriſtians courſes in the Weſt. But whileſt that he is bu- H ſied in thoſe ſeas, the Pirats of Ruſcia deſcending into the Euxine ſea, by the mouthes of thoſe riuers which diſcharge their waters into the ſea, ouerran and ſpoiled the Turks coaſts in thoſe parts.

Courſes of the Ruſſians and Tartars vpon the Turkes.

At the firme land Conſtantine one of the pretending Princes in Moldauia, annoyed all that had any dependance vpon the Turke. A part of that great army of the king of Polands, which had mutined for their pay, ſpoyled Podolia; and a Prince of the Tartarians diſcontent for that Achmat had preferred a couſin of his before him in the inueſtiture of the realme of the Tartars Precopians, with 5000 ſouldiers ſpoiled the riuers of Moldauia vnder the Turks dominion, and he did the like in the gulph of Nicopolis.

Troubles in Moldauia.

This was at ſuch time when as miſerable Moldauia was the theatre whereas the Turks, Tar- I tars, and Moldauians acted a bloudie tragedie, at the coſts and charges of the poore countreymen. For Tomſho hauing been choſen Vayuod or Prince of that Prouince by the Turke, Conſtantine who could not endure that he ſhould raigne, armed the countrey, ouerran it, ſpoiled it, and made hauocke of all, detaining two Capigi priſoners, whom the Sultan had ſent vnto him, with commandement to obey his will, and a prohibition not to trouble Tomſho in the poſſeſſion of his Prouince. But this was a meſſage of hard diſgeſtion to Conſtantine; he could not with patience yeeld to this ceſſion of Moldauia: and inſtead of ſending theſe meſſengers backe to the Turke with an anſwer, hee carried them with him into Polonia, whither he went to demand ſuccors, and cauſed them to be guarded as priſoners. In the meane time by the ſupport and aid of Potoſly Gouernor of Velin his brother in law, he obtained from the king of Poland, K that he ſhould be ſupported againſt Prince Tomſho his competitor, whom the Turke had aduanced; and to make his entrie into Moldauia more eaſie, they reſolued to ſend an Embaſſador vnto Conſtantinople, to entreat Achmat to call backe Tomſho to his Port, that Conſtantine might quietly enjoy Moldauia, and to acquaint him with the right and intereſt the Polonians had by their capitulations with the Turkes, to name a Vayuod or Prince in that Prouince, to the end no wrong might be done vnto them.

A Polonian embaſſador arreſted at Conſtantinople.

This Polonian Embaſſador being arriued at Conſtantinople (thinking to be preſently diſpatched, either by a grant or deniall of his demand, and not to ſtay aboue fifteene or twentie daies) beeing viſited at his arriuall by all the Embaſſadours of Chriſtian Kings and Princes which remained there: but in ſtead of audience, after ſix weekes attendance, hee was arreſted L and detained priſoner: vnderſtanding from the Turkes, that he ſhould haue no libertie vntill that the two Capigi, whome prince Conſtantine carried into Poland were releaſed.

The troubles and diuiſions among Chriſtians, neighbours to the Turke, haue alwaies ſerued as a bridge for this Infidell to inuade them, and by this aduantage to vſurpe ſuch townes and countries as lie fit for him. Now that Valachia, Moldauia, yea and Tranſyluania, are toſt and turmoild with continuall diſorders and combuſtions; the Sultan ſeemes to embrace this occaſion, to make himſelfe Soueraigne of theſe prouinces, and to get poſſeſſion of all that lies betwixt the riuer of Danow, the mountaines of Sarmatia, the riuer of Tibiſcus, and the Euxine ſea. Hee emploies all his thoughts and inuentions vpon this ſubiect, to bring his deſignes to effect. Hee armes and drawes forces about Belgrade, vnder the conduct of Baſſa Ma- M homet Belzergi: Hee commaunds the Tartarians to enter into Moldauia, and hee ſent a nauall armie towards the mouth of the riuer Dannow, which made the frigots of Ruſſia to diſlodge, the which had continually made inrodes and ſpoiles vpon his lands. Battori Prince of Tranſyluania was at that time before the Towne of Cromſtad, which hee had beſieged,

The Turk armes to inuade Moldauia.

Cromſtad beſieged by Battori.

A beſieged, but the tediouſneſſe of this ſiege made him reſolue to ſend an Embaſſador to Conſtantinople, to demand ſuccors from the Grand Seignior, to the end he might be able to continue this ſiege and to take the towne: he gaue this charge to Andrew Giezy, and ſent him to the Sultans Port: but in ſtead of ſeruing his maſter faithfully, he practiſed a deteſtable treaſon againſt him, to put the Turke in full poſſeſſion of Tranſyluania, and to make him abſolute Soueraigne. The practiſe was concluded after this manner, That the Baſſa Mahomet Belzergi ſhould enter the Prouince with his armie, and that Giezy ſhould joyne with him with certaine troupes, and ſhould deliuer vnto him Veradin, Lippa, and ſome other ſtrong and important places; and for recompence he ſhould inueſt him in the Principalitie of Tranſyluania, in the place of Battori, and vnder the authoritie of Achmat.

He demands ſuccours from the Turke, and is betrayed.

B This treaſon might haue drawne this miſerable Prouince into ruine, and it may be the reſt neere adjacent, if it had taken the effect which the trecherie of Giezy had promiſed vnto himſelfe. But the Baſſa of Buda vnderſtanding that Battori had ſome vent of the practiſe at the Port, and that being now in great feare and perturbation, he had raiſed the ſiege from before Cromſtad, and was readie to caſt himſelfe into the armes of the Palatine of Hungarie, and to craue reliefe from him; the craftie Baſſa knowing that this courſe would be preiudiciall for the Sultan, and finding that the depoſing of Battori would be more difficult than they expected, hee diuerted Mahomet Baſſa from attempting any thing againſt Battori or Tranſyluania. This act ſhewes ſufficiently, that Chriſtian Princes which thinke to ſhelter themſelues vnder the ſhadow of the Turkiſh Creſcent, are verie ill aſſured: for hee neuer failes to ſtirre vp enemies C againſt them, to make them ſue for ſuccours, and himſelfe neceſſarie: Then in the end he expels them, and becomes abſolute maſter of their countries. It was alſo ſaid, That the Baſſa Mahomet would not attempt any thing in Tranſyluania, by reaſon of the election of the Emperour Matthias, whereof the Baſſa of Buda was aſſured by the Embaſſadour which the ſaid Emperour ſent to Conſtantinople, to carrie the preſents vnto the Sultan; which Embaſſadour was honourably entertained at Buda by the ſaid Baſſa, and from thence conducted ſafely to Conſtantinople.

But not to keepe theſe Turkiſh troupes idle, Mahomet Baſſa beeing aduertiſed that Conſtantine the pretending prince in Moldauia, had bin in Poland to craue ſome aſſiſtance from thence, he reſolued to employ his forces that way, to diſpoſſeſſe him and to ſettle another.

D But the better to vnderſtand the beginning and ſucceſſe of theſe Moldauian warres, wee muſt make a repitition of that which paſt ſome yeares before. In the yeare 1608, Ieremie Mobyla Prince or Vayuod of Moldauia, died; committing the gouernement to his brother Simion, during the minoritie of his three ſonnes, Conſtantine, Alexander, and Bougdan, the eldeſt beeing but eight yeares old. Hee left three daughters married to three generous Princes of Polonia, Potoſky, Viſinouſky, and Correſky. Prince Simeon continued in the gouernement vntill the yeare 1611; after whoſe deceaſe the young Prince Conſtantine by the perſuaſion of his mother, that he might ſafely take vpon him the gouernment of Moldauia, and not attend any confirmation from the Sultan, for that Prince Simeon who had beene confirmed by the Turke which then raigned, was but Tutor to his Nephew; entered the gouernement. E At this time there remained at Conſtantinople, one Stephano or Tomſho, who had of a long time practiſed the fauour of one of the Viſiers called Mehemet, an Eunuch of Georgia (who was then Chimacham, or Lieutenant to the Grand Viſier) and of ſome other Baſſaes, as well by money as by other practiſes, ſuggeſting falſly that he was ſonne to Prince Aaron, who had been Vayuod of Moldauia before the deceaſed Ieremies and he preuailed ſo by his practiſes and corruption (whereunto the Turkes are more ſubiect than any Nation in the World) as he was admitted to the Principalitie by the Grand Seignior, and hauing giuen him to vnderſtand by the Viſier, that Conſtantine had thruſt himſelfe raſhly into the gouernment, and that hee would not acknowledge him for his Lord and Soueraigne, nor pay the yearely tribute, which was 40000 chequines, hee ſent Fouſſeyen Aga with 20000 Turkes and Tartarians to F ſettle Stephen or Tomſho in Moldauia, and to expell Prince Conſtantine. Which armie marched ſo ſecretly, as they had in a manner ſurpriſed him; yet drawing together a head of 10000 men, hee reſolued to attend the euent. The Aga ſent to accquaint him with his commiſſion, and among other things threatened him, that if he would not ſuffer him to proclaime Stephen Vayuod of Moldauia, and yeeld him the Citie of Yas free, he would cut him in pieces. Where-

Stephen made Vayuod of Moldauia by the Turke.

Conſtantines anſwer to the Turks Aga.

Conſtantine & Potosky taken priſoners.

Stephen proclaimed prince of Moldauia.

Whereunto Conſtantine made anſwer, by the aduice of the Prince Potosky his brother in law, That the Grand Seignior had been abuſed: for if hee had vnderſtood, that his predeceſſor had granted vnto the deceaſed Prince Ieremy his father, and to Prince Simeon his vncle, That he ſhould ſucceed his ſaid father in the gouernment: it was not credible that he would ſeeke to diſpoſſeſſe him by force, without hearing, and inſtall in his place an vnknowne perſon, who had falſely ſuppoſed himſelfe to bee the ſonne of a Prince of Moldauia: neither ſhould they finde, that he had refuſed to acknowledge the Sultan for his Soueraigne Prince, or denied to continue the ſame tribute which his father and vncle had paid: but if the Aga would proceed without any reſpect of his offers, he did hope that the true God of battell would maintain him in his juſt defence, and would not ſuffer an vſurper to preuaile ouer a lawfull Prince. Fouſſeyen Aga, who had no will to capitulat with Prince Conſtantine, being corrupted by Stephen with Preſents and promiſes, aduanced with his army, ſo as the next day they joyned battell; but the Moldauians oppreſt with multitudes of Turks, Tartarians, and Valachians, could not make it good. Wherefore Potosky entreated Prince Conſtantine to ſaue himſelfe, and to ſuffer him to finiſh the battell: but hee could by no meanes perſuade him, ſtill reſoluing to attend the euent. Whereupon they went both againe to the charge with ſuch troupes as they had left, and defeated many of the Turks forces; but being oppreſſed with a new ſupply of 2000 horſe which the Aga ſent by Stephen, they were conſtrained to yeeld themſelues to the mercy of their enemies. Prince Conſtantine fell to the Tartarians ſhare, either for that he had been taken priſoner by ſome of them, or elſe was giuen them by Fouſſeyen Aga, to draw a ranſome from him, and be in ſtead of their pay. But they made no great vſe of him; for as they led him away, paſſing the riuer of Nieſtre, hee leapt into it, thinking either to ſaue himſelfe by ſwimming, or vnwilling to ſuruiue his diſgrace. And as for Prince Potosky, he was carried to Conſtantinople, and was put into the blacke tower, which is a priſon appointed by men of qualitie, where he continued vntill the yeare 1616. The loſſe of this battell by Conſtantine, gaue an eaſie enterance to Stephen into Moldauia, no man daring oppoſe himſelfe againſt the Turks forces: ſo as Fouſſeyen Aga cauſed Stephen to be proclaimed Prince of Moldauia in the citie of Yas, and then diſmiſſed his armie, and returned to Conſtantinople. Such was the fortune of the Prince of Moldauia, ruined by the Turks, and ſuch was the diſorder and confuſion of his miſerable countrey.

Conſtantinople afflicted with graſhoppers.

This Summer Conſtantinople and the countrey round about, was annoyed with aboundance of Graſhoppers, as it had beene in the former yeare: but to free themſelues from this deuouring vermine, about the middeſt of Iuly, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, and Alexandria, with diuers other Biſhops, and Calloires attired in their copes and other ornaments, went forth in ſolemne manner at the gate of Andrianople, being the North gate of the citie. Whereupon (ſaid the Greekes) they all periſhed: and indeed about this time infinit heaps of them were found dead; but not by reaſon of their curſe, for moſt were dead before they curſed them, and were to be ſeene dead vpon euerie buſh and twigge of a tree before their curſe, and many liued after their curſe, and continued vntill the next ſummer. The cold deawes which fell this Summer (beeing extraordinarie) were thought to bee the naturall cauſe thereof; God cauſing thoſe deawes to fall, to free the countrey from theſe deuouring creatures.

Let vs now deſcribe the miſeries of the Tranſyluanian, and of his Prouince, a table ſo often repreſented in this Hiſtorie. Gabriel Battori who gouerned Tranſyluania, as lawfully deſcended from the Soueraigne Princes thereof, hauing made himſelfe a tributarie vnto the Turke, and by his impious actions mingled Mahomets impietie with the Chriſtian Religion; and moreouer, exceeding in his crueltie, became a memorable example to all poſteritie, that Princes which carrie the glorious name of Chriſtians, when they haue once layed aſide all feare of the Soueraigne of Princes, cannot attend, but a miſerable end in their raigne, conformable to the courſe of their enormities. So Gabriel Battori holding it a Law of State, to ſettle his affaires with the ruine of Religion, allyes himſelfe with the Turke, and with him afflicts the Chriſtian Prouinces. But ſeeing many factions made againſt him, as well by the deſcendents of Botſcay, as by Giezi, Bethlem Gabor, and ſome other, hee ſupports himſelfe with the forces of Andrew Nage, the head of the Rebels in high Hungarie, who came vnto him to the ſiege before Cromſtad to aſſiſt him in his affaires. Battori entertained him with all ſhewes of courteſie, inuited him to dinner in his Tent; and for a greater demonſtration of friendſhip, after dinner they two went to take the aire on horſebacke. Nage had drunke after the Hungarian manner; Battori entreated him to runne his horſe a careere, and he refuſed it; the which Battori taking for an offence, ſpake many words of contempt vnto him, and hee anſwered him in the ſame manner, being more inflamed with wine, than gouerned by reaſon. Battori being wonderfully offended, that a man of no ſort, being but a poore ſouldier of fortune, crept vp to ſome authoritie among the ſoldiers but by degrees of rebellion, ſhould giue him ſuch words of indignitie, gaue him three blowes on the head with a battle-axe which hee held in his hand, and ſlew him. Thus Nage ſwims juſtly in his owne bloud, hauing wickedly and to the ruine of his Country, floted in the wayes of inconſtancie, and popular tumults; and ſo he died as he had liued.

Battori kills Nage.

But Battori found himſelfe dayly oppreſt with many affaires, which draue him inſenſibly to his ruine. Peter Decaci Kinſeman to the deceaſed Botſcay annoyed him on the one ſide with troupes of ſouldiers. Andrew Giezi (who had betrayed him in his embaſſie to Conſtantinople) leuied Forces to proſecute him; and Bethlehem Gabor a Nobleman of Tranſyluania, and aſſiſted by the Turke, tooke many places from him, after that Giezi had forced him to raiſe his ſiege at Cromſtad, and generally all Tranſyluania reuolted againſt this Prince. To ſee more plainely in the obſcuritie of theſe confuſed diſorders, you muſt vnderſtand that this Prouince is peopled by three ſeueral Nations, the Sicules, Saxons, and Hungarians. The Sicules (diſcended from the Scythians) came with Attila King of the Hunnes, in Pannonia, now called Hungarie, and taking their way towards their Countrey, they inhabited that part of Tranſyluania which lies next to Moldauia, and diuiding themſelues into ſeuen Coloneys, they built the townes of Kiſdi, Orbai, Scipſi, Cykuduarheh, Aranios, and Maros. The Saxons (mutinying againſt the gouernment of the Emperour Charlemaigne King of France) for certaine impoſitions wherewith hee had charged them) retyred into Tranſyluania, and by force ſeiſed on that part of the countrey which confineth vpon Valachia, where they built the townes of Hermenſtad, (otherwiſe called Cibin) Cromſtad, Nezen (or Biſtric) Meduviſch, Scieſpourg, Clauſenbourg, and Alba-Iulia. The Hungarians inhabited this prouince from the time of Saint Stephen King of Hungarie; and hauing maſtered the other Nations, they obtained ſuch preheminence among them, as ſince their ſucceſſours haue cauſed themſelues to be called Nobles of Tranſyluania, and the Vayuods or Princes of the Countrey haue beene taken from among them. The Townes of Varradin, Deuer, Zilahi, Gela, and ſome others, owe their beginnings vnto them. The greateſt part of theſe three Nations which inhabit Tranſyluania, were reuolted againſt Battori: but particularly the Saxons had taken armes againſt him, his great crueltie hauing forced them to this extreame remedie.

Parties againſt Battori.

Diuiſion of the people of Tranſyluania.

All the three nations againſt Battori.

Battori being thus abandoned by his ſubjects, proſecuted by his Nobilitie, and forſaken of all the world, knowing not whither to flie for ſuccour, and not daring to truſt vnto the Turke, who openly fauoured Gabor; he reſolued to trie if he could by preſents draw the Emperour Matthias to giue him any aſſiſtance. Wherefore he ſent Embaſſadors vnto him, to promiſe all ſubjection and obedience; and he ſent for Preſents, a long robe or ſacerdotal cloake of gold, ſet with Pearle and pretious ſtones, certaine plumes of blacke Herons, adorned with pretious ſtones, a Turkiſh ſword, the ſcabberd being of ſiluer richly ſet with jewels, tenne blacke horſes with rich furniture embroidered with gold and ſiluer, and a Turkiſh horſe, hauing halfe the bodie and legges of the colour of gold, with his furniture of crimſon richly embroidered. He laboured to haue the Emperor giue notice to the Baſſa of Buda, That this attempt of the Turks againſt Tranſyluania, was againſt the Articles of peace: but the Baſſa made anſwer, That his Emperour was not to be blamed if he ſeiſed vpon that prouince, which did immediately belong vnto him, and kept it quiet from the practiſes of others. But Battori relying not wholly vpon this ſupport; but deſiring to haue more ſtrings to his bow, ſent Embaſſadours to the Sultan, with rare and rich Preſents, who had ſecret treaties and Councels with the Baſſa's: the which Negronius the Emperours Embaſſadour reſiding at Conſtantinople diſcouering, he ſent word vnto the Emperour, that he entertained a monſter among men.

Battori ſends an Embaſſador to the Emperor Matthias.

About the ſame time there came Embaſſadours from the Saxon Townes of Tranſyluania, Crueltie of Battori.

vania, complaining much of the crueltie and tyrannie of Battori. The Saxons (ſaid they) liuing many yeares in Tranſyluania, had beautified the Prouinces with townes, villages, and Markets, and had by their vertue obtained many priuiledges from former Emperors: but Battori, againſt his promiſed faith, and the oath which he had taken, had depriued them of their priuiledges, and afflicted them in ſuch ſort, as they were in a manner ruined: that from his firſt enterance he had ſought to root out the antient familie of the Saxons: that he had afflicted them with impriſonments & miſerable ſeruitude, & had detained Iohn Benner 3 yeres in priſon for no other cauſe, but for that he knew he had brought a great eſtate out of Germanie: hee had depriued honeſt widowes of their eſtates, and had oppreſt others with vnjuſt exactions: hee had ſurpriſed Hermſtad the chiefe citie of the Saxons, and ſuffered the Haiducks to ſpoile it, and to commit all ſorts of inſolencies. That he had expelled the Magiſtrate, baniſhed honeſt Citiſens, rauiſhed women, ſlaine the parents, to depriue the children of their inheritance, and committed all the barbarous cruelties that could be deuiſed. That he had ſent three hundred captiues to the Sultan for a Preſent; many he cut into ſmall pieces, ſome he had throwne downe from the tops of mountaines and towers; ſome he had hung vp by the feet, others hee had drawne in pieces with horſes and trees, and to conclude, hee had practiſed all kindes of barbarous cruelties. That hauing expelled Religious Princes out of Moldauia and Valachia, hee had made them ſubject to the Turke, for no other end, but getting an occaſion to circumuent the Chriſtians, hee might waſte all with fire and ſword, hauing multitudes of Barbarians to ſecond him; and for a concluſion of his notable crueltie, hauing freed the towne of Gaudin, he made choice of twentie of the principal inhabitants, and deliuering to euerie one of them a pike, he forced them in his preſence to kill one another in the midſt of the market place.

Gabor and the Turke preſſe Battori.

The miſeries and diſpaire of Battori.

Battori ſlaine by his owne ſouldiers.

But God reuengeth his exceſſe by his ruine, whereinto we ſhall preſently ſee him run headlong miſerably: for, Bethlem Gabor his capital enemie hauing joyned his forces with thoſe of Baſſa Serder, they both entered together into Tranſyluania, forced Lugaſti, take Deue, and ſtrike a great terror into the whole countrey. Ogli Baſſa on the other ſide ſurmounts the difficultie of the wayes, and lodgeth with his troupes in the ſuburbs of Cromſtad, and from thence went and camped ouer all the tract of Barry or Barſac. Thus Battori ſees himſelfe oppreſt by an enemie from whom he can expect nothing but his miſerie and ruine: he attended ſuccours from the Emperor, vnder the conduct of the Palatine of Hungarie and Fortgatſie: they came, but not ſuch as were able to reſiſt the Turke. This made him write to Trinau for the leuying of ſoldiers; but the hatred they bare him generally, deceiued his hopes, no man would march vnder his enſignes. This refuſal makes him diſtruſtfull, he dares not confer with any man touching the affaires of the war. A treatie of peace ſeemes more fit for his affaires; hee makes an ouerture to his moſt familiar friends, and tels them that he holds it neceſſarie to purchaſe his peace with Serder Baſſa at what price ſoeuer; yea, were it in deliuering into his hands the places of greateſt importance. But he receiues no other anſwers from them, but that they had rather die than aduiſe him to it. Thus he ſees himſelfe void of all hope of ſafetie in his affaires: he wanted money, his ſubiects, yea euen his ſouldiers hated him, as a Prince abandoned to all crueltie; and for his laſt remedie, and the moſt ordinarie in baſe and cowardly mindes, hee fel into diſpaire, intreating one of his ſeruants to kil him; but the other refuſed him that honor, ſuffering him to draw on his miſerable life, till that within ſome few dayes after, going forth to view where his troupes were lodged, being in an open chariot, accompanied onely with two gentlemen, fiftie of his ſoldiers (which attended him in an ambuſh) ſhot at him, ſlew him, and hurt thoſe that did accompanie him. It is true, this accident hapned in the yeare 1613, when as this vnfortunate Battori went to giue an account vnto God of the bad gouernment of his eſtate.

Bethlem Gabor made Prince of Trãſyluania by the Turke.

Some few dayes after, Bethlem Gabor was declared Prince of Tranſyluania by Baſſa Serder, who gaue him this aduiſement at his introduction; Battori ſhall ſerue for an example to bad Princes; I do not thinke that you will follow his ſteps. Beware you attempt not any thing without the priuitie of my Maſter: Maintaine peace with your Neighbours, and make men of experience and honeſtie of your Councell. Tranſyluania did yet feare the continuance of a ſtorme of a fatall warre, when as in leſſe than fortie dayes it ſaw it ſelfe ſettled in the calme of ſweet peace, by the acknowledgement which all the Townes made vnto Bethlem Gabor, and the

A the oath of fidelitie which they tooke vnto him, as to their elected Prince; notwithſtanding that the Emperour employed all his credit to hinder it. But the deſire of peace, and the feare of the Turkes armies, drew all the Gouernors of townes to acknowledge Gabor: ſuch were the affaires of Tranſyluania, diſordered by the Turke. Let vs now make an end of the remainder of the yeare 1612, the which we haue deferred, for that we would not interrupt the relation of the affaires of this Prouince.

A Perſian Embaſſador comes to Conſtantinople.

We haue ſaid elſewhere, That the King of Perſia had offered conditions of peace to Sultan Achmat, much to his aduantage, ſeeing that he yeelded himſelfe the Turks tributarie, in regard of certaine lands which he had conquered from them. Now the Viſier Naſſuf General of the armie againſt the Perſian, brings his Embaſſador to Conſtantinople, to conclude this peace.
B Naſſuf arriued with his armie and the Perſian Embaſſador at Scudaret, right ouer againſt Conſtantinople, whither moſt of the Baſſas of the Port went to ſalute him, and then returned. But the grand Viſier ſtayd there two days; on the third he paſt ouer to Conſtantinople, where he was entertained at the water ſide by all the Baſſa's which accompanied him; an infinit number of Ianizaries going before with their Pieces, and ſome of them in armour, after whome followed their Aga on horſebacke; then came a great number of Iamoglans, and the Emirs or kindred of Mahomet with their greene Turbants, with many blinde men ſhouting aloud: theſe holy men carried the banner (as they ſay) of Mahomet, and the people ſtanding by, kiſſed it with great deuotion as they paſt: after them came the Chaoux on horſebacke, the Baſſa's, then the chiefe Muphti, and laſt of all Naſſuf Baſſa himſelfe: after C whom followed the Treaſure which hee brought with him for the Emperour, being two hundred thirtie foure Moyles loden with gold and ſiluer. The Viſier as he paſt by the Sultans window, bowed himſelfe verie low vnto him, from whom he had a nod with his head, and ſo ſet ſpurres to his horſe and rode away faſt, as the manner of the Turkes is when they ſalute a greater man than themſelues, preſently to runne or ride away apace. The Viſier being come to the Seraill, went in to the Sultan to kiſſe his hand, where he continued a whole houre, the reſt of the Baſſa's attending without. There were preſent at this dayes pompe the Emperors Embaſſadour, the French, the Engliſh, Polonian, Low-Countries, and Venetian; the Perſian remaining ſtill at Scudaret. The Graund Viſier as hee paſt by the Emperours Embaſſadour, put off his hat and ſaluted him, but not the reſt. The ſame day Tomſho, who had beene D lately made Prince of Moldauia by the Graund Seigniour, ſent many Polonians to Conſtantinople, whom he had taken in the wars. All which (notwithſtanding they threw downe their caps and offered to turne Turkes) were put to death. And within few dayes after, the Viſier Naſſuf ſitting in the publique Diuano, had three robes ſent him from the Grand Seignior to grace him.

The Sultan enters in ſtate into Conſtantinople.

The order how his Houſehold marched.

Achmat hauing a will to let the Perſian ſee the magnificence of his Court, went out of Conſtantinople; and vnder a pretext to go take the aire at his Countrie pallace called Darut Baſſa, hee takes occaſion at his returne to make a ſtately entrie at his Imperial Citie. The general Surueyour being aduertiſed of his will, cauſed the wayes from his pallace of Darut vnto the Citie, to be couered with ſand; the which containes two French Leagues, or foure E Engliſh miles. This done, the Emperour parted for his retinue, and entered in pompe into Conſtantinople. The order of this enterie was in this manner: A great number of men at armes marched firſt on horſebacke, and after them ſome troupes of foot, the Cadis of Conſtantinople, or men of juſtice, and all the Taliſmans, or thoſe of Mahomets Law, in very great numbers followed after, and after theſe marcht the Viſiers and Baſſa's in great pompe: after whom followed the Sultans houſhold, that is to ſay, tenne men leading in their hands tenne goodly horſes richly capariſoned, the laſt of which had the bridle and ſaddle all couered with pretious ſtones; the Sultans Targuet was made faſt vnto the ſaddle, and vpon it did hang euen to the ground a great taſſel of pearles; and ouer all this, a long horſe-cloath or F couering for a horſe, the which was embroidered ſo thicke with pearle, as the ground could not be diſcerned: after which followed the reſt of the Emperors houſehold in diuers troups:
firſt, fiftie Ianizaries on foot, euerie one leading dogges in leaſhes, Maſtiffes, or Iriſh Greyhounds, the goodlieſt of all were thoſe which the French Embaſſadour had preſented vnto the Sultan. Secondly, the Graund Seigniours footmen called Peiks, Perſians by Nation, all well attyred, wearing on their heads bonnets of ſiluer and gilt, in forme of pots. Thirdly, threeſcore Archers on foot, in the middeſt of which the Sultan came, attyred in a rich robe of G cloath of gold imbrodered with Pearles and Diamonds, his ſlaues were enricht after the ſame manner; his Turbant couered with fiue plumes of blacke Herons feathers enricht with great Diamonds, and a chaine of the ſame ſtones about the lower part of his Turbant: vpon his little finger he had a Diamond of a large bigneſſe and eſtimable price, the which gaue a maruelous great light; he was proudly mounted vpon a goodly horſe richly capariſoned Emperour like, the ſaddle was embroidered with gold, pearle, and Diamonds, the ſtirrops, of pure gold ſet with many Diamonds, and from the horſe necke did hang a great taſſel of pearle, the which were ſo great, as they were eſteemed verie rich and pretious. 4. After the Graund Seigniour followed three men on horſebacke, carrying in their hands, the one his Armes, the other his cloake, and the third his Imperial Turbant, and theſe were attended on by certaine Eſquires H and Gentlemen all on horſebacke. 5. Then came the Muſicke after the Turkiſh manner, conſiſting of threeſcore men on horſebacke, which played vpon Phifes, Clerons, and trumpets. 6. There followed an hundred Pages of the Sultans, brauely mounted, and followed by manie Eunuchs, fiftie of which Pages caried euerie one a Faulcon vpon his fiſt, hauing their heads enricht with Diamonds, and theſe were followed by thirtie guards of the Port. 7. Fiftie Faulconers and Huntſmen richly attired and wel mounted; foure whereof had either of them before him vpon his ſaddle bow a Leopard couered with cloath of gold. 8. A great number of other pages, fairer than the pictures of Adonis or Loue, choſen amongſt the infants of the Tribute, and vnfortunately appointed for the filthie and vnnatural pleaſures of their Maſter, whoſe garments after the Turkiſh manner were pretious, and made of rich cloath of gold I curled. They were followed by a great troupe of young men plainely attyred in cloath, hauing vpon their heads yellow caps pointed in forme of a ſugar loafe, and theſe were ordained to ſerue the Sultans Pages.

Pages choſen amongſt the faireſt for the Sultans pleaſure.

There were moreouer attending the Sultan in this pompe diuers Beglerbegs, as of Boſna, Buda, Romania, Natolia, and others; euerie companie going diſtinct, both of horſe and foot, with the Baſſa's ſeruants all gallantly attired and wel mounted: and after them followed Naſſufs attendants, being fiue hundred in number richly armed: there were alſo the Kings Firemen, Calkers, Azappes, the Rices or officers of gallies with ſpeares in their hands; all that belonged to the Arcenal, the Carters which gouerned the carts going to war, and their Captaines; then the ſhot-men with their banner, and the Armourers all in armour, with their banner. K There were alſo the banners of the Grand Seignior Mahomet, and of the Grand Viſier, euerie one in his order before the Grand Seignior: and after all followed the Capigie's and Officers of his Kitchen. The number of all ſorts of attendants in this pompe was ſo great, as it was eſteemed to amount to the number of fortie thouſand perſons.

A Larges of the Perſian embaſſador when as the Sultan paſt

The Perſian Embaſſador, for whoſe ſake the Emperor Achmat had made this ſtately ſhew, to the end he might carrie backe into his countrey a patterne of the Othoman ſtate and greatneſſe, cauſed to be caſt out before his lodging when as the Sultan paſſed by, 100 pieces of ſilke, the which were gathered vp by the Archers of his guard, whereof they made good purchaſe. All theſe magnificencies, added to thoſe which we haue formerly related at the marriages of the Sultans ſiſter and daughter, with other pompe celebrated in France, Spaine, Naples, and L Germanie, for the marriages of Lewis the thirteenth, King of France, with Anne of Auſtria, Infant of Spaine; and of the Prince of Spaine with the Ladie Elizabeth of Bourbon the Kings eldeſt ſiſter; and for the coronation of the Empreſſe, and the Emperours entrie into Nuremberg, may giue vnto this yeare 1612 the title of magnique or ſtately.

The Perſians Preſents to the Turke.

Foure dayes after Sultan Achmats enterie into his Imperial citie, the Perſian Embaſſadour had audience, and was receiued to kiſſe his hands: hee preſented vnto his Majeſtie in the behalfe of the King of Perſia his Maſter, foure hundred balls of ſilke, a Beſonard ſtone as big as a mans fiſt, with ſome others that were leſſe; nine bagges of leather full of Turquoiſes, the which were a foot and an halfe long, and aboue foure fingers broad, a great number of Tapeſtries of wooll, ſilke, cloath of gold and ſiluer, with many other things of great price, and very M rare. The complements being ended, they began to treat ſeriouſly of a peace betwixt two great and antient enemies, the Turke and the Perſian; the which after ſome difficulties was concluded vpon theſe conditions: That the Perſian king ſhould pay yearely vnto the Turkiſh Emperor by way of tribute, a quantity of ſilke to the burthen of two hundred camels: that the King of

A of Perſia his ſonne ſhould be called Baſſa of Tauris, and that the Cadi or Soueraigne Iudge of that towne ſhould be ſent from Conſtantinople. This peace thus concluded to the Turks aduantage, the Perſian Embaſſador returned vnto his maſter, hauing left moſt of his traine dead of the Plague at Conſtantinople. Being arriued at Tauris, the king of Perſia ſeeing this peace to be ſo diſhonourable, and burthenſome for him, he cauſed his Embaſſadours head to be cut off; and ſent backe the Chiaux, who was come from Conſtantinople to ſee him ſweare the peace. Some write that hee did him ſome indignities, which made theſe two great Monarchs returne againe to armes.

The Chimacham put from his place.

The Grand Viſier Naſſuf, after his returne to Conſtantinople, to ſhew his great power and authoritie, procured meanes to haue the Chimacham (who had formerly ſupplied the place B of the Graund Viſier in the abſence of Amurath Baſſa, and vntill the returne of Naſſuf) to be depriued of his Baſſaes place, and ſent preſently ouer vnto Scudaret, vnder pretence of preferring him to a gouernment neere vnto Trebizond in the confines of Turkie, but with an intent to depriue him of his head. The friends of this Chimacham, (who were many and great in Court) ſeeing him ſo diſgracefully ſent away, and doubting Naſſuf his purpoſe, procured leaue from the Graund Seigniour to haue him ſent for backe againe, for that hee was an old man, and might from thenceforth liue at home in quiet; and for his former ſeruices a thouſand aſpers a day allowed him for his entertainement: which Naſſuf tooke verie diſcontentedly.

The Emperour Matthias ſends an embaſſador to Cõſtantinople

During the Perſian Embaſſadours abode at Conſtantinople, the Emperour Matthias C (ſucceſſour to Rodulphus his brother) ſent an Embaſſadour to the Sultan, to complaine of the enterpriſes which were made dayly vpon Tranſyluania, a Prouince which he ſaid belonged vnto him, as a dependance of his Realme of Hungarie. This Embaſſadour called Negroni was receiued at the Court, and admitted to kiſſe the Sultans hand: but his Preſents were little eſteemed, for that they were of leſſe value than thoſe which they had lately receiued from the Perſian. His demaunds to haue the Prouince of Tranſyluania, were grounded vpon an article inſerted among thoſe of the peace betwixt the Emperour and Botskay, at that time choſen Prince of Tranſyluania; that is to ſay, That Botskay dying without iſſue male, Tranſyluania ſhould remaine at the diſpoſition of his Imperiall Maieſtie. This article beeing read by Negroni in the Turkes Counſell, whither hee had beene admitted; the Muphti or ſoueraige D prieſt of Mahomets law, anſwered, That it was contrarie to his law: ſo the demands of this Embaſſadour touching Tranſyluania were reiected, ſeeing that Botskay had no power from the Sultan (ſaid the Graund Viſier) to treat with the Emperour, and to giue him Tranſyluania after his death. Negroni grounded this gift of Botskay (mentioned in the ſaid article) vpon the eighth article of the peace betwixt the Turke and the Emperour, concluded in the Iſle of Dannow, by Amurath Viſier, and the Deputies of his Imperiall Maieſtie, in theſe words; That all which had beene granted in the treatie of peace made at Vienna, to Botskay, ſhould be duely and faithfully obſerued. Naſſuf the Grand Viſier replied, That the Baſſa Amurath being then Viſier, might erre in ſigning theſe articles of the peace vpon the Dannow: and at the ſame inſtant he ſhewed forth ſome other articles, whereas that was not inſerted; ſaying, That the Sul-E tan would faithfully performe thoſe and no others, preſſing the Embaſſadour Negroni to ſigne them; the which he refuſed to doe: ſo as Naſſuf vſed ſome threats to terrifie him; but Negroni replied, That hee was in their power, and that in this caſe he had rather loſe his life, and die glorioully for the good of his maſters affaires, than to haue it taken from him at his returne to Vienna, with ſhame and infamie, hauing ſigned thoſe articles. Finally he promiſed to aduertiſe his Imperiall Maieſtie, and to certifie them of his pleaſure: which promiſe for this time ended the contention.

The malice and falſhood of the Turks.

In the beginning of this yeare, Sultan Achmat, after the reception of the Perſian Embaſſadour, and the ſtately entrie hee made into Conſtantinople, went to lie at Adrianople, where his Ianizaries and Spahies beganne to mutinie, ſpurning at their bread and rice F which was giuen them for their dayly entertainement: and beeing demaundeded the reaſon of this their inſolencie, they anſwered, that no Emperour before him had ſo carried out his men in the depth of Winter: which anſwere did much incenſe Naſſuf Baſſa. This Viſier was in ſuch credit with the Graund Seigniour, as during his abode at Adrianople, hee came three times in perſon priuately to viſite him, who grew ſo powerfull ouer his maſters affections, as hee obtayned a priuiledge, That it might not bee lawfull for any man to ſpeake with the Graund Seigniour priuately, but himſelfe. Being returned to Conſtantinople, there happened a great fire, in which there were fiue hundred houſes burnt. The Viſier Naſſuf comming to ſee it quenched, and finding ſome Ianizaries more carefull to breake open lockes, and rifle ſhoppes, than to doe any good ſeruice, hee ſtrucke out the braines of one of them with his mace, and brake the arme of another.

It had beene an antient cuſtome in Conſtantinople, that the owner of the houſe with all his familie where the fire beganne, ſhould be put to death for their negligence: but it happening that the Emperours owne Seraill, in the time of Mahomet father to Achmat, being ſet on fire, Cicala Baſſa preſented a petition vnto him, that this cuſtome might be aboliſhed, holding it vnjuſt that other men ſhould be put to death, and the ſame let paſſe in the Emperors owne houſe: whereunto hee yeelded, holding it reaſonable. And ſoone after there happened another great fire, at which the Viſier cauſed many of the Ianizaries to bee hanged; finding them too buſie in rifling houſes; and he went vp and downe the ſtreets with his ſcimitar in one hand, and a Ianizaries head in the other, which he had cut off. The Grand Seignior ſent Holy Water vnto the Viſier, wherein he had dipt a piece of Mahomets garment, the which beeing poured into the fire, the Turkes ſaid, it ceaſed preſently; yet by the report of viſible witneſſes, it burned foure houres after. The Grand Viſier Naſſuf was a cruell enemie to the Ianizaries, of whom he ſent ſixteene thouſand away into Aſia, and would not ſuffer any moe to be made, but onely Spahies: and ouer ſuch Ianizaries as remained he made his owne ſeruants to bee Churbagies, and Agaes or Captaines ouer fifties and hundreds; fortyfing himſelfe by all the meanes hee could deuiſe, againſt the future time, to preuent his ſudden ruine; but all this could not preſerue him from a ſhamefull fall, as you ſhall hereafter heare.

Troubles in the realme of Fez and Moroco.

The beginning of the Xerifs of Fez & Moroco

In the meane time let vs paſſe vnto Affricke, to obſerue the troubles which fell in the Realmes of Fez and Moroco; the quarrels betwixt Prince Xerif Muley Cidan, and the Xerif Muley Achmet, Ben-Abdalla his nephew, and the victories of Cidan againſt Abdalla. The Family of the Xerifs Princes of Fez and Moroco, tooke its beginning ſome hundred and foure yeares ſince, from Mahomet Xerif, borne at Tigumedet in Dara, at this preſent one of the Prouinces of Moroco: hee was Alfaqui or preacher of Mahomets Law, who ſeeing the diuiſions betwixt the Soueraigne princes of thoſe Realmes, and that the Portugalls had ſeiſed of the chiefe Forts of Moroco, he began with three of his ſonnes, Abdalla, Hamet, and Mahomet, to lay the foundation of a new monarchie, ſupported by three pillars. That is to ſay, by a counterfeit pietie and diſguiſed Religion; vpon a godly pretext to make warre againſt the Portugals Chriſtians which were in Affricke; and vpon a paſſionate deſire to retire the Mahometane Moores which were in their pay, to the end they might by that meanes weaken them, and chaſe them with more eaſe out of the territories of Moroco. The King who at that time held the Scepter of Fez (ſeeing nothing but the outſide of the Xerifs deſignes) ſuffered his three ſonnes to diſplay their ſtandard againſt the Chriſtian Portugals in the Realme of Moroco: Innouations and nouelties are commonly pleaſing to the common people. At this beginning, theſe three leaders were followed by a great number of ſouldiers; they vanquiſhed in many encounters, and the bruit of their new victories flying into the Realme of Moroco, retired the Moores from the Portugals ſeruice, whome they defeated ſoone after, with their Commaunder Lopes Bariga. True it is, that it was to their loſſe; for Abdalla the eldeſt of theſe three brethren loſt his life in this combat. But they ſeiſed vpon the great towne of Taradente in the prouince of Sus, and of the prouinces of Herra, Ideuaca, Vbideuaca, Cus, Guzule, and in a manner of the whole country betwixt Moroco and mount Atlas, ſettling their principalitie in Taradente, whereas the Xerif their father carried the name of the Gouernour of the prouince of Sus.

The children of the Xerif grow potent.

They kill the king of Moroco

The King of Moroco fearing the greatneſſe of theſe new Conquerours, diſſembled the deſire he had to bring them vnder, aſſuring himſelfe that time would preſent him ſome good occaſion: ſo ſuffering them to enter into Moroco: but they preuented him, they tooke

A away his life by poyſon, and ſeiſed vpon his Realme. The King of Fez, who had by an indiſcreet ſimplicitie ſuffered them to take armes, and by that means to open the way to a great fortune, he ſaw a far off the tempeſt of theſe vniuſt ſpoilers to fall vpon Moroco and other places.
The feare of the like calamitie did much afflict his minde: but the Xeriſs entertained this idle Prince with faire ſhewes; they abuſed his bountie, and with the fourth part of the rich ſpoiles which they had taken in ſo many townes and prouinces, they lull his diſtruſt aſleepe:
moreouer, they ſend him the tribute due for the realme of Moroco. Hamet takes vpon him the name of King of Moroco; Mahomet that of king of Sus, in the towne of Taradente; and by a good intelligence betwixt them, they make themſelues fearefull to all thoſe countries; ſo as they haue nothing more to feare, than the threats and vengeance of heauen. They then began B to contemne the king of Fez, and plainly to denie the tribute of Moroco; pretending for their reaſon, that they were iſſued from the line of Mahomet. This contempt made the king of Fez to open his eyes; he finds the faults paſt, by the intereſt of the preſent: he ſees the Xeriſs had abuſed the libertie which hee had giuen them: whereupon hee went to field with an armie of 18000 men, and planted his ſiege before Moroco; but as his enemies partie was ſtronger than his, ſo he was chaſed away, and his army defeated at the paſſage of a riuer. Thus the Xeriſs became peaceable poſſeſſours of Moroco. The peace of the countrey made theſe men idle, and idleneſſe drew the two brethren into quarrell; they muſtred vp their forces and came to fight, where after two bloudie battels, Mahomet being victor, he tooke his eldeſt brother Hamet, depriued him of his realme and libertie, and made him end his daies miſerably in priſon. Thus C God doth puniſh the vnjuſt ſpoiler of another mans good: we ſhall ſee in their poſteritie the continuance of the ſame quarrell.

The king of Fez begins to feare them.

The King of Fez beſiegeth Moroco, and is defeated.

Quarrels betwixt the Xeriſs, and the eldeſt taken by his brother.

Mahomet ſettled ſoueraigne in Moroco by bloud and fratricide, as monſtrous in ambition as in crueltie, hee turned the ſame armes wherewith hee had beaten and vanquiſhed his eldeſt brother, againſt the King of Fez (whoſe improuidence had ſuffered Mahomet and his brethren to take armes, vnder the deceitfull title and pretence of making warre againſt the Chriſtian Portugals) he aſſaulted him with great forces, vanquiſhed him, tooke him priſoner, and depriued him both of Realme and life. Thus the Xeriſs in the perſon of this Mahomet became Soueraigne princes of Fez and Moroco. The victory ſo happily gotten of ſo many nations, made him fearefull; but by his crueltie hee drew vpon his deſcendents the juſt judgement of him
D who puniſheth the exceſſe and enormitie of crimes vnto the fourth generation. His poſteritie was miſerable, the vnjuſt deſire of raigne (one ruining another) entertained the brethren in perpetuall diſcord. For Cidan now king of Fez and Moroco, was lately expelled by his brother Kequi; but afterwards Fortune changing her inconſtant fauour, Kequi was purſued by Cidan, defeated, and forced in the yeare 1610 to ſaue his life in Algarbe in Portugall. Abdalla the ſonne of Kequi ſeeing his fathers affaires thus deſolate, retires himſelfe towards the mountaines in the prouince of Sus: where finding opportunitie to annoy his vncle Cidan, he made daily incurſions vpon his territories, with ſome troups of Arabians who had ioined with him being 200 horſe and 200 foot. But finding this to be a long courſe to attain vnto the conqueſt of the realme from whence he had been expelled, he bethought himſelfe that ſome certaine E counterfeit fictions in Religion, had in former times brought in his grandfather, and made him abſolute lord of a great countrey; wherefore he made vſe of a propheſie forged in his ambitious ſpirit: and to worke an impreſſion in the peoples minds (eaſie to be moued with a paſſion of religion) he ſent certaine religious Mahometans throught the country, with a ſhew of holy ſimplicitie, who went preaching from place to place, That one Falquere a man of holy life, had giuen vnto a ſonne of his a Drumme of an admirable power and vertue, commanding him expreſſely, to keepe it carefully, vntill that a prince called Abdalla ſhould come into Moroco, beeing expelled by the injuſtice of his owne bloud: and that then hee ſhould beat this Drumme, and that the people at the ſound thereof might go to the war with all ſafetie; that it ſhould be helpfull to them, giue peace vnto the Realme, and ſettle all the cuſtomes F and antient lawes to their common content. Thus they preached this propheſie, the which they ſaid was now accompliſhed, ſeeing that this propheticall Drum had been found, that Abdalla the eldeſt prince of the houſe of the Xeriſs had cauſed it to be beaten, exhorting all men to follow the war for the common good of the countrey.

The Xerif aſſaults the king of Fez.

Cidan and Kequi brethren expell one another.

A propheſie inuented by Kequi, and preached by religious Turkes.

These vanities being preached by theſe ignorant and malicious religious Turkes, increaſed the number of Abdallaes partie: whereof Cydan beeing aduertiſed, hee ſent a great armie againſt him into the prouince of Sus, vnder the command of Alcas Elmye, to hinder the progreſſe of his deſignes: But Abdalla finding theſe forces to approch, retired himſelfe towards the mountaines, from whence he might charge the enemies armie; the which he did ſo happily, as within few daies he cut off fiue thouſand of his men. This ſucceſſe did ſo aduance his affaires, as his troupes encreaſed daily, ſo as Cydan was forced to go with new forces to fight with him, the which was the cauſe of his ruine: for at this time hee was inueſted, and notwithſtanding the good ſucceſſe of his falſe propheſies, lightly grounded vpon the ſound of a Drumme, hee was defeated and ſlaine in this yeare one thouſand ſix hundred and twelue.

Abdalla defeated and ſlaine notwithſtanding his falſe propheſies.

The miraculous king of Mauritania.

Gotardus, diſcourſing of this miraculous King of Mauritania, whome hee calles Muley Hamet, writeth that he was charmed with deuiliſh incantations, and freed from all outward force, carrying himſelfe for a Diuine Prophet: That with one hundred and eightie horſe, and two hundred foot, hee went to make head againſt Cydan King of Moroco, hauing fortie thouſand men: That his ſouldiers (who were ſo few in number) beeing readie to flie, hee perſuaded them with a cunning ſpeech to prepare to fight: That comming neere to Cydans campe, they might ſee a great armie of enemies fighting againſt them, in which there were fiue thouſand of Cydans armie ouerthrowne, and the reſt put to flight, and yet Hamet had not aduanced with his troupes: That within few dayes after, comming with his troupes tyred to a riuer ſide, hee commanded them not to drinke nor waſh in that riuer, which if they did they would die: but ſome neglecting his command, thinking to quench their thirſt, dyed ſuddenly. Hee tooke many places in thoſe mountainous Regions, which no man had formerly ſubdued; his forces encreaſing dayly, hauing fiue and twenty thouſand men, and vowing to go againſt the Chriſtians, more came vnto him: ſo as he went againſt Cydan with a good armie, who likewiſe attended him. Hamet perſuaded his ſouldiers that no ſhot could hurt them; ſo as they aſſaulted Cydans campe with ſuch furie, as within leſſe than an houres ſpace they had ſlaine aboue ſix thouſand men, and put the reſt to flight. They write that Hamet loſt not aboue foure or fiue, and that ſuch as were ſtrucke with any bullet, ſhewed markes but no wounds; and that the great ordnance either ſhot ouer them, or the pouder vented out at the touch-hole, and wrought no effect. Cydan hauing loſt his brother in the fight, fled with all his treaſure, to recouer new forces, and in the meane time Hamet made himſelfe maſter of the whole countrey. There were certaine Hollanders admitted vnto him, whome they found ſitting vpon a carpet made of the barke of trees, hauing a white ſhirt, and a long garment vpon it, a red cap on his head, bare thighs, and red ſhooes, a bag about his necke, and in it hee hid his Alcaron, a ſhort crooked ſword and a dagger hanging by him. Beeing ſaluted by the Hollanders, hee willed them to ſit downe by him, telling them that hee was ſent from heauen, to purge the World from euill, and to prepare the Law of God; to expell Cydan out of his Kingdome, and to reſtore peace vnto the World: wherefore hee aduiſed them not to haue any commerce with Cydan, nor to aſſiſt him in any ſort. They obſerued many markes vpon his bodie, hee had one blew tooth, all the reſt beeing white, haire vpon either ſhoulder, a red circle in the palme of his right hand, and the proportion of a ſpurre vpon his right foot. Hauing gotten ſome victories againſt Cydan, and taken the towne of Moroco, in the end his deuilliſh art failing him, hee was ſlaine as you haue heard. Such were the affaires of Affricke, in the Realmes of Fez and Moroco.

A great drought & ſterility at Algier

But in Algier a wonderfull drought had cauſed cruell combuſtions; it had ſo deuoured the fruits of the earth before their maturitie, as there followed a wonderfull famine throughout the whole land. The Turkes attributed the cauſe of their miſerie ſometimes to their ſins; then to the comming of the Moores, who had beene expelled out of Spaine, as a pernicious vermine; and ſometimes to the licentiouſneſſe of Chriſtians, which liued in thoſe places. Wherefore in the beginning of May this yeare, the Iudge of the towne ordained, That all the Turkes ſhould make their deuout prayers to Mahomet their Prophet to obtaine raine, ſo neceſſarie in that countrey; that the Moores ſhould depart the towne within three daies vpon paine of death; and that all the Chriſtians,as wel free as bond-ſlaues,ſhould cauſe their heads and their beards to bee ſhauen, this was ſpeedily executed; for the Turks decrees require a prompt obedience. But the miſerable Moores which could not get out of Algier within their three dayes prefixed, detained either by ſickneſſe,or ſome other impediment,were all cut in pieces. For thirteene daies, there was nothing ſeene within the towne but proceſſions of Turkes without Turbants, crying and howling after their manner to obtaine raine from their falſe Prophet: but he which commands Soueraigntie ouer times, from whoſe hand proceed faire weather and raine,and which makes the earth fruitfull,held the pipes of heauen yet ſtopped, to open them at more religious and holy vowes than the ſuperſtitious clamours of theſe Infidels. For Bernard Murroy, of the Order of the Redemption of captiues, hearing that the Turkes meant to reuenge their miſeries vpon them, and to ruine a little Chappell which the Chriſtian ſlaues had in the priſon, for the pious exerciſes of their Religion, obtained (by the meanes of Bius Conſull of the French in Algier) permiſſion from the Douan,or Turkiſh Iudge, to make proceſſions, and to pray vnto God to ſend them the deaw of Heauen,which was ſo neceſſarie for them. All the Chriſtian ſlaues which were priſoners,continued their deuotions for the ſpace of fiue dayes: but on the fourth day beeing the eighth of May, there fell ſuch aboundance of raine vpon Algier,as theſe poore Chriſtians ſeeing their praiers heard in the middeſt of the enemies of their faith, gaue infinit thanks vnto God for his great mercie and grace.

Proceſſions of the Turkes.

The deuout praiers of the Chriſtians obtaine raine.

Theſe miſerable Chriſtian ſlaues were ſtill detayned in yrons and cruell ſeruitude, by this accident. This Murroy of the Order of the Redemption of captiues, accompanied with two others of the ſame Order, had redeemed to the number of one hundred thirtie and ſix: but when hee was readie to embarque them, their euill fortune would haue it, that the gallies of Genoa running along that coaſt, landed ſome men neere vnto Algier, where they tooke the Baſſaes ſonne of that Towne, with many other Turkes, and amongſt this number a virgine of Algier, of a verie noble Familie, and of as rare a beautie, for the miſerie of theſe ſlaues: for that when as the Baſſaes ſonne and the others were redeemed by a Frigot which the father had ſent, the faire Algerian virgine was ſtill detayned by a Captaine of the Genowayes, who had retyred to Caluy an Iſland adioyning, there to ſatisfie his deſires with more eaſe,vpn the fraile and fading perfection of this faire ſlaue,which had depriued him of his libertie. In the meane time the Baſſa of Algier ſeeing his ſonne returned with the other Turkes, and not the Algerian virgine, commanded that the hundred thirtie an dſix ſlaues ſhould be put againe into yrons, with the three religious men which had redeemed them. Thus this feminine beautie, or rather the paſſion of this Genoways,who holds the poſſeſſion ſo deare, makes a great number of Chriſtian ſoules to ſuffer by inſupportable ſeruitude, howſoeuer they of his Nation (flattering his diſordered luſt) ſay that his deſire to win her to God, and to make her a Chriſtian, cauſed him to keepe her ſo carefully.

Theſe ſuffered in Algier the loſſe of their libertie: But a Capuchen Frier,a Florentine by Nation, endured at Tunes the loſſe of his life, by the crueltie of the Moores chaſed out of Spaine, and retyred into thoſe Countries. This religious man beeing a ſlaue among the Turkes, attended daily from Florence, or from ſome other place, money to redeeme his libertie: but it happened one day diſputing in a Barbers houſe with a Moriſque, concerning Chriſtian Religion; the zeale of his faith tranſported him ſo farre, as to ſay among diuers Turkes, That his religion was better than that of Mahomets. Theſe wordes tooke crimonouſly in that place, were reported by the Moriſques to the Cadi or Iudge of the towne, whome they preſt with ſuch horrible clamors and cries, as he pronounced ſentence of death againſt this Capuchen. Hee was deliuered vnto them, and they ſtripped him naked, leading him with infamie through Tunes; ſome ſpitting in his face, others caſting durt at him, and ſo they led him out of the Towne, where they tyed him vnto a poſt, and they beeing cruelly incenſed by a ſpeech which a Morrabour or religious Turke ſaid vnto them, That he among them that gaue him not one blow with a ſtone, ſhould be no good Turke; they ſtoned him to death, where afterwards they burnt his bodie, and threw the aſhes into the winde.

An enterpriſe of foure ſlaues.

They are diſcouered.

They defend themſelues, and kill many.

The captaine cruelly executed.

The martyrdome of this Capuchen, was followed by the conſtant confeſſion (amidſt the violence of torments) of a penitent Renegado, a Florentine by nation, and captaine of the chiefe gallie of Chio; foure Frenchmen beeing ſlaues in the Iſland of Chio, in the patron or chiefe gallie, belonging to the Bey or Gouernour of the Iſland, they reſolued to recouer their libertie with the hazard of their liues, to returne into France, and carrie into ſome port of Chriſtendome that gallie, being the beſt appointed in the whole hauen. They drew vnto their partie the Captaine which commanded, beeing a Florentine Renegado. Their enterpriſe ſhould haue beene executed when as they ſhould goe to land to cut wood. But whether that the ſcribe were trecherous to his companions, or tranſported with ſome raſh indiſcretion; beeing on land, hee ſpake theſe words aloud, the which ouerthrew both the deſigne, and them that proiected it; Hoe, we ſhall returne into Chriſtendome. A Turke which was neere, taking hold of theſe words, reported them vnto the Patron; who preſently layed hold vpon the Scribe, and drew from him the confeſſion of all the enterpriſe. Hee preſently ſends an hundred men towards the gallie, to ſeiſe vpon the foure French ſlaues and the Captaine. But theſe fiue made ſuch a generous reſiſtance, as if the other ſlaues, who were for the moſt part Moldauians, or of the Prouinces which border vpon the blacke ſea, had had the courage to fight for their libertie, without doubt the Frenchmens enterpriſe had ſucceeded happily. But what could fiue men do againſt an hundred? yet they ſlew fifteene, and wounded many: the foure Frenchmen were all ſlaine, and the Florentine Captaine was taken aliue, and reſerued to the rigour of a cruell death. For they continued him ſix houres together in moſt violent torments, hee ſtill calling vpon the holy and ſacred name of Ieſus Chriſt, euen to the laſt gaſpe, and deteſting the errours and falſhood of the law of Mahomet. This happened in October this yeare.

The Vnited Eſtates ſend an Embaſſador to Conſtantinople.

A little before, the Eſtates of the vnited Prouinces, and Count Maurice ſeeing the loſſes which the ſhips of Holland ſuffered in the Mediterranean ſea, many of them beeing taken by the Turkiſh gallies, and a great number of their men made ſlaues: to the end they might be freed from that danger, and haue a ſafe paſſage for their ſhips, and procure libertie for their captiues, they reſolued to make a league with the Turke. Wherefore they ſent Cornelius Hage to Conſtantinople: who not onely willingly accepted of that Embaſſie, but performed it with ſuch diſcretion, as hee purchaſed great credit and commendation to himſelfe, and much profit to the Prouinces. He had reſolued at firſt to paſſe through Hungary; but he found ſo many croſſes and obſtacles, by ſome that were Creatures to the Pope and Spaniard, as hee was forced to turne out of the way, and fetch a great circuit. Firſt of all, he fell into the hands of the Archduke Ferdinand, who cauſed him to be examined, and admoniſhed to deſiſt from his purpoſe: After which hee was toſt at ſea, and in the end hauing ſurmounted all dangers, hee recouered Conſtantinople, the firſt of May. Hee had expreſſe charge from the Vnited Eſtates to labour for three things. The firſt was, to treat of the deliuerance of the Hollanders that were ſlaues. The ſecond, to make a league with the Turke. And the third, to obtaine from him a free nauigation for the Hollanders, throughout all the ſeas and ports of his Empire.

Preſents ſent from the Vnited Eſtates to the Turke.

This Embaſſadour was brought to kiſſe the Sultans hands, and was fauorably receiued: he preſented vnto his Maieſtie in the name of the Eſtates of the vnited Prouinces, his letters of Embaſſie, with the Preſents which follow: Three birds of Paradiſe of rare and precious plumes, wonderful goodly to behold, and valued at eight hundred pound ſterling: two veſſels of Chriſtall wonderfull rich and beautifull: foure other veſſels made of fiſhes bones, whereas the art ſeemed miraculous in the grauing: fortie pieces of cloth of gold of diuers colours: fiue pieces of ſilke, fiue of damaske, fiue of ſilke watered, and fiue plaine: A ſtaffe of an Elephants tooth grauen with admirable induſtry. A Parrat ſhut in a cage of Chriſtall, ſo artificially done, as no man could diſcerne the entrie: and many faire and rich table-clothes of Holland cloth, moſt part powdred with flowers to the life, and wrought in their liuely colours. The which the Sultan did accept with admiration. All theſe things ſhew ſufficiently, That the Eſtates from the beginning or ſoone after haue raiſed handy-workes as well as traffique and nauigation to the higheſt point of perfection.

The ſixth of Iuly following, the league was ſworne betwixt the Othoman Emperour, and

A the vnited Prouinces of the Low-Countries, by the which Achmat promiſed to cauſe to be ſet at libertie, all the Hollanders that were detayned ſlaues within his Empire: That the traffique ſhould bee free for the Hollanders ſhippes throughout all his ſeas and hauens: and moreouer he granted, That the Eſtates ſhould haue an Embaſſadour reſiding at his port. This alliance with the Turke, for the which they haue ſo often, and with little reaſon blamed the French, hath beene affected and ſought by the Engliſh and Spaniards, as wee haue ſaid elſewhere; and now by the Hollanders, whoſe Eſtates proceed in all their affaires with ſuch weight and meaſure, as it ſeemes they doe nothing but with great reaſon, and to good purpoſe.

A league betwixt the Turke and the Hollanders.

About the end of this yeare, the Iewes whoſe long ſlauerie throughout the World reprocheth B their wretched and miſerable obſtinacie, receiued at Pera neere Conſtantinople the weight of a furious tempeſt which fell vpon them, ſtirred vp againſt them by the malice of the Moriſques Granadines chaſed out of Spaine, and retired into the Leuant. Theſe hauing by Preſents wonne the fauour of the Cadi, or Iudge of the place, who was a Negro newly ſetled in that charge by the Graund Viſier Naſſuf; they obtayned power from him to thruſt all the Iewes out of Pera, and to ruine their Synagogues. This power they executed with all violence: And yet theſe miſerable Iewes durſt not make their complaints vnto the Magiſtrate, except one of their ſect which dwelt in the Iſle of Chio, who being then at Conſtantinople, and ſuppoſing hee had more credit than the reſt, went to complaine to this Cadi Negro, who preſently cauſed to be giuen vnto him fiue hundred blowes with a cudgell, C in ſtead of doing him juſtice; ſo dangerous a thing it is to haue to doe with ſuch vnjuſt Magiſtrates.

The Moriſques, chaſe the Iewe out of Pera.

The inſolencies of the Moriſques, tranſported them further: for after they had expelled the Iewes out of their dwellings, they threatned to doe vnto the Chriſtians at Pera, as much as had beene done vnto them in Spaine: and they bragged, That they would ſeiſe vpon their Churches, and eſpecially of that of the Franciſcan Friers, the which was reaſonable faire for the place. But the French Embaſſadour, hauing made his complaint to the chiefe Viſier, hee prohibited them to make any attempt againſt the Chriſtians, vpon paine of rigorous puniſhment. This prohibition ſtaied their furie: but they did not forbeare in all other occaſions to ſhew the cruell hatred they owe vnto Chriſtians: ſo as through all the Leuant, in all encounters D where they came, they doe a thouſand times more miſchiefe than the Turkes themſelues.

The practiſes of the Moriſques againſt the Chriſtians of Pera.

At the ſame time the Sultan Achmat had drawne together a mightie armie to go into Tranſyluania; hee cauſed it to campe in tents neere vnto Conſtantinople, about his pallace called Darut Baſſa, whither the people of Conſtantinople went to walke, and to ſee his forces: within few daies after, hee went to Adrianople; meaning from thence to proceed in his voyage, carrying with him all the chiefe men of his port, except the Baſſa of the ſea, or Admirall, who remained at Conſtantinople, to haue a care of the citie. And for the greater ſafety thereof, this Baſſa cauſed an edict to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould go out of his houſe, nor keepe any light in it after the ordinarie crie, which is made an houre within night, when as the Taliſ- E mans crying from the tops of their Moſques, inuite the people to make the Sala, or prayer. After the publication of this ordinance, hee ſent certaine Chaoux to entreat all the Embaſſadours reſiding at the Port, not to ſuffer their people to goe out by night, to the end that their libertie might not ſerue as a dangerous example to others. But notwithſtanding all the Baſſaes entreaties and prohibitions, three Engliſhmen of the Embaſſadors traine, went out by night into the ſtreet, where they were met by the Prouoſt of Pera, who tooke them, and preſently (without reſpect of the qualitie) cauſed either of them to haue an hundred and fiftie blows with a cudgel, and then committed them to priſon, the dores whereof are neuer opened but with a ſiluer key: ſo ſtrickly do they obſerue in Turkie the orders of the Princes Lieutenants, without exception of perſons.

The Turks armie for Tranſyluania.

F About the end of the yeare, the Patriarch of Conſtantinople (by reaſon of diuers complaints made againſt him, was depriued by the Grand Viſier, and one Cyrillus, Patriarch of Alexandria, (a learned and religious Biſhop) was (much againſt his will) preferred to the place. The former Patriarch hereupon excommunicated all ſuch as had wrought his ouerthrow;

throw, but he himſelfe was baniſhed into the Iſle of Rhodes.In his paſſage, the Barke where- G in he went was caſt vpon Mytilene, in which place he renounced all right and claime to the Patriarchſhip before the Biſhop of that place, and reſigned it to the Biſhop of Patras : whereupon the Biſhop came from Patras, to Conſtantinople, and laboured with the Viſier Naſſuf for the place : who vpon promiſe to pay him fifteene thouſand Chequines (which is ten thouſand more than they were wont to pay) made him a Grant thereof : which Cyrillus the late elected Patriarch vnderſtanding, he came with all the Grecians to expoſtulate the buſineſſe with the Grand Viſier : Who anſwered, That he was to do what he could for the Emperors profit, and nothing againſt it ; wherefore if they would giue ſo much as the other had promi-ſed, Cyrillus ſhould continue in the place. Which the people were very willing to performe;
but Cyrillus refuſed it, and ſo the other was made Patriarch : who preſently ſent for the old H Patriarch to come from Rhodes to make peace with him, for that they held not his excommunication juſt, being not depriued by a Councell, but onely by the King. About the ſame time, Naſſuf the Grand Viſier ſent for the foure Embaſſadors, of England, France, Venice, and the States of the Low-Countries ; and the reaſon why he ſent for them was, to raiſe their cuſtome one in the hundred more than the Merchants had formerly payd.

The enterpriſe of the Great Duke of Tuſcanie vpon Agliman.

Whileſt that the Sultan Achmats armie drew neere to Tranſyluania, and fortified the places which he held in thoſe Countries, Coſmo de Medicis Great Duke of Tuſcanie bent his generous deſignes againſt the Fort of Agliman in Caramania, in old time called Cilicia, a Prouince which in the writings of Antients hath beene honoured with two famous Cities, that is to ſay, Tharſis the countrey of Saint Paul, and Seleucia, the Fort and Port whereof is called Agliman, a hauen which in old time hath contained within it's boſome the fearful for- I ces of the Pyrats of thoſe dayes : from thence in former times hath come forth a powerfull armie of pyrats with a thouſand ſaile, ſo proudly rigged, as many of them had their ſailes of purple, the tackling of gold thred, and the oares garniſhed with ſiluer, markes of the ſpoiles of aboue foure hundred cities ruined by thoſe pyrats, who ſtroke a terror euen to the Romans, and forced them, to auoid their furie, to ſet to ſea that great fleet whereof Pompey the Great was General.

The ſtate of the Fort of Agliman.

The trophie erected vpon the walls of Agliman, of the heads of fortie Florentines, loſt in a Ship called the Proſper, by the ignorance of the Captaine which commanded in it, made the Great Duke to ſtudie to haue his reuenge for this affront, and his deſire to abate the pride K of the common Enemie, eleuated his minde to generous enterpriſes. In the end of March this preſent yeare 1613, hee armed ſix Gallies vnder the command of the Admiral Inghirami, the which he manned with ſix companies of foot commanded by Iulio de Conty, called Montano, General at land, beſides fortie Knights of the Order of S. Stephen, and a good number of gentlemen aduenturers, among the which was Don Petro de Medicis. This fleet parted from Ligorne, and came to Ciuita Vecchia : in the beginning of Aprill they tooke in many Noblemen and Gentlemen of France, which attended them, and would be partakers in the enterpriſe ; the which were, the Earle of Candale, eldeſt ſonne to the Duke of Eſpernon, Cipierre, Themines, De Vic, Monterrault, De la Tour, and his brother Boiſſiere, Villandre, Vernegue, Du Pleſſis, De la Motte magnus, Auenes, Del Tour, Sainct Cyre, Monplaiſir, and Loyres. L
About mid Aprill the gallies landed in the night neere vnto a little towne in Aſia the Leſſe, called Ieronda, held for that Geronda of the Antients : but their diſcent was fruitleſſe, they found it deſart by the flight of the Inhabitants, who had preuented all ſurpriſes. They returned again to their gallies, and ſailing towards the Eaſt, they encountred three Veſſels like vnto their Caramouſſals, the which they ſet vpon and tooke : and about the fifteenth of May, hauing ſcoured the Leuant ſeas, they reſolued to attempt Agliman. Vpon the way they tooke a Veſſel called Grippe, which inſtructed them of the eſtate of the Fortreſſe : They vnder-ſtood there were two Gallies of Cyprus in the Port, that the place was well furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, and guarded without by a good number of horſemen, and that within few dayes after, one of the ſaid gallies ſhould come out of the port of Agliman, and go to the M Iſland of Pappadula, to fetch a new maſt. Inghirami thought to preuent it, carrying his whole fleet thither, the which he layd cloſe in the Iſland to ſurpriſe the Turkiſh Galley, but it hauing diſcouered his fleet, put out to ſea, and with ſpeed returned to the Port of Agliman,

A to giue the alarme vnto the Countrey. Notwithſtanding the Chriſtians reſolued to aſſault it, they went with their fleet to the port Caualier, twelue miles from Agliman, from whence they ſent a long boat to diſcouer: the which brings them word that the whole countrey was in armes. Theſe newes might well haue daunted the courages of ſome that had been leſſe generous; yet they paſſe on and about three of the clocke in the morning they came neere the ſhore, being couered with the ſilence of the night, ſo as before ſix of the clock they had made their landing about a mile and a halfe from the port. The Seignior of Montano and the Earle of Candale with ſome few choiſe men landed firſt, to diſcouer: a mile from the ſhore they encountered the Turkiſh horſemen, yet notwithſtanding Montano commanded they ſhould finiſh their landing, leauing twentie men for the guard of euery gallie.

The Chriſtians land at Agliman.

The deſcription of Agliman.

B This fort of Agliman is ſeated vpon a little pleaſant hill, which lookes towards the South:
It extends from the hill vnto the ſea ſhore: the forme is ovall; that part which is next to the Sea is altogether Meridionall, and the other which riſeth vpon the top of the hill, lookes towards the North. The wals are built of good ſtone and lime, the which are fiue faddome high, and one broad. Within there was a wall drawne from the Eaſt to the Weſt, which diuides it into two vnequall parts, the which they enter by a port ſet in the midſt. The circuite of the wall is fortified with eight towers, whereof fiue be whole, and three are but halfe towers: thoſe which be whole are of a ſquare forme, and haue fiue faddome in breadth on either ſide: the halfe towers haue the ſame greatneſſe on the one ſide, and halfe as much on the other; their heigth exceedes not the wall, vnleſſe it bee that which is built on the C top of the hill, which is raiſed about eight foot aboue the wall. Within the place were aboue three hundred fighting men; with ſtore of victuals, munitions for warre, and many pieces of ordnance: without, there were an hundred horſe ſcouring vp and downe for the guard of the place: and within the port there were two gallies, a Caramouſall, and a Greeke Brigandine, with ſome hundred and fiftie fighting men. The order of the combat was diuided after this manner, by the Seignior Montano Generall at land: for the principall port, and that of the retreat, he ſent two companies of foot, which were thoſe of the Admirals gallie, of the captains gallie, and of S. Stephen, with the petards, all vnder the charge of the Earle of Candale, who leading this forward, diſcouered a Corps de gard of Turkes, horſe and foot together: whereof hee preſently aduertiſed the Generall, ſending him word that hee would march on towards the D fort, and if the Turks came to charge him, he would cut them all in pieces. Many aduiſed him to returne to the gallies: but Montano allowed the reſolution of the Earle of Candale, who paſt on without charge vntill hee came within 120 paces of the wall, where hee was charged before by the muſket ſhot of the fort, behind by the gallies, and in flanke by them of the mountaine, with ſuch horrible howling and crying out, as the mariners which carried the Petards being wonderfully amazed and terrified, let them fall to the ground, and fled away. The Baron of Mont terault, and Tiel, a ſouldier of Langueza tooke them vp. They continued their way vntill they came within fifteene paces of the walls, when as twentie Turks ſallied forth with a ſhew to make head againſt the Earle of Candales troupes: but ſeeing themſelues too weake, they fled preſently againe backe to the towne. The Earle aduanced to enter with E them, but the port was ſo ſoone ſhut as they were in: wherefore they muſt of force ſet the Petard to worke. But whileſt they were making it faſt vnto the gate, there fell a ſhowre of great ſtones vpon the troupe, wherewith Don Pedro de Medicis (who would needs be preſent) was ouerthrowne and halfe ſlaine; Callonge, Mont-terault, La Tour, Dauanes, and Deltour had taken vpon them the charge of the Petard, euerie one carrying a part, to put it ſpeedily in execution.

The Turks come from their gallies to charge the Chriſtians.

Whileſt they were thus buſied to force the Port, the Sergeant Maior came vnto the Earle of Candale and told him, that there was a troupe of three hundred muſkitiers come to charge him: theſe were two Beyes which came out of the gallies with their troups, by reaſon of the bad guard which the two companies that Montano had left to hinder their landing, had F kept. The Earle of Candale had left part of his troupe with the Petard, and turned head with the reſt againſt theſe Beyes to charge them: but they had no meaning to fight, but onely to make a ſhew, and ſeeing they ſhould be forced if they ſtaied longer, they tooke their way towards the mountaine, and in their retreat made many ſhot. The Chriſtians purſued them not, holding it fitter to returne to the Petard, the which plaied ſo happily, as it made a breach capable for three men to enter in front.

The Turkes retire to their towers and wals.

The cōmiſſary of the Knights of S.Stephen ſlaine.

The ſquadron of the knights of S.Stephen, commanded by the Commiſſarie Lenzoni, and the companie of the gallies of S. Mary Magdalen, with two ladders were to aſſault the high tower. The companie of the Admirall gallie with one ladder, had charge to force the port of the retreat; and the companie of the gally of S.Iean was to fight with the gallies and veſſels in the hauen: all theſe troupes (being led by the Generall Montano, and by Captaine Alexander of Tarentum, Sargeant Major) marched in order towards the fort. But the Petard hauing effected as we haue ſaid, the Earle of Candale entered firſt with all his troup, and ſuddenly ran vnto the port of the retreat, there to apply a petard, the which alſo very fortunatly made a breach. The Turkes amazed at the noiſe and forcing of their gates, fled vnto their walls; ſome retiring into their towers, and others into the barricadoes which they had made in the ſtreet. At the ſame inſtant they planted two ladders on the lower part of the towne ſomewhat neere adjoyning to the ſea, whereof one was broken with the loſſe of them that were vpon it: by the other (notwithſtanding that the Turks horſemen charged them behind) a good number of Chriſtians got vp to the wals, making their way by their armes, whileſt that the reſt put the Turks to rout: hauing taken their Cornet, they forced the reſt for to flie vnto the mountaines. The ſquadron of Knights with the companie of the gallie of Saint Marie, hauing had a longer way to march, came not to the tower vpon the hill, vntill that after the petards had wrought their effects: ſo as the Turkes being retired thither, they found very great reſiſtance, beſides the attempts of the enemies horſe which charged them behind; thrice they planted their ladders againſt the wall, and could not make them hold. Wherefore the Commiſſarie Lanzoni, hauing performed as much as a braue and reſolute man could doe in that extremitie, reſolued to leaue that place, and go vnto ſome other where he might be more neceſſarie: but being the laſt to make the retreat, he was ſhot through with two musket bullets, and ſuddenly ſlaine. The companie of the gallie of S.Iohn, vanquiſhed the two gallies in the port, whereof Ingbirami the Admirall at ſea went to take poſſeſſion as ſoone as they had giuen him a ſigne, hauing the other two veſſels at libertie.

Agliman ruined.

Within the fort in the towers, and at the barricadoes, the combat was hot and dangerous, the Turkes had deſpaire and the aduantage of the place on their ſides. The Chriſtians thruſt on by their valour and conſtant reſolution, preſt them on all ſides; there was nothing to be ſeene but bloud, wounded or dead men; but much more of the Turks ſide than of the Chriſtians. In the end, after a combat of foure houres, the Turks fainted, ſome were taken, many were ſlaine, and the Chriſtians obtained an abſolute victorie: But as it could not be made without loſſe of their enemies, who made great reſiſtance: ſo there were fiue and fiftie Chriſtians wounded, of which number De Vic a French Gentleman was one, who had a musket ſhot through his thigh, going to charge a troupe of Turks which were retired into a tower: and ſome Gentlemen were ſlain; among the which was yong Boiſſierre, a French man, whoſe valour in this action made them that ſaw him fight ſo generouſly, conceiue a certaine hope, that hee would haue prooued a valiant captaine, if heauen had lent him longer life. The ſorrow for his death was generall; as well among the Italian troups, as among thoſe of his owne Nation. Vernegue and Villandre, two other braue French Gentlemen were alſo ſlaine. The dead and the wounded were carried vnto their gallies: they emptied the Fort of all the artillerie, munition for warre, and victuals; the trophie of fortie Florentines heads was beaten downe, and all the houſes ſet on fire. Agliman beeing thus ruined, they ſhipped their bootie, with three hundred and fiftie Turkiſh ſlaues, hauing freed about two hundred and fortie Chriſtians which were in yrons. The two Turkiſh gallies were drawne out of the Port, and carried away with eight other veſſels. In this triumph as the Admirall Ingbirami bent his courſe towards Ligorne; vpon the way a Turkiſh Caramouſall came into the middeſt of the fleet, as into a toyle: It prepared to defend it ſelfe, the patrons gallie inueſted it, but not without loſſe; for the Turkes made ſo great reſiſtance, as there were aboue fourescore Chriſtians hurt or ſlaine; the Earle of Candale fighting alone at the prow of the gallie, by the permiſſion of the Generall. But this Caromouſall beeing taken, and the Florentine marriners entered, it ſplit and ſunke ſuddenly. The great Dukes gallies encountered ſome other

A ſmaller veſſels, the which they tooke, and afterwards arriued happily at their port.

The twelfth of Auguſt following, Octauio of Arragon Generall of the gallies of Sicilie, by the commandement of the Duke of Oſſunna, Viceroy in that Realme, parted from the hauen of Palermo, with eight gallies well armed and manned, to ſayle into the Leuant. His firſt touch was vpon the Iſland of Cerigo, where he vnderſtood that the Admirall Baſſa of the ſea was gone from Conſtantinople with thirtie gallies, bending his courſe to the Iſland of Negropont, whereas ſixtie others attended him in the hauen; and moreouer, that the gallies of Rhodes prepared to goe and ioyne with him, all which Nauall fleet was to fall vpon Soria, againſt the Turks Rebels.

Notwithſtanding theſe news, Octauio continues his courſe vnto the Iſland of Nicaria, where B he vnderſtood by a Greeke veſſell, that the Turkiſh admirall meant to ſend twelue gallies to Rhodes, to guard certaine veſſels of the fleet, which came from Alexandria by the Channell of Samos. True it is, that of twelue which were together when they parted, two were ſent by the Bey or Captaine which commanded them, into the Iſland of Chio, ſo as there remained but ten together. Octauio reſolued to charge theſe 10, cauſing his fleet to row that day, and almoſt a whole night as ſecretly as they could, along the ſhore of the firme land of Natolia, and at the breake of day he arriued at the cape of Coruo, twentie miles from Chio; from whence he ſent his long boat to diſcouer. But in the meane time hee himſelfe eſpied the ten Turkiſh gallies not far from him; at ſight whereof he ordred his gallies for battell, with ſuch diligence, as at Sun riſing he was about the enemies gallies, and had inueſted them. At his firſt C approch he diſcharged all his ordnance, and then with his Admirall gallie he ioyned with the Turkes gallie which carried the ſtandard; the Spaniards entered, ſlew and maſſacred all that made reſiſtance: the combat began at the prow, from whence they went to the poope, whereas the Bey or Commander of the ten gallies ſtood, whom they forced to yeeld. In the meane time the other gallies of Sicilie charged the Turkes ſo furiouſly, as they tooke fiue, all great veſſels carrying lanthornes; two fled towards the land, hoping to ſaue themſelues, but the Turkes had ſcarce leaſure to leape to land, and to flie into the countrey, abandoning their veſſels to the Spaniards, who purſued them; the other three gallies hauing gotten ſome aduantage eſcaped by flight: ſo ſeuen onely came into the Spaniards power, in the which they had a verie rich bootie, freeing aboue a thouſand Chriſtian ſlaues, which were at the chaine, and D by a ſtrange change of fortune, putting into their places the Turks which had inchained them. Among the moſt remarkable of the priſoners, were the commander of the 10 gallies called Sinan Bey of Grigna in the Iſland of Cyprus; the Bey of Alexandria (ſon to Pial Baſſa, who was defeated in the battell of Lepanto, by Don Iohn of Auſtria) and ſome Raiſe or Captaines, and Patrons of gallies.

They ſet vpon ten Turkiſh gallies.

This Summer the Emperour Matthias being gone to an aſſembly of the States at Presburg in Hungarie, in the meane time Sigiſmund Battori, who had beene prince of Tranſyluania, and ſo great a terror & ſcourge vnto the Turks, as he made Sinan Baſſa, hauing an armie of one hundred and fiftie thouſand men, to flie thrice within ten daies from before him, and would neuer endure the ſight of him, hee hauing but fortie thouſand men in his armie. But afterwards beE ing the author of his owne misfortunes and miſeries, by his inconſtant humours, he came and liued a priuate life at Prague, and there died of an Apoplexie. At the Eſtates of Presburg they conſulted of the fortifying of their Frontier townes, and manning them with good garriſons, knowing the infidelitie of the Turks, and doubting they would not obſerue the truce. But there was ſome queſtion in the aſſembly, touching the admiſſions of Germans into their garriſons: for that the Hungarians maintained they had a decree to the contrarie; and yet they could not defend themſelues without the aſſiſtance of Germanes: but in the end it was concluded, that the Germanes ſhould bee admitted equally with the Hungarians into their garriſons, but all other ſtrange ſouldiers ſhould bee excluded. The Turkes in the meane time had burnt and ſpoyled many villages in Hungarie and Tranſyluania, carried away maF ny Chriſtians captiue, and committed many other actes of hoſtilitie, ſo as all men feared a new warre in Hungarie, but by the prouidence of God it was diuerted. For Sultan Achmat marching toward Tranſyluania with a mightie armie, hearing vpon the way that Bethlem Gabor was acknowledged prince, vnder his protection, hee turned head toward Conſtantinople nople. But rather for the affaires of Aſia, whereas the Rebels of Natolia had ſpoiled and burnt many places; and a certaine Arabian had reuolted againſt him, and vſurped the title of G King, hauing drawne vnto his partie fiftie thouſand Rebels, the which did ouerrun and ſpoile the countrey which yeelded obedience vnto him, threatening his dominions with a greater ruine. Moreouer the Portugals and Spaniards had made many incurſions vpon his places joyning to the Red ſea, and had taken and ſpoyled Aden, a place of importance: ſo as all theſe diſorders haſtened his returne into Thrace, to ſend forces againſt his Turkiſh Rebels, and his Spaniſh enemies. But approching neere vnto the Imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, the Plague was ſo violent, as hee ſtayed at Adrianople vntill the end of this yeare, when as that horrible contagion ceaſed. He then came vnto the city, wheras he made a verie ſtately entrie; before him there marched his ordinarie guard of fiue and twentie or thirtie thouſand H Ianizaries, all the Baſſaes of the Court followed him in verie great pompe, and before him there marched on horſebacke two of his ſonnes, the pillars and hope of his affaires, the eldeſt beeing about ſeuen or eight yeares old. Paſſing before the Moſques, the Taliſmans or Prieſts of his law, made ſacrifices in his preſence for his proſperitie, they ſlew ſheepe and oxen vpon altars erected for that purpoſe, then they cut them in pieces, and gaue them vnto the people.

The Graund Seigniour beeing returned to Conſtantinople after the great Plague, notwithſtanding the Turkes hold a firme opinion of Predeſtination, and that they ſhall not die before their appointed time, and that the time of their death is written in their foreheads; yet apprehending the infection, by the aduice of ſome about him, hee commanded I all the dogges in the Citie of Conſtantinople, to bee tranſported vnto Scutarie in Aſia (a towne antiently called Chriſopolis) and for the due execution thereof, euerie houſholder was to bring in his dogge firſt to the Cadi (which is the Iudge of the place) and to receiue from him a Tuſcarie or ticket for his paſſage, or elſe hee was to pay foure Chequines; by which meanes there were tranſported to the number of fiftie thouſand dogges. The reaſon of his ſending them away, was, for that reading the Acts of his father, hee found that thirtie yeares before, he had ſent away all the dogges for feare of the infection. The Sultan commanded allowance of bread and fleſh to bee carried euerie day to ſuſtaine them, which not ſufficing, the inhabitants were much oppreſſed, and readie to fall into mutinie; but by the aduice of his Muphti, they were at length tranſported from thence to an Iſland that was not inhabited, K ſome ſixteene miles from Conſtantinople, where they all periſhed. Before their ſending away, the Grand Seigniour had propounded to his Muphti, to haue them all ſlaine: who made anſwere, That euerie dogge had a ſoule, and therefore it was not fit to kill them.

All the dogs ſent out of Conſtantinople.

The Turkes are wonderfull glad when they winne any one to their Religion, and ſeeke by all meanes to ſeduce men either by force or by faire perſuaſion; whereof you may ſee an aſſured proofe, by a Iew, who beeing turned Turke, ſoone after buying of grapes of another Turke, fell at variance with him about the weighing of his grapes: from words they fell to blowes, and the Iew-Turke beat the other, which he endured verie patiently to encourage him as it ſeemed in his new Religion. Soone after, another Iew came to the Turke who had L beene beaten, and demanded of him why he had ſuffered himſelfe to be ſo abuſed? Who anſwered, You ſhall beat me as much if you will turne Muſulman, ſo zealous they are to winne Proſolites.

The care of the Turks to win men to their Religion.

This yeare in October, the Turkes obſeruing their feaſts of Bairan (which is our Eaſter) the which they obſerue twiſe a yeare; a Turke hauing drunke wine too freely (the drinking whereof is forbidden amongſt them, although they loue it well, and drinke in priuate) was apprehended, and carried before the Grand Viſier: who ſeeing the fact verified, inflicted this puniſhment vpon him, to haue boiſing lead powred into his mouth and eares, the which was ſpeedily executed.

A ſeuere puniſhment of a drunkard.

Bethlem Gabor as you haue heard was ſeated quietly in the Principalitie of Tranſyl- M uania, the Sultan ſupported him, and had ſent Sarder Baſſa with an armie againſt Gabriel Battori who was then in poſſeſſion, but weake both of men, money, and friends, hee was not able to make head againſt them; ſo as beeing abandoned of his friends, and hated of his ſubjects for his tyrannie, he grew into deſpaire and was ſlain by his owne ſouldiers. Whereupon the country yeelding obedience to Gabor, Sarder Baſſa retired out of Tranſyluania with his Turkes. Yet afterwards, ſome neerely allied to Battori (deſiring to reuenge his death) cauſed ſome alterations; and others ſeeking to get the Prouince from the Emperour, had ſurpriſed Huſt and other places in his name. The Sultan hearing this, wrote his letters to the noblemen and States of the Prouince. They were not ignorant he ſaid, that ſince the time that Tranſyluania yeelded obedience to his predeceſſors, and him, they had alwaies liued in peace vnder his protection, and had often deſired and obtained ſuccour againſt their enemies: That when as Botſcay had been annoied by the Germans, aſſiſting him with great forces, he had ſhaked off the yoke: That when as Battori his ſucceſſour had liued after his owne will, they ſent Bethlehem Gabor with complaints to his court by their generall conſent, and did eaſily obtain forces to free the Prouince from tyrannie. He being taken away, now a wiſhed day began to ſhine, the clouds of tribulation beeing all diſperſed: That he had held Bethlem worthy to ſucceed Battori, and to enioy that Prouince. Wherefore he had commanded all the noblemen to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, and to enjoy a wiſhed peace: That Bethlem had ſent to aduertiſe him of the new practiſes of the Germans; wherefore he had giuen charge to the Baſſaes of Temeſwar and Agria, and to the Prince of Valachia to be watchfull to repell all theſe injuries; admoniſhing the noblemen to yeeld ſpeedie obedience to Bethlem: to which end hee had ſent them thoſe letters, that vpon the ſight thereof they might be admoniſhed of their duties; and if the Germans ſhould attempt any thing, they ſhould make reſiſtance vntill the comming of his forces: and following Bethlem in all things, they ſhould acknowledge him for their true and lawfull Prince, and continue conſtant in their fidelitie, leſt they ſhould prouoke his wrath againſt them, and draw vpon themſelues ſome great miſerie: writing much more to the like effect; concluding, That hee had fully purpoſed and reſolued, not to ſpoyle any one village or any fort in Tranſyluania, nor to doe any wrong to any man, nor ſuffer it to be done by any other, but would defend that Prouince from all oppreſſion. Wherefore he would haue the Emperour aduertiſed, that if he meant to haue the peace inuiolably kept, he ſhould cauſe the ſaid places of Tranſyluania to be preſently reſtored vnto the Prince, or ſignifie his minde vnto him by letters.

The Sultan admoniſheth the Tranſiluanians to obey Bethlem

Of theſe Rebels of Aſia, whereof wee haue made mention, the Gouernour of Sarepta or Sidon in Syria, called Armill or Emir Facardin, he who gaue enterance into his Port to the Florentines, and receiued them in their courſes to the Leuant; hearing that the Baſſa of Damas, and the Baſſa of the ſea, with the gallies which he brought from Conſtantinople, and the threeſcore which he tooke at Negropont (whereof wee haue made mention) came to fall vpon him with a mightie and fearefull armie, hee left his eldeſt ſonne within Sidon with forces to command there, and in other forts about it, and flying from a furious tempeſt of enemies, he went to ſea with three ſhippes, to retire himſelfe into Europe, with his foure wiues, tenne children, ſeuentie Turkes, and foureteene thouſand pound weight in gold. Hee arriued at Ligorne, and went from thence to Florence, vnder the protection of Coſmo de Medicis great Duke of Tuſcanie, whoſe hands hee kiſſed, preſenting vnto him a Cuttelas verie curiouſly wrought, and enriched with ſtone, and two jewels to the great Ducheſſe, to the value of ſix thouſand crownes. This Turke though he had no faith, yet hee found faith with this Prince of Tuſcanie. Coſmo receiued him, defrayed him and all his traine, furniſhed him with money, whether it were by way of gratification, or that Emir had conſumed his owne: and by all kinde of courteſies made this Infidell ſee what difference there is to flye vnto the protection of a Chriſtian Prince, or to haue recourſe vnto a Mohometane. They ſay that Emir made manie goodly ouertures for the ſettling of the Chriſtians in Aſia: but to attempt it with a good and happie ſucceſſe, it ſhould be neceſſarie that moſt of the Chriſtian Princes would joyne their wils and armes together for the generall good of Chriſtendome. It is true, that the great Duke Ferdinand deceaſed, and Coſmo his ſucceſſour had made proofe of their good intentions, by many generous enterpriſes againſt the Turke. But one Prince alone cannot doe all.

Emir Facardin abandoned Sidon.

The great duke receiues him courteouſly.

Theſe things paſt in the yeare 1613, the end whereof concludes with the fury of terrible tempeſts in the Mediterranean ſea. The tenth of Nouember a fearefull tempeſt full of lightening, thunder, and furious windes, was the cauſe of the loſſe of many gallies and ſhips in

A horrible tempeſt in the Mediterranean ſea the port of Genoa, with a great number of perſons which were miſerably drowned; which loſſe was valued at aboue 800000 crowns. The port of Naples was not free from this ſtorm, and the gallies of Malta, with a great number of other veſſels receiued great loſſe. G

The grand Seignior hauing this yeare and the yeare before ſuſtained great loſſe of his gallies and frigots in the Mediterranean ſea, by the gallies of Naples, Malta, and Florence; and in the blacke ſea by the Coſſackes, who had taken two gallies wel manned and richly laden, he now impoſed a great tax vpon all his Chriſtian ſubiects towards the reparation of that loſſe, ſo as hee charged the Armenians to build him nine gallies at their owne coſts, and the Grecians twentie: ſuch is the tyrannie of the Turke, as he ſuffers not the poore Chriſtians to enjoy any thing, but he findes meanes to pull it from them.

A conſpiracie againſt the Viſier Naſſuf.

H The grand Viſier Naſſuf held his credit with the Prince, at whoſe returne from Adrianople, many Ianizaries (to whom the Viſier was verie odious) conſpired to kill him as hee ſhould enter in at the North gate comming from Adrianople, and had placed themſelues there for the effecting of what they had entended: but comming neere vnto the gate, the Sultan (being ignorant of what was entended againſt the Viſier) called for him to ſpeake with him, keeping him by him vntill he was entred into the city, by which means he eſcaped the pretended practiſe. Soone after, Naſſuf inuited the Sultan to a ſumptuous feaſt, and within few daies after the Emperor feaſted the Viſier; who preſuming vpon his great credit, cauſed all the croſſes in the Church of S. Sophia (which is one of the goodlieſt monuments in Conſtantinople) to bee throwne downe, and all the Images to be defaced, the which had ſtood entire euer ſince the Chriſtians gouernment.

The King of Perſias crueltie againſt the Armenians.

I The yeare before, the King of Perſia had put to death 1200 Armenians vpon a falſe ſuggeſtion as if they had intended to reconcile themſelues to the Pope: that king hating the Papiſts, and yet ſuffers diuers Ieſuits to liue in his dominons. The Engliſh Embaſſadors chaplein deſirous to know the reaſon of the Perſians crueltie, conferred with the Patriarke of the Armenians which reſided at Conſtantinople (for there are two Patriarks, whereof the one is vnder the Perſian, and the other at Conſtantinople vnder the Turk) who told him that it was true he had miſerably ſlaine many of their nation by the cunning practiſes of an Armenian, who had counterfeited letters from the Patriarke of Armenia to the Pope, by which the Patriarke with his whole Church of Armenians, made offer to reconcile themſelues to the Church of Rome, and to acknowledge the Pope as their head; intreating the Pope to write to the king of Perſia to giue them leaue to doe it freely: which letters the Pope receiuing, he rewarded the meſſenger bountifully, and returned lettres by him to the King of Perſia, wherby he entreated him to ſuffer the Armenians in his countrey to vſe their conſciences freely. The king of Perſia hauing receiued theſe letters, grew into a great rage, cauſing many of them to bee put to death, ſaying, That if they would be obedient to the Pope, he could expect no ſeruice nor obedience from them: notwithſtanding the Papiſts ſaid that this was done directly by the Patriarke; but the Armenians affirme that it was the practiſe of a counterfeit rogue. Soone after there arriued 3 Embaſſadours at Conſtantinople; the one was a Circaſſian, the ſecond a Georgian (and this was a Biſhop) and the third a Mingrelian, all of them to complaine of the Perſians oppreſſion and crueltie, imploring ſuccours from the graund Seignior for their ſupport. Preſently after them arriued a Perſian Embaſſador, whom the Sultan would not admit to audience, vntill all controuerſies were concluded betwixt himſelfe and the Emperor, which was then in queſtion, the Sultan hauing ſent one Gaſparo (ſometime a ſeruant in the Engliſh Embaſſadors houſe) to treat with the Emperor, by whoſe means at length all matters were reconciled betwixt them. 1614

The fal of Naſſufs fortune.

The yeare 1614 began by the horror of great prodigies, which were ſeene in diuers parts of Hungarie and Sileſia. Ouer the towne of Vienna in Auſtria, the heauens grew ſo red and fearefully darkened, as they feared that either the laſt day was come, or elſe there would follow ſome horrible effuſion of bloud. But all theſe ſignes had no other effect this yeare, than the ruine of the great fortune, and prodigious authoritie of Naſſuf Baſſa, grand Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire, formerly one of the greateſt and moſt fearful rebels which had carried arms in Aſia againſt the ſoueraigne power of their Sultan: but to comprehend more plainely the fall and declining of his fortune, let vs behold him in his beginning and firſt riſing. Hee was the ſonne of a Greeke Prieſt, borne in a little village neere vnto Solonica, and hauing beene taken by the tribute, which the Turkes exact from Chriſtians vpon their miſerable children, M ta-

A taking one of three; hee was carried verie young to Conſtantinople, and there ſold for three chequines or Sultanins (euery one of which is not aboue eight ſhillings ſtarling) to an Eunuch of the Sultans, who nouriſhed him and bred him vp till hee came to the age of twentie yeares, and afterwards ſold him to a Steward of the Sultanaes houſe, to ſerue him in his charge: who finding this ſlaue to haue a ſpirit capable of greater affaires than the houſhold, employed him in the ouerſight of the building of a rich and ſtately Moſque, which the Sultana cauſed to be erected at her charge: In this place hee gaue ſuch proofe of his wit and judgement, to the Sultanaes content, that ſoone after ſhee gaue him the gouernement of her houſhold.

The beginning & progreſſe of Naſſufs fortune

The Sultan had a will to employ him in his ſeruice, and retired him from the Sultanaes
B houſe into his Seraglio, where hee was honoured with the charge of the Capigi Baſſa, or Captaine of the Porters or Vſhers of the Seraglio; from thence hee was aduanced to the dignitie of the Baſſa of Aleppo, and ſoone after hee was made Gouernour generall of Me-ſopotamia. The commoditie of his gouernment (frontiring vpon Perſia) ſtirred vp his ambitious thoughts, and his diſordinate deſire to become ſoueraigne of that Countrey, and made him to entertaine manie practiſes with the King of Perſia, an antient enemie to his maſter. The report of his practiſes came to Conſtantinople: the Sultan is aduertiſed, hee knowes the ambitious and ſtirring ſpirit of this Naſſuf, and findes that hee is verie profitable for his ſeruice, if hee can by any milde courſe withdraw him from his diſloyalties and intelligences with the Perſian: wherefore hee diſſembled the knowledge of his treacherous C deſignes, and to gaine him the more powerfully, he gorged his ambitious appetite with the greateſt dignitie of his Empire. After the death of Murath Baſſa, he honoured him with the place of Graund Viſier, and gaue him all his goods, and in his place made him Generall of the armie againſt the Perſian, with promiſe to giue him his daughter in marriage. Thus was Naſſuf aduanced by his dexteritie, wit, diligence, and trecherie, to the greateſt charges of the greateſt Empire of the World.

He is made gouerner of Meſopotamia.

Naſſuf made grand Viſier and Generall of the armie.

He entered into Perſia, as Lieutenant Generall of his maſters armie, with the which hee made ſo great a ſpoyle, as hee forced Ka Abbas King of Perſia now raigning, to demand a peace; and after that hee had granted him a ſurceaſe of armes, hee brought his Embaſſador to Conſtantinople, to conclude this peace to his maſters benefit, as we haue formerly obſer-D ued. Hee enters in pompe, preſents a million of gold vnto his Emperour, is well receiued at the Seraglio, much made of by the Baſſaes, but more by the Sultan, who cauſed him to marry his daughter. Fortune hauing thus aduanced him to the height of greatneſſe, not being poſſible to climbe higher, ſhee ouerthrowes him, and doth precipitate him to the loweſt degrees of miſerie. The Sultan feares his ſpirit, too headſtrong by reaſon of his ambition; hee growes jealous of his actions, and about the end of the yere concludes his ruine and death. The commandement is giuen to Boſtangi Baſſa, that is to ſay, the Sultans chiefe gardiner, and ouerſeer of his Seraglio, and all his houſes, one of the goodlieſt dignities of the court. Naſſuf was at that time ſicke in his houſe; Boſtangi goes thither to viſit him, and to cauſe him to be ſtrangled, being accompanied onely with 7 or 8 men; for that he would not giue any ſuſpition of the com-E mandement he had receiued from his maſter. Being come vnto his lodging, he demanded to ſpeake with him, and Naſſuf excuſed himſelfe by his ſeruants, by reaſon of the diſcommoditie of his health: but the Boſtangi (who would needs execute his commiſſion) replied, that hee could not returne to the Sultan (who had ſent him to haue certain newes of his health) before he had ſeen him, to be the better aſſured. At this reply Naſſuf grew diſtruſtful, & would without all doubt haue been far from thence in ſome place of Meſopotamia; but beleeuing whatſoeuer happened to him was ineuitable, he commanded them to ſuffer the Boſtangi to enter;
who at his firſt approch entertained him with many complements of courteſie; and hauing demanded ſome queſtions of him touching his health, he drew out of his pocket a commandment from the Sultan to Naſſuf, to deliuer vnto him the ſeales of the empire: the which being F preſently don, he drew out another commandement vnto him, by the which he was inioyned to ſend him his head: then Naſſuf cryed out aloud, and deſired to ſpeake with the Sultan; but the Boſtangi anſwered, that he had no commiſſion to conduct him to the Seraglio, but to cauſe his life to be taken away preſently: vpon this refuſall, he intreats him, to giue him leaue to waſh himſelfe in the next chamber, to the end that his ſoule (ſaid he) ſhould not depart this world in the eſtate of pollution, according to the Turkes beleefe, who hold the waſhing of the bodie for a true purification. This fauour was alſo denied him; he ſaw there was no remedie in his miſerie, nor any hope of grace. Boſtangi Baſſaes followers (which were ſeuen or eight Capigies) beeing come to take away his life, and enuironing his bed, which was an vndoubted ſummons that hee muſt die; in the end he reſolues, and turning himſelfe vnto theſe executioners, hee willed them to doe their duties: whereupon they fell to worke, and caſting themſelues vpon him, they put a cord about his necke, and ſought to ſtrangle him; but ſeeing that the fatneſſe of his repleat bodie would not ſuffer them to take away his life preſently, they cut his throat with a knife. His death could not be diſpleaſing to the Chriſtians, ſeeing that all his deſignes tended to their ruine: he had perſuaded his maſter to breake the peace with the Emperour, the French King, and the Venetians, promiſing him to make him ſoueraigne Monarch of the whole world, to the end he might keep his ſpirit in action, and make himſelfe neceſſarie to his maſter, and liue more ſafely in combuſtions than in a calme; whereas the enuie and malice of his enemies gaue him a thouſand furious aſſaults. Thus Naſſuf Baſſa ended his dayes and fortune; before Gouernour of Meſopotamia, Generall of an Imperiall army, and Grand Viſier of the Turkiſh Empire; aduanced of theſe ſupreme dignities, by the great actions of his mind, but ouerthrown ſhamefully to his ruine by his boundleſſe ambition. Doubtleſſe it is a difficult thing for a fauorite that is inſolently audacious, to continue long in grace with his Prince; eſpecially when his vnreſtrained ambition hath once broken the bounds which reaſon preſcribeth to thoſe that Fortune aduanceth by the fauour of her blaſtes; and that hee followes obſtinately that pernicious curioſitie to know by experience how high Fortune can aduance him: for then the deſire to enjoy that which is aboue his condition, blinding the eyes of reaſon, hee doth precipitate himſelfe by his raſh and inſolent actions, to the loweſt ſteppe of ſhamefull ruine. The riches of Naſſuf were ſo great and proportionable to his fortune, as after his death they found about two buſhels of diamonds and pearles. Doubtleſſe this rich and ſtately ſpoile deſerued to be enioyed by ſome great Prince. So the Emperour Achmat ſeiſed thereon, and applyed it to his Chaſna, or Treaſurie.

Another diſcourſe of Naſſufs death.

This death of Naſſuf is related after another manner by one who was then preſent in Conſtantinople, the which I haue thought good to ſet downe as I haue receiued it from him. The Grand Seignior being much diſcontented with his Viſier; whither incenſed with ſuch as were neere about him, who both hated and feared Naſſuf, or doubting his great power; hee diſſembled his ſpleene, vntill he might finde ſome opportunitie for reuenge: yet it was not ſo ſecretly carried, but Naſſuf had diſcouered the Sultans diſcontent, and laboured by great gifts both to the Sultana and others to pacifie him, prouiding notwithſtanding in the meane time for his owne ſafetie, ſending horſemen dayly ouer into Aſia, meaning to paſſe himſelfe when hee had gathered together a ſufficient ſtrength. But it fell out on the ſeuenth day of October, it beeing the Turkes Sabboth, that the Moone about eight a clocke at night was much eclipſed, which made the Turkes expect ſome great accident. The Grand Seignior hauing formerly cauſed it to be bruited, That he would about that time paſſe to viſit a new Moſque which was then in building; whereupon all the ſtreets were hanged with cloth and arras, and as the cuſtome was, a crie went before, that The King commeth; at the noiſe whereof Naſſuf (beeing then in his houſe) could not but deſcend to ſalute the Sultan as he paſſed by: But it was not the Graund Seignior himſelfe, but his Boſtangi Baſſa, whom he had cauſed to be attired like himſelfe, who being come before Naſſufs dore, and finding him ſtanding there, he ſuddenly leapt vnto him, and told him that the Sultans pleaſure was he ſhould deliuer vp his ſeale: whereat Naſſuf being amazed, demanded what the Sultan meant to doe? to whome the Boſtangi Baſſa replied, That he knew not what the Princes pleaſure was, but if he would not deliuer it, hee would returne with that meſſage vnto him. Whereupon Naſſuf drew the ſeale out of his boſome, and deliuered it. Then the Boſtangi Baſſa ſhewed him a warrant for his head, whereunto he preſently ſubmitted himſelfe, and then two Iamoglans ſtrangled him: his head was preſently cut off, and carried to the Graund Seigniour, and his bodie throwne into the ſtreet to be trampled on.

A It was thought his death was procured by the wiſe of Cicala, Baſſa of Babylon, who had beene manzoled or depoſed from his gouernment there by Naſſuf, and was a little before returned to Conſtantinople, but could not bee allowed by Naſſuf to haue any acceſſe vnto
the Grand Seigniors preſence; whereupon hee wrote a letter vnto the Sultan, wherein hee accuſed Naſſuf to haue conſpired with the Perſian to kill him, charging him with many things that were capitall. This letter he ſent by his wife who was ſiſter to the Grand Seignior; who comming to his ſpeech (although ſhee were watchfully obſerued by Naſſuf who was then preſent) left the letter in his chamber and ſo departed. The Grand Seigniour finding this letter, and reading it, was much incenſed againſt Naſſuf, and neuer quiet in minde vntill he had his head. He writes, that there were found in Naſſufs houſe eightie bags of gold, each bag B containing ten thouſand chequinos. After Naſſufs death Mechmet Baſſa Admirall at ſea (who had married Sultan Achmats eldeſt daughter) was made chiefe Viſier; he was borne in Conſtantinople, and the firſt naturall Turke that was euer Viſier ſince Conſtantinople was wonne.

You haue heard in the laſt yeares relation, of ſome combuſtions which were growing in Tranſyluania, and how the Sultan had written his letters of an imperious ſtile vnto the nobilitie and States of the countrey, which letters were fixed vp in forme of a mandate throughout all Tranſyluania, and in places that were neereſt vnto thoſe Noblemen which held the Emperours partie againſt Bethlem. At the ſame time Bethlem defeated certaine troupes of the garriſons at Lippa and Genoa, which ouerranne and ſpoyled the Countrey, ſo as the Gouernours
C of thoſe places were forced to ſend to Vienna, to demand ſuccours of men and money.
A Chiaus arriued at that time at Lintz, bringing letters vnto the Emperour from the Graund Seigniour; the firſt point contained in them, was, That his Imperiall Maieſtie ſhould haue a care, that the peace made betwixt them for twentie yeares ſhould not be violated; and that for his part hee deſired to obſerue it faithfully. 2. That in the name of his Imperiall Maieſtie they had ſeiſed vpon certaine places in Tranſyluania, a Prouince which had beene alwaies vnder his protection, which receiued her Princes from his hand, and the which he was bound to defend againſt all her enemies. 3. That the tyranny of Prince Battori had conſtrained him to giue forces to Bethlem Gabor to diſpoſſeſſe him of the principalitie of Tranſyluania: That after the death of the ſaid Battori, he had inueſted Bethlem to gouerne it
D in peace. 4. That ſince, he had bin aduertiſed how that ſome troups of ſouldiers in the name of his Imperiall Maieſtie, contrary to the articles of peace, had by force ſeiſed vpon the forts of Huſt and Viuar, and the townes of Nagipan and Tonaſe. 5. That hee had giuen expreſſe charge to Bethlem, not to ſuffer any enterpriſe, no not vpon the leaſt village of his principalitie, to the end that nothing might be ſeparated; but that he ſhould repell the iniurie of the aggreſſor by force. 6. That he exhorted his imperiall maieſtie, if he deſired the continuance of the peace, to command his people to make reſtitution of the places vſurped, or to ſignifie his intention by the ſame Chiaus which he had ſent, to the end hee might be fully aſſured:
for the miſchiefe increaſing daily, the affection which hee bare to the good of peace might grow cold.

Letters from the Sultan to the Emperor.

E The Emperour receiued the Chiaus at Lintz verie honourably, and gaue him an anſwer to his letter wrapt in a piece of cloth of gold: the ſence whereof was, That this buſineſſe being of great importance, his Imperiall Maieſtie deſired to confer with the princes Electors, and States of the Empire to heare their aduice; after which hee would acquaint him with his laſt reſolution: and finally, that he ſhould reſt aſſured, that for his part he would not attempt any thing contrarie to the peace. In the meane time there was a pettie warre in Hungarie, the incurſions and ſpoiles betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turkes beginning againe. The Turkes of the garriſon of Agria going foorth, tooke a great number of cattell from the Chriſtians; eight hundred Haiduckes aduertiſed of this ſpoyle, purſued them ſo ſpeedily as they met them before they came within halfe a league of their retreat, when they made F them to leaue their prize, and put them to flight. The Baſſa of Agria aduertiſed of the defeate of his out-riders, goeth foorth with one thouſand men, to recouer the bootie from the Haiduckes, which they had newly taken from his ſouldiers: But after a ſharpe encounter he loſt his horſe, and two hundred of his men, beeing forced to make his retreat.

The Emperors answer to the Turke.

The Turkes courſes in Hungarie.

From thence the Haiduckes went and ſpoyled the Countrey about Solnoc; ſome others G holding the wayes of Strigonium or Gran, tooke a Turkiſh Bride with her baggage, who was going from Gran to Buda; and foure hundred Boothalers (ſome of them Haiduckes and the reſt Turkes, men which hold no partie but their owne, to rob with the more impunitie) ſeiſed vpon Balaſter, Micolut, and Felac: but at the recouerie of them, they were ſo ill intreated by the Hungarians, as moſt of them loſt their liues there, and the reſt were taken priſoners.

The Eſtates of Bohemia, Auſtria, Stiria, and others.

But the Emperour who deſired to be reſolued in the important buſineſſe of Tranſyluania, aſſembled the Eſtates of Bohemia, Auſtria, Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, Sileſia, Luſatia, Morauia, and Hungarie, his hereditarie Countries; whom hee gaue to vnderſtand, That the peace was violated in Hungarie, by the hoſtilities of the Turkes vpon the Chriſtians; to whoſe H preiudice Sultan Achmat had ſubiected vnto himſelfe the Prouinces of Valachia, Moldauia, and Tranſyluania: this laſt vnder the gouernment of Bethlem Gabor, who had made himſelfe his vaſſale. That the Sultan had ſent word vnto his Imperiall Maieſtie, that hee ſhould not pretend any thing there, to the end this Countrey might be wholly vnited to the Turkes Empire. Whereupon hee earneſtly exhorted the aſſemblie to conſider wiſely: Firſt whether Tranſyluania ſhould be left wholly in the Turkes power: Secondly, why the Sultan would not conſent to the ratification of the Truce: Thirdly, of the meanes to make war, if the neceſſitie of his affaires ſhould force him: Fourthly, to what end the Turke would hinder his Imperiall Maieſtie, that hee ſhould pretend no right to Tranſyluania: Fiftly, that the Turke had ſent him an Embaſſadour, who contrarie to the articles of peace, had not brought I any Preſents: Sixtly, if they ſhould make a new accord with the Turke, to conſider aduiſedly, what aſſurance they might take, ſeeing that he would not conſent vnto the ſixth article of the peace.

The reſolution of the Eſtates.

The deſignes of Bethlem vpon diuers places.

Hee receiues forces from the Turke, and beſiegeth Lippa.

Their opinions were diuers vpon theſe propoſitions; but all ioyntly conſented to maintaine the authoritie of the Imperiall Maieſtie. The Hungarians onely intereſſed in their reſolutions to warre, by reaſon of the ſpoyle of their countrey, as a paſſage for all their troups, they beſought the Emperour, that if hee meant to ſend any forces into Tranſyluania, they might haue commandement to march ſome other way, and not ouer their lands. Bethlem Gabor in the meane time laboured to recouer thoſe places which had beene loſt. Wherefore hee prouided himſelfe to make ſome attempts vpon Lippa, and other places; as at Botene, K Genoë, and Arach. The Gouernors of theſe places gaue aduice vnto Forgatſi Lieutenant Generall to the Emperor in high Hungarie; repreſenting vnto him the eſtate of their garriſon, and the feare they had, that if Bethlem ſhould once get them into his poſſeſſion and power, hee would deliuer them ouer vnto the Turke: That if they would ſend them ſuccours, they would rather endure all extremities, than yeeld them to the enemie. Yet for all this, they make no haſte to ſend them ſuccours: and Sander Baſſa according to the commandement hee had receiued from the Sultan, hauing brought forces to Bethlem, the ſiege of Lippa was reſolued in the Eſtates of Tranſyluania. On the fiue and twentieth of October the cannon beeing drawne out of Veradin to batter the fort; Bethlem went to inueſt it, made his approches, and battered it ſo furiouſly, as hauing made a reaſonable breach, it ſerued L firſt for a paſſage for foure hundred men to eſcape, who left the Gouernour with verie ſmall meanes to defend the place, and without hope of ſuccours from Hungarie; which made him come to a parley, promiſing to yeeld the place, to haue their liues and goods ſaued. The forts of Genoë and Arach, were deliuered by the ſame capitulation. That theſe three places ſhould not be put into the Turkes hands, but ſhould remaine perpetually vnited to the principalitie of Tranſyluania: and to take all intereſt from the Turkes, the Eſtates of the Countrey ſhould pay vnto Sander Baſſa the charges and entertainement of his troups. Theſe places thus gotten by Bethlem, hee manned them with new garriſons: the Imperials which were within them being retired to Forgatſi the Emperours Lieutenant in high Hungarie. But the Eſtates of Tranſyluania beeing aſſembled at Veradin, diſputed diuerſly, M whether they ſhould reſigne theſe three places into the Sultans power: ſome repreſented the diſcontentment he would haue if they were refuſed, and the inconuenience that might enſue: others were not of opinion that the prouince ſhould be ſo diſmembred, giuing the moſt important places thereof vnto Infidels. Thus without conſenting or refuſing the deliuerie of theſe places to the Turke; the Eſtates concluded, that Prince Bethlem ſhould doe therein what hee held moſt neceſſarie for the tranquilitie of the countrey; beſeeching him moſt humbly, to free them from the Imperials, who had ſeiſed vpon Huſt and Viuar. Such were the affaires of Tranſyluania this yeare, a Prouince diſtracted from the Emperours power by the Turkes practiſes.

At Conſtantinople, Sultan Achmat, deſirous to beautifie the outward part of his Serraigle with a goodly and ſpacious place vpon the ſea ſhore, hee cauſed a platforme to be made within the ſea, being eight hundred paces long, and one hundred and twentie broad. The Prouoſt of Conſtantinople cauſed this reſolution to be proclaimed, when as preſently euerie houſe ſent forth a man, and the chiefe of Families themſelues laboured there in perſon. There might you ſee the Baſſaes ſerue as ouerſeers of the workemen, and the Ianizaries and Spahies carrying ſcuttles with a wonderfull alacritie; and at all houres of the day there was muſicke of diuers ſorts of inſtruments, to eaſe their labour, and to encourage them to continue. The Viſiers going to viſit the workemen, cauſed a largeſſe of pieces of ſiluer to be caſt amongſt them. Thus the Sultan beeing ſerued with admirable diligence in this his worke of pleaſure, hee ſaw it finiſhed in three moneths, hauing beene begun in October this yeare.

The Sultan cauſeth a platforme to be made at Conſtantinople

Whileſt that the Sultan imployed his leaſure after this manner, in the ſtructure of a platforme within the ſea of Conſtantinople, certaine religious men parting from Pera, had a deſigne to build another in the waues of Infidelitie; but more profitable for the health of ſoules. This was an imployment of Ieſuites into the countrey of Mingrelia, in old time called Cholcos: Lewis Grangier a Prieſt of this ſocietie, with two others of his Order, and an Armenian for their Interpreter, parted from Thrace with this godly reſolution, to preach vnto the people farre from God, the truth of his holy word, and to guide them happily in the way to heauen. Hee paſſed the Boſphorus of Thrace, and the famous caſtles of Leander and Hero, and cut through thoſe waues, whereas he that could not quench the fire of his paſſion, quenched the flame of his life: he paſſed beyond Pompeyes pillar, or rather that of the moſt happie Daniel Stylita, who erected his towards this mouth of the ſea: and about the ſixth of Iune this ſame yeare they arriued at Verna, a famous towne in Thrace, whereas a companie of French ſouldiers (whom the violence of neceſſitie had ſome yeares ſince forced to leaue the Emperours ſeruice in Hungarie) were in garriſon for the Turke, to defend his ſubiects againſt the incurſions of the Coſſackes: yet theſe Frenchmen doe ſtill obſerue the Catholique Religion inuiolably. From thence hee ſailed towards Cordula, and by the encounter of a little gallion hee entered into the Port of Trabizond. Within few dayes after hee was carried in the ſame veſſell to Eriſſa in the countrey of Laxia or Laſſia, which on the one ſide lookes towards the Countrey of the Georgians, and the other that of Trabizond. The Chriſtian Religion hath beene for a long time planted among thoſe people, but verie ill manured: for the fathers to free their miſerable children from the tribute wherewith the Turkes oppreſſe them, cauſe their children to be circumciſed after the Mahometane manner, and for the ſame conſideration they marrie their daughters vnto Ianizaries. Moreouer they abandon themſelues to the Mahometan impietie, to the end they may be deliuered from their inſupportable oppreſſions, and their Turkiſh yoke. The Ieſuites found there a good ſubiect to worke vpon for the health of ſoules: during their abode there for certaine dayes they catechiſed the men, baptiſed the children, and aduertiſed the women married vnto Turkes, what they were to doe for the maintenance of their faith: But for that their commiſſion or charge was to goe vnto Mingrelia or Cholcos, they went againe to ſea and ſailed towards Gouea, which is the furtheſt corner of the blacke ſea: this hauen beeing verie vnfit to caſt anchor in, they followed the gallies which carried a Baſſa called Oneze from Conſtantinople, who ſhould treat a peace on the behalfe of Sultan Achmat, with the Prince of the Mingrelians, and diſpoſe him to pay a tribute; with theſe veſſels they went into a port called Macrogalo, nine miles from that of Gouea, holding this place more ſafe than the other: but in truth there is little aſſurance whereas the waues and windes command ſoueraigntie. A Northweſt winde riſing about midnight on the fifteenth of September, draue their gallies neere vnto the ſhelfes and rockes, whereas one was broken and caſt away.

away. This tempeſt continued many daies, and during the violence thereof, another gallie was loſt, in the which the Ieſuites had beene, by good aduice they had retired to land during the furie of the ſea and winds. The Ieſuits imputed the cauſe of this loſſe, to the prohibition which Oneze the Baſſa had made vnto them, not to paſſe into Mingrelia before the peace were concluded with the Princes of that countrie; the which grew long, by reaſon of the difficulties which happened in the treatie. In the end thoſe Princes reſoluing to pay the tribute vnto the Turke, it was concluded.

A peace betwixt the Turks and the Georgians.

The ſalutation of the Georgians.

The reception of the Ieſuites by a prince of Aſia.

The libertie of trauell followes peace, Grangier and his companions proceeded in their journey; twentie dayes after their departure from Macrogalo, they arriued at Satrapella, a place of Georgia, whereas the Princes Viſier came to viſit them, and after the Georgian manner ſaluted them, bare headed, and kneeling vpon one knee. Gorell Prince of the Georgians (who was then at Barlet, whereas the court was to paſſe the feaſts of Chriſtenmas) beeing aduertiſed of the arriuall of theſe new Chriſtian and French preachers, ſent for them, receiued them fauourably, and ſaluted them bare headed and kneeling. After that he had made them to bleſſe his court, hee held many diſcourſes with them of the trueth of the Romane Church: and of the Popes power, as the father of all Chriſtendome; beeing mooued partly thereunto by a feeling of pietie to the Church, and partly from the inſtructions hee receiued from theſe Ieſuites, ſo as enlightened with a new beame of the true light, he intreated Grangier to craue abſolution of his ſinnes from the Pope, the which (ſaid hee) hee may giue mee by the power he hath from God; promiſing to ſend him his confeſſion in writing. But vnderſtanding that the Ieſuite had power from the Pope to abſolue him, hee purged his conſcience of all his ſinnes, by a generall confeſſion of his life. Without doubt the zeale of theſe ſoules, ſo far from ſuccor, ſhews plainly what the harueſt would be, if ſo many labourers were ſent as are neceſſarie. A Monke of Georgia, who had liued at Rome for the ſpace of twelue yeares, had in former times planted pietie there: the which they of this miſſion did now alter. This Prince Gorell entreated the Ieſuites, to ſend him ſome of their companie at their returne into Europe, promiſing to make great eſteeme of them, and to giue them a church, a houſe, and all things neceſſarie for their maintenance. The prince offered them ſiluer, which they refuſed, modeſtly excuſing themſelues vpon the rules of their inſtitution, which forbids them to receiue any temporall recompence for the adminiſtration of holy things. Thus they parted from this prince, who commended much their manner of liuing, and cauſed them to be conducted to Satrapella, to continue on their journey into Mingrelia.

The third of Februarie in the yeare 1615, they parted from this towne with the Turkes who came to conclude the peace, and paſſing by the bankes of Faſſo (a Riuer which doth water the Countrey of Cholchos, now called Mingrelia) they arriued at Herailcaho, otherwiſe called Heraclia, and from thence to Margoula, whereas the Prince of the Mingrelians (called Dodran) then remained, being buſie in the reception of Threbis Cham king of Georgia, who was come thither to viſit him, beeing expelled his Countrey by the King of Perſia. The Ieſuites were brought to kiſſe the hands of Prince Dodran, and of Lipartia his Vncle, who was Regent of the Realme during his minoritie. They both promiſed them aſſiſtance in their affaires, ſending them to the towne of Macaurie, to make their abode there whileſt they were buſied in the affaires of their Countrey, the which at that time were ſomewhat confuſed. The Biſhop of that place entertained them with great demonſtration of loue, and ſoone after, making a feaſt to Threbis Cham, or Prince of the Georgians, hee would needs haue the Ieſuites aſſiſt at this banquet, for a great teſtimonie of his loue. It is the manner of thoſe of Cholchos or the Mingrelians, as wel as the Georgians, to ſing at their meat. The Threbis Cham deſired, that the Ieſuites might ſing ſome note when it came to their turne, whereof they excuſed themſelues diuers times: But there was no remedie, they muſt doe as others haue done: whereupon they ſung the hymne of Plange lingua, &c. appointed for Holie Thurſday. Beeing thus fauourably entertained in Mingrelia, they make their reſidence at Mocaury, with hope to labour profitably for the health of ſoules, which erre in that countrey through the darkeneſſe of ignorance, for want of men to teach them the way of truth. They are Chriſtians of the Greeke profeſſion, vnder the commandement of diuers Princes, alwaies in warre either againſt the Turke or the Perſian: They carrie the name of Cham, which is as much to ſay, as King or ſoueraigne Prince: The Sophie had diſpoſſeſt Threbis Cham chiefe King of Georgia of all his countries, in the yeare 1613, who had retyred himſelfe into Mingrelia, as you haue heard.

Whileſt thoſe men labour to ſow the ſeeds of true doctrine of the Apoſtles in the ſoyle of Mahometiſme, a Turke paſſing out of Aſia, comes into Chriſtendome to ſeeke the light of truth, and demands fauourable aſſiſtance and ſuccours from Chriſtian Princes, to enter into the poſſeſſion of the Empire, whereunto his birth and the degrees of a lawfull ſucceſſion ſeemed to call him by a juſt title. The diſcourſe of his birth, of his fortunes, and of his pretenſions to the Turkiſh Empire, is comprehended in this following relation. Hee tearmed himſelfe the ſonne of Mahomet the third, father to Achmat, now ſitting in the Imperiall Throne at Conſtantinople; hee maintained, that his father by foure wiues or concubines had had foure ſonnes; that is to ſay, Muſtapha who was ſtrangled, for that he would haue diſpoſſeſſed his father of his Kingdome; Iacaia (which was himſelfe) Achmat now raigning, and Oſman: yet it ſeemes by the ſequell of the Hiſtorie, that he had another Muſtapha: that hauing beene ſent for to come out of Magneſia to Conſtantinople, his mother (who had beene a Chriſtian, and baptiſed vnder the name of Hellen, but was afterward ingaged in the companie of Mahomet the third, for the worth of her beautie, and knowne in the Turkie by the name of the Sultana Lalpare) could not conduct him to his father, for that he was dangerouſly ſicke of the ſmall pockes. And this Princeſſe deſired much, to finde ſome fauourable occaſion, whereby ſhee might be freed from the damnable errours of Mahomets law, and returne to the wholeſome way of the Chriſtian faith, and retire her ſonne Iacaia farre from the power of thoſe bloudie lawes, which ſprinckle the Imperiall Scepter of him that comes vnto the Crowne with the bloud of his brethren; ſhee well foreſaw that Iacaia beeing but the ſecond of Mahomets ſonnes, ſhould one day by his death ſecure the life of Muſtapha his elder, and that the onely means to preſerue him, was to retire him into Chriſtendome. Wherfore ſhe laboured ſeriouſly in this deſigne, and made vſe of a fauourable fiction; giuing it out, that her ſonne Iacaia was dead of the ſmall pockes; and hauing ſuppoſed in his place the ſon of an Eunuch dead of the ſame diſeaſe aſſiſted at his funerall, and by her conſtrained teares ſubtilly diſguiſed her deſigne. An Eunuch called Aſtam Mehemet was the faithfull ſecretarie of her enterpriſe; with him ſhee leaues Magneſia, a Prouince in Aſia, and vnder pretext to goe vnto certaine Bathes there by, ſhee gets her downe to the ſea ſide, paſſes into Europe, and tranſports her ſonne into Morea, ſometimes called Helleſpont, and lodgeth him (as vnknowne) in the Biſhops pallace in the towne of Miclo. Iacaia was aboue nine yeares old; ſhe held him not ſecure at Miclo, but tranſported him into Macedonia, vnder the habite of a Greeke Monke; and retires him into the towne of Caſſandria; where ſhee diſcouers vnto the Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica, a man learned and of a holy life, the qualitie of her ſonne, and the deſire ſhee had to make him a Chriſtian: intreating him in charitie to take them both into his protection. This Archbiſhop lodgeth the mother in the Monaſterie of religious women of our Ladie of Theſſalonica, and giues the cuſtodie of the ſonne vnto an Abbot of Saint Michael, a man learned in all the ſciences, vnder whome hee profited wonderfully, as well in the Greeke tongue as in many goodly arts. I doe wel know this to be true, for that I haue conuerſed with him for the ſpace of ſix months, and haue ſeene him often in the companie of learned men ſpeake the Greeke, with as great facilitie as his Turkiſh and mother tongue. Hee continued in this Monaſterie, vnder the care and gouernment of this learned Abbot, vntill the age of ſeuenteen yeares; that is to ſay, for the ſpace of eight whole yeares; during which time, his mothers teares, the holy inſtructions of the Abbot (but rather the Diuine fauour) made him to enter into the way of his ſoules health, and become a Chriſtian. The Archbiſhop of Theſſalonica cleanſed his ſoule from the pollutions of the Law of Mahomet, and baptiſed him in the Church of Saint Anaſtaſius, without the citie of Theſſalonica; yet ſecretly, for feare leaſt the Eunuch comming to diſcouer this miſterie, ſhould a bandon him, and publiſh abroad the place and eſtate of his ſolitarie aboad, and ſo be miſerably taken. Thus Iacaia calling himſelfe Sultan, being alreadie in ſome aſſurance of the Crowne of Heauen by the promiſes of holy baptiſme, whileſt that hee was in the beginning of his pretenſions to that of the Turkiſh Empire, he leaues the Monaſterie where he had beene inſtructed; and in the companie of the Eunuch trauels vp and and downe Greece, paſſing away (in the length and varietie of his voyage) the impatiencie of his age and deſires; and for that hee would not be knowne, hee takes vpon him the habite G and the licenſe of a Deruis or religious Turke. But when he came to the citie of Siopia, hee vnderſtood the newes of the death of the Emperour Mahomet the third, his father, and the rejoycing for the new aduancement of Sultan Achmat to the Empire; learning at the ſame inſtant, that Muſtapha his elder brother had beene ſtrangled by the commandement of his father. The diſpleaſure which hee conceiued for that hee had not beene bred vp at Conſtantinople with the reſt, to receiue ſo rich a crowne as that of the Turkiſh Empire, made him to wauer in diuers irreſolutions; ſometimes hee would goe into Perſia to the Sophie, to haue ſuccours from him, and with him to make warre againſt his brother: ſometimes hee would ſerue for a ſupport and countenance to the Rebels of Aſia, and juſtifie their H partie. After many diſcourſes with the Eunuch touching his affaires, hee ſends him vnto the ſonne of Peri Baſſa, a Rebell againſt the Emperour Achmat; the Eunuch treats for his Maſter, and receiues for him the Rebels oath; and returning to Tarlis, where the Sultan Iacaia remained, hee conducted him to Peri Baſſa, to bee the head of his troupes. Iacaia arriues and ſees himſelfe obeyed by an armie readie to fight: for the Deſtarden or treaſurer being ſent againſt the Rebell Peri by the Grand Seignior with ſeuen thouſand horſe and three thouſand foot, was alreadie vpon the bankes of the riuer Bardate readie to giue him battell.

The Baſſaes troupes (beeing leſſe in number of fighting men) went to aſſayle him. There was a ſharpe encounter; but in the end the Deſtarden was victor, and the troupes of Peri Baſſa defeated, and Iacaia beeing wounded in foure places of his bodie, was forced to ſaue himſelfe on the other ſide of the riuer, where wandring vp and downe the fields, he found I reliefe with a poore peaſant, and ſoone after with an Abbot there by, who entertained him, and cauſed him to bee cured, holding him to be one of the Deſtardens Pages, as he himſelfe ſaid.

He ſends to Conſtantinople and corrupted the Viſier.

Iacaia in danger of his life at Craconia.

He retires to Prague to the Emperour.

His wounds beeing cured, Iacaia returnes againe towards Greece, where hee findes his mother, conferres with her, and ſoone after with the Eunuch, of the eſtate of his affaires; and concludes with both of them, to ſend to Conſtantinople, to the Viſier Deruis (who at that time was diſcontented with the Emperour Achmat) to ſound his diſpoſition, and to ſee if hee might gaine him to his partie: The Eunuch vndertakes the voyage, hee ſpeakes with the Deruis, and findes him diſpoſed to entertaine the offers of Iacaia: The conſpiracie was K concluded, and they ſweare to kill Achmat, and to ſettle Iacaia in the Imperiall throne. Hereupon hee tranſports himſelfe to Conſtantinople in a diſguiſed habite: but when as they were readie to execute their enterpriſe (ſay they) the Deruis dyed; bee it that the Emperour Achmat had diſcouered their deſigne, or otherwiſe. Thus Iacaia beeing fruſtrate of his hope to effect any thing by this meanes, he left the citie and fled towards the blacke ſea, and then wandred into the countries of Valachia, and Moldauia, following the Carock of a Poland Embaſſador on foot, vntill he came vnto the citie of Craccuia, whereas Fortune had layed a ſnare for him, which brought him in danger of his life; for a Chiaus being come from Conſtantinople, and knowing him, he deſired the king of Poland in his maſters name, to ſtay him, aſſuring him that by this meanes, hee ſhould ſtricktly bind vnto him the affections of Sultan L Achmat: the King refuſed his vniuſt demand, holding himſelfe much honoured to ſee his Court the refuge of vnfortunate Princes. After this refuſall the Chiaus flies to trecherie; hee corrupts certaine Tartarians of the Kings guard with money, who promiſed to murther Iacaia; and doubtleſſe they had performed it, if a Flemiſh embroitherer had not aduertiſed him, and lent him his lodging for certaine dayes to hide himſelfe; after which he freed himſelfe from danger, and paſt to Prague towards the Emperour Rodulphus who was then liuing.

He comes to Florence to the great Duke of Tuſcanie.

In this Imperiall Court hee found reliefe, and meanes to eaſe his forepaſt miſeries: The Emperour furniſhed him with all things neceſſarie: Hee ſpent a whole yeare there, and was acknowledged during his abode, by many Turkes which came to Prague, for brother to M their Emperour Achmat. There wanted nothing but ſuccours to effect his deſignes: But hee findes nothing but faire words and good wiſhes at Prague; ſo as hee was forced to ſeeke the effects elſewhere. Certaine Saxons that were his friends, aduiſed him to paſſe to Florence to Ferdinand the great Duke of Tuſcanie: hee takes directions from that Princes

Embaſſadour

A Embaſſador reſiding at Prague, and goes on his journie: but entering into Italie, he heares that Ferdinand was dead; theſe mournfull newes made him to reſolue to ſeeke ſome other place, if Coſmo ſucceſſor to Ferdinand, and the great Ducheſſe his mother, had not called him backe. He came then to Florence, where he was honourably entertained, and lodged for the ſafetie of his perſon in the fort of S. Iohn, where he was ſupplied with all ſorts of commodities. The great Duke Coſmo gaue him the title of Excellencie, appointed him horſes and caroches, and ſuch companie as he delighted in, for the pleaſure of hunting. He had not ſtaid long at Florence, but he ſaw himſelfe aſſiſted with ſuch forces as he deſired. The great Duke Coſmo cauſed his gallions to be armed, ſending them into the Leuant, vnder the command of the knight Beauregard, where hee had conference with Naſſuf Baſſa, at that time chiefe of the Rebels of B Aſia. He offers him men, armes, and money, if he would come to land and march towards Perſia, whither many Rebels were retired. But he who commanded the Florentine gallions, had no commiſſion to leaue him in the hands of Naſſuf: wherefore he carried him backe to Florence to his Highneſſe.

He maketh a voyage into the Leuant in the dukes gallions.

During the time that Iacaia was aboord the gallions, the great Duke ſent diuers perſons into many parts of the Leuant, to informe themſelues carefully of theſe things which he had deliuered, not onely touching his owne perſon, but alſo of his mother, and they all brought backe certaine proofes of the truth of his diſcourſes. This gaue the great Duke ſubiect to impart this faire occaſion vnto Spaine, to labour for the common good of Chriſtendome: He wrote vnto the Catholique King, and enformed him of the qualitie of Iacaia, to the end C that contributing ſuccours to his perſonage, they might vndertake ſome happie enterpriſe againſt the Turke. The King of Spaine was content hee ſhould be ſent to Naples: commanding the Viceroy to giue him a reception fit for his qualitie. Iacaia went on his iourney, beeing accompanied by ſome, by the great Dukes commandement: but according to the newes which hee receiued from Naples, hee ſtayed at Auerſo, where hee was receiued by the Gouernour with much honour. The Viceroy came to viſite him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie. But as the counſell of Spaine was tedious in their reſolutions, and delayed too long (as Iacaia ſuppoſed) the ſuccours which hee expected, he parted from Auerſo to goe to Millan, and from thence in a diſguiſed habit paſt againe into the Leuant, to ſound their willes that might aduance his pretentions, and bring them to D a happie end: but he preuailed as little as he had done before. Beſides all theſe voyages which we haue deſcribed, to the end he might leaue no meanes vnattempted to aduance his affaires, he went to Rome to kiſſe his Holineſſe feet. Cardinall Belarmine receiued him, gaue him the right hand, and the title of Excellencie: the Pope aſſured him of his affection and ſuccours; but it was neceſſarie the ſecular powers ſhould begin to leuie men, and make the firſt ouerture to warre.

Iacaia goes to Naples and Millan.

He comes to Rome.

Since, we haue ſeene him in France, and at Paris, vnder the protection of the Duke of Neuers, entertained by the bountie of this prince, and aſſiſted by his councell: and doubtleſſe if the troubleſome combuſtions of a ciuill war had not directed the armies of this duke, we had ſeene ſom happy ſucceſſe of the affaires which he treated in Loraine, Germanie, and other E places, to the ruine of the Turks, and the good of Chriſtendome. Finally, as for this Turke called Iacaia, terming himſelfe eldeſt brother to the Emperor Achmat now raigning at Conſtantinople, and for ſuch acknowledged by many: yet ſome affirme (yea ſuch as haue conuerſed in the Eaſt) that Sultan Mahomet had but three ſonnes, which were Muſtapha, Achmat, and Oſman: Notwithſtanding it is hard to diſcouer in this perſonage any ſignes of an impoſture; I haue often frequented with him, and carefully obſerued his carriage and actions: and haue alwaies noted in him a carriage and minde borne to great matters. This is all that we could learne of this man.

Stephano or Tomſho, of whom we haue made mention in the yere 1612, hauing ouerthrown Conſtantine the lawfull prince, and made himſelfe Vayuod of Moldauia by the ſupport and F tyrannie of the Turke; as he held it by vſurpation, without any juſt title, ſo he gouerned with all crueltie and inhumanitie, preferring crueltie before clemencie, and imitating that tyrant, who ſaid openly, That he reſpected not the loue of his ſubiects, ſo as they feared him. Euen ſo this Stephano at his firſt enterance plotted how hee might root out all the Noblemen in the Countrey, whom in their language they call Boyers, with all others of credit and authoritie

in the countrey, both for that they ſupported Conſtantine, as for the jealouſie he had of them, being beſt able to reſiſt his tyrannous deſignes: beeing alſo the common diſpoſition of ſuch as vſurpe any eſtate by wicked practiſes, to be alwaies in feare to be diſpoſeſſed, and to be entreated according to their merits. Hee began firſt with the Lord of Botacan brother to the Princeſſe widow to Ieremie, whom he cauſed with two others of the chiefe noblemen to be miſerably and inhumanely empailed, as if they had been two notable theeues and murderers; and not content herewith, ſoone after, hee cauſed threeſcore and fifteene Boyers to be apprehended, cutting off all their heads, and would not pardon any one, notwithſtanding the great inſtance that was made by their kinsfolkes; charging them with the crime of treaſon, as if they had conſpired againſt his perſon, hauing no proofe at all: but theſe his cruelties did nothing daunt the Boyers, as Stephano had perſuaded himſelfe; but contrariwiſe they were the more incenſed, and many of them tooke armes openly, and had then ſeiſed vpon him, beene reuenged of his cruelties, and ſet their countrey at libertie (which had not beene ruined as it was afterwards) if hee had not beene aſſiſted by the citiſens of Yas; whome hee conjured to ſecond him in this occaſion, promiſing them immunites of all ſubſidies: In regard of which promiſe, theſe poore wretches preferring their priuat profit before their pulique ſafetie, employed themſelues in the ſeruice of this tyrant, and fought valiantly againſt the Boyers, who were come to aſſault him in the citie of Yas; But finding that hee was better aſſiſted than they expected, after ſome light skirmiſh they retired as well as they could, whereof many were taken priſoners, whom the tyrant cauſed to be ſlaine in cold bloud, or empailed to terrifie the reſt.

The noblemen reuolt againſt Stephano.

Prince Alexander called into Moldauia by the Boyers.

The Boyers which eſcaped from this defeat, knowing that there was no hope of mercie in Stephano, who was full of reuenge, nor by conſequence any ſafetie in Moldauia during his gouernment, they reſolued to haue recourſe vnto the princeſſe (widow to Ieremie) who had fled into Polonia when as ſhe receiued newes of the taking of her ſonne Conſtantine. This Princeſſe vnderſtanding from the Boyers of the tyrannous gouernement of Stephano, and that moſt of the Moldauians were reſolued to ſhake off the yoke of his tyrannie, and deſired to haue prince Alexander in his place, remembring the good vſage they had receiued from the deceaſed prince Ieremie his father. Theſe conſiderations, together with a deſire of command vnder her ſonne (who was then but ſixteen yeares old) were ſtrong motiues to perſuade both her and her ſonne to embrace this occaſion, the which they imparted to prince Viſinouiskie ſonne in law to the princeſſe; and to prince Correskie, who at that time aſpired to marrie her yongeſt daughter: Theſe princes not onely allowed of this deſigne, but they offered themſelues willingly to accompanie Prince Alexander into Moldauia, and to take the whole care of his armie. This reſolution beeing taken they preſently emploied all their credit to leuie men, and had within leſſe than two months drawn together ten or twelue thouſand foot and horſe, Polonians, Coſſacks and Tranſyluanians: whereof the Vayuod Stephano being aduertiſed, he preſently leuied what forces he could, of Moldauians, Tartarians and Valachians, hauing drawne together an armie of almoſt 20000 men, which hee kept about Yas, and there reſolued to attend the princes of Polonia.

The fort of Cochina yeelded vnto prince Alexander.

Prince Alexander beeing aduanced with his armie within two leagues of Caminithe in Podolia, hee was much troubled to paſſe the riuer of Nieſtre, which diuides that Countrey from Moldauia, fearing the fort of Cochina, in the which there was a ſtrong garriſon of Moldauians, and ſtore of munition to defend the paſſage of the ſaid riuer: but it fell out happily for Prince Alexander; for the Captaine which commaunded in the ſaid fort, beeing much diſcontented at the cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, came voluntarily of himſelfe to offer his ſeruice to Alexander, and brought him the keyes of the fort, leauing all to his diſpoſition; ſo as hee paſt his armie eaſily into Moldauia, and in ſigne of joy diſcharged many vollies of his great ordnance, which made Stephano diſtruſt the affections of the Moldauians, and to feele a pricking in his conſcience, which doth neuer abandon tyrants and vſurpers.

1500 Tartarians defeated by the Coſſackes.

Prince Alexander making ſome ſtay with his armie at Cochina in the yeare 1615, aduanced towards Yas, and being come within halfe a daies journey, he ſent forth eight hundred Coſſackes (choſen out of a great number) to diſcouer the countenance of his enemies armie: but they were not farre aduanced, before they encountered 1500 Tartarians, ſent by

Stephano

A Stephano to giue ſome charge to the Polonians. Although the Coſſackes were fewer in number, yet finding the Tartarians in diſorder, they charged them ſo reſolutely as they defeated a great part, and put the reſt to rout. After which exploit they brought word to Prince Alexander, that Stephano's army might be about the number of fifteen thouſand men, but they were ſuch as were gathered vp in the country, and not trained vp to armes, who were rather drawne to it by conſtraint than of their free will, and therefore were not much to be feared. This happy ſucceſſe, together with the report made by the Coſſackes, did greatly encourage Alexanders army, being alſo much incenſed againſt Stephano for certaine letters which he had written to their Prince, full of threats, as if both he and they had been already at his mercie, the which did the more encourage the Polonians, and made them reſolue rather to die fighting, than to B fall into the hands of this cruell tyrant. The ſame day there came certain deputies of the Moldauians to Prince Alexander, without the priuitie of Stephano, to know what his deſigne was, and to intreat him to take pittie of Moldauia, which was threatned with a ſpeedie ruine, if the war continued any longer; to whom the Prince made anſwer, That his intent was not to oppreſſe Moldauia, but to free it from the tyrannie of Stephano; that he had beene inuited by a great number of the Boyers, who had come vnto him into Polonia to that end, and had giuen him aſſurance, that it was the common deſire of the Moldauians. That vpon this confidence he had marched with what forces he could draw together, and that if he did preuaile in his deſignes (as he aſſured himſelfe with their aſſiſtance) he would gouerne them with no leſſe mildneſſe than his father Prince Iermie had done, whoſe ſonne and lawfull ſucceſſor he was. The C deputies returned well ſatisfied with this anſwer, and hauing publiſhed it in diuers places, many Moldauians came and ioyned with the Prince his armie, and aſſiſted him faithfully in this action.

Deputies ſent from the Moldauians to Prince Alexander.

In October Prince Alexander aduancing about three leagues with his armie, hee made a ſtand in a faire Champian where there were good Springs to refreſh them, and in the meane time he called a Councell at warre, to reſolue what courſe he ſhould take, and when he ſhould draw the enemie to fight. In the meane time hee had ſent a troupe of Coſſackes to diſcouer the armie; who brought word that they were ranged in battell, and that they had twenty cannons readie in front, the which did not much amaze Prince Alexander, for that ſome dayes before, the Generall of Stephano's artillerie had ſent to aſſure him, that if hee gaue battell, hee D would annoy his men, as little as hee could, hauing a deſire to ſerue the Prince, and by this means be reuenged of Stephano, who had cauſed his brother in lawes head to be cut off, vpon a falſe ſuſpect which hee had conceiued againſt him beeing innocent. The which ſhould teach Princes, that nothing doth procure them more ſecret enemies than crueltie, and that at one time or other they in whom they moſt relie abandon them when as they leaſt expect it. The Vayuod Stephano meaning to make a ſecond diſcouerie of the Princes armie, ſent 1200 Tartarians, and two or three hundred Moldauians, who being ſeene a far off (for that it was in a plain champaine) the Prince ſent 500 Coſſacks with 400 Polonian lances to encounter them: The Tartarians perceiuing it, made a ſhew at the firſt as if they would retire, to draw them by little and little from their camp; and being about a league off, they made a ſtand, thinking that they E durſt not charge them: but they were ſoone deceiued, for the Polonians fell vpon the Tartarians with ſuch furie, as they ouerthrew them, and ſlew moſt of them, ſo as there eſcaped not aboue fiue or ſix hundred, who retiring to their campe cauſed a great amaſement. The Princes armie was much encouraged by this exploit, and increaſed daily in number, as it is vſuall in ciuill war to follow that partie which hath the firſt aduanced.

The Generall of Stephano's artillerie reſolues to betray him.

A ſecond defeat of Stephano's Tartarians.

Preſently after this execution, the Prince meaning to aduance his armie towards the enemies campe, his foreward was ſtayed by a battalion of one thouſand horſe, who had the night before ſeiſed vpon a narrow paſſage, betwixt a poole and a mariſh, by the which they knew the Polonian armie muſt paſſe: but this obſtacle was ſoone taken away, by the aduice which was giuen by certaine Moldauians, to ſend a companie of horſemen by a way F vnknowne to the enemie, by which meanes they might ſurpriſe them behinde, before they ſhould be diſcouered. The execution of this ſtratagem was giuen to the Coſſacks, who ſpeedily went, being guided by certaine Moldauians; who comming within 50 paces of the enemie vndiſcouered, they charged them, & were ſeconded ſo fitly by the forward, that ſtaid on the other ſide; as of one thouſand horſe there returned not aboue fiftie to their campe, to carrie newes of their bad ſucceſſe.

Prince Alexander hauing happily opened this paſſage, he aduanced with his armie within cannon ſhot of Stephano's campe. Prince Viſnouiskie was of opinion, that they ſhould make a kinde of incloſure with their carts, which might ſerue them as a fort, hauing no place of retreat within ten leagues; the which being diſcouered by Stephano, hee ſhot certaine vollies of cannon through their fort, ſo as there were ſome ſouldiers ſlaine, and ſome hurt: and the Prince anſwered him with the like, but to ſmall effect, for that night ſurpriſed them, neither had they aboue eight ſmall pieces. Prince Viſnouiskie ſpent the night to encourage his ſouldiers, letting them vnderſtand that they had no reaſon to be amaſed, although their enemies were more in number, for that moſt of them were peaſants, neuer trained vp in armes nor ſeene battell; whereof they had had good proofe in many encounters, where they had euer beene victors ouer their enemies, although they were inferiour in number: That they were ſo many teſtimonies and aſſurances that God did fight for them, and would vſe them to puniſh the tyrannies of Stephano, and his cruelties againſt Moldauia. Finally, if they were victors (whereof he doubted not, if they did their duties) there was not any one but ſhould returne loaden with rich ſpoyles and recompences from Prince Alexander. This did ſo encourage the ſouldiers, as they proteſted all with one voice, rather to die than to faile of their duties. Moreouer the Princes gaue the Collonels and Captaines to vnderſtand of the intelligence they had with the Generall of Stephano's artillerie, wherewith they were much comforted.

Prince Viſnouiskie incourageth his ſouldiers.

The diſpoſition of the two armies.

The next day beeing the eleuenth of October, they began to put their armies in battell, during the which there were diuers skirmiſhes, wherein Alexanders partie had ſtill the aduantage; ſo as it ſeemed they were ſo many preſages of good Fortune which ſhould befall them that day. The Princes armie was ordered by Viſnouiskie, to whome Prince Alexander had giuen the charge of Generall, as moſt capable, hauing ſundrie times giuen ſufficient proofes of his ſufficiencie and valour in other battels. This Generall ſeeing Stephano's horſemen diuided into three ſquadrons, and the Tartarians moſt aduanced, hee appointed the Coſſackes to encounter with them: the which was iudiciouſly and diſcreetly done, for they both goe freely to the charge, neither are they couered with any armes, but onely with the skinnes of certaine beaſtes, wherewith they make themſelues to ſeeme as fearefull as they can, obſeruing no order in their fighting, and vſing cries which are fearefull to ſuch as are not accuſtomed vnto them; and beeing once broken, they ſeldome returne againe to the charge. The Polonian Lanciers called in their language Houſſarskie, being about one thouſand and fiue hundred men well armed, made the ſecond battalion of Alexanders armie, led by Prince Coreskie, and were placed on the right hand againſt 3000 Tartarian, Valachian, and Moldauian horſemen. The Hungarian foot beeing about 3000 men were in the middeſt of prince Alexanders armie, with the cannon, vpon a little hill of ſome aduantage; and on the left hand was the reſt of the Chaualrie, who were led by the princes Alexander and Viſnouiskie; and the baggage was a little behinde the foot in the campe where they had lodged the night before.

The battell betwixt prince Alexander and the Vayuod Stephano.

The tyrant Stephano hauing diſpoſed his armie into diuers ſquadrons, began about nine of the clocke in the morning to play with his cannon vpon Alexanders armie, who found that the Generall of the Artillerie had kept his promiſe, for moſt of the bullets flew ouer his men and hurt them not; vpon which confidence hee commaunded the Coſſackes to charge the Tartarians which were aduanced, whom they ſoone defeated. At the ſame inſtant two thouſand light horſe gaue charge to the Hungarian footmen which guarded Stephano's cannon, and in an inſtant cut moſt of them in pieces, and the reſt yeelded themſelues; ſo as Alexander became maſter of his cannon. The tyrant ſeeing his Infanterie in danger to be defeated, and his cannon loſt, cauſed a battalion of three thouſand Valachian and Moldauian horſemen to aduance, who without doubt had recouered the cannon, but the generous Prince Coreskie with his Polonian Launciers charged them ſo furiouſly in the flanke, as that they ſlew almoſt the one halfe of them vpon the place, and put the reſt that remained to rout. Preſently after this followed another ſquadron, the which Coreskie perceiuing, A hee wiſely retired towards his campe, ſeeing his men wearied and tyred with the ſlaughter of their enemies, and not able to maintaine the fight without ſome reſt. Then came Prince Alexander, and Viſnouiskie who was his faithfull guide, with the reſt of his horſemen to encounter this laſt battalion of the enemie, whereunto they went with greater courage, for that they were aſſured the Vayuod Stephano was there preſent; which charge continued for the ſpace of a quarter of an houre, during which time Prince Coreskie had leaſure to take breath, and to gather together what poſſibly hee could of thoſe of his partie, to ſuccour them that were then in fight, who were almoſt tyred, and Prince Alexander farre engaged: But ſeeing theſe vnexpected ſuccours, hee and his men recouered their forces, and their enemies were ſo much amaſed at it, as that all them that remained aliue were put to rout B and fled.

Stephano's army defeated.

But Stephano (being naturally a coward) apprehending blowes, had retired himſelfe to the reſt of his footmen, who had not yet come to fight, making a ſhew that he would rather die with them than flie away; but ſeeing the euent of this laſt charge, and his horſemen all in rout, hee ſoone reſolued to ſaue himſelfe by flight, hauing neuer giuen one ſtroke in this battell. The footmen which remained being about foure thouſand men, ſeeing the ſucceſſe of the battell, yeelded to the mercie of the victors, and cryed out, God ſaue Alexander Vayuod of Moldauia. The day of the victorie Prince Alexander made his entrie into the citie of Yas, hauing the Princes Coreskie and Viſnouiskie on either ſide, after whome followed his whole armie. Entering into the Caſtle hee was there proclaimed Prince and C Vayuod of Moldauia by all the Nobles and Boyers of the Countrey, the which hee would neuer accept vntill that time. The next day Prince Alexander vnderſtanding that a great number of the chiefeſt of the enhabitants of Yas were fled into the mountaines and forreſts to attend the euents of theſe troubles, hee ſent certaine Boyers to inuite them to returne backe againe (with all aſſurance) to their houſes, cauſing part of his armie to diſlodge, and to bee quartered in the Countrey thereabouts; and there were one thouſand and fiue hundred foot, and fiue hundred horſe (vnder the leading of Prince Coreskie) ſent to the Citie of Vaſſelloy, for that Stephano had fled that way, and might returne backe againe into Moldauia. As for the Artillerie, ſome were ſent into Polonia, and ſome were put into the fort of Cochina, the which is as it were the Arſenall of Mol- D dauia.

The flight of Stephano.

Alexander proclaimed prince of Moldauia.

At the ſame time Prince Alexander knowing that it was no leſſe glorie to preſerue than to get, hee called the chiefe Noblemen of his Court to counſell, to reſolue what was fit to doe to maintaine him in his eſtate, which he had newly gotten by the ſword; where it was concluded among other things, that hee ſhould ſpeedily ſend an Embaſſadour to the Graund Seigniour, to let him vnderſtand that hee had neuer any intent to take armes againſt his Maieſtie, nor to withdraw Moldauia from his obedience; but that hee had been ſought vnto beeing in Polonia, and enuited by the Boyers of Moldauia, for the vnſpeakable cruelties of the Vayuod Stephano, who had reſolued to root out the Nobilitie of the ſaid Conntrey, hauing put many of the chiefe to death without any occaſion. They E had alſo charge to giue the Sultan to vnderſtand, That when his Maieſtie aduanced Stephano to be Vayuod of Moldauia, hee had falſely ſuggeſted that hee was ſonne to a prince of Moldauia; that hee was not truely aduertiſed by his Baſſaes and Counſellours, that his predeceſſour had promiſed to the deceaſed father of Prince Alexander, and to prince Simeon his vncle, that after his deceaſe his ſonnes ſhould ſucceed him in the ſaid eſtate, if they ſhewed not themſelues vnworthie, and did pay the yearely tribute of fortie thouſand Chequines, which tribute ſince the death of Ieremie had been offered by prince Conſtantine his eldeſt ſonne, to Houſſine Aga, when as hee was ſent to ſettle the ſaid Stephano: as alſo that Prince Alexander promiſed to pay it hereafter; and if need ſhould be, he would giue prince Bougdan his brother as a ſure and certaine pledge for the performance of his promiſes during F the firſt yeare.

Embaſſadours ſent by Prince Alexander to the Grand Seignior.

The Embaſſadours hauing receiued theſe inſtructions, they tooke their journey ſpeedily to Conſtantinople: But in ſtead of paſſing through Thrace which was their directeſt courſe, they were forced to goe by Tranſyluania, fearing to bee hindered by the men of warre which then troubled all Thrace. Comming to Buda they went to ſalute the Baſſa which commanded there, who beeing a ſpeciall friend to Stephano, put them in priſon, violating the law of Nations obſerued by the moſt barbarous; and afterwards he ſent them to Braille whither the tyrant Stephano had fled. They ſay he gaue 15000 Chequinos in recompence to the Baſſa, and to reuenge himſelfe in ſome ſort of Prince Alexander in the perſons of his Embaſſadours, hee cauſed their heads to be cut off one night after ſupper, and their bodies to be caſt into the Danowe. The death of theſe Embaſſadours were verie preiudiciall to prince Alexander, by means whereof the Grand Seignior was not truly aduertiſed of what had paſt in Moldauia, nor receiued the complements, offers, and ſubmiſſion, of prince Alexander, ſo as hee was wonderfully inſenced againſt him, and ſware his ruine, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

Stephano hauing receiued foure thouſand men from Michna prince of Valachia, and gathered together the reliques of his ſcattered armie, he marched toward Valachia; whereof prince Alexander beeing aduertiſed, hee ſent prince Coreskie with ſix thouſand horſe Polonians and Coſſackes to Ticouch a ſtrong frontier Towne, to guard that paſſage: And prince Alexander and Visnouiskie, they ſtayed at Yas with the reſt of the armie to preſerue the Countrey, and to preuent all alterations in fauour of Stephano, who had ſome intelligencers. Within few dayes after, the prince had newes that the Inhabitants of Horreoua (a Countrey in Moldauia containing about fifteene or ſixteene French leagues in circuit) were in armes, and had ioyned with a great troupe of Tartarians to come and inueſt him, knowing well that prince Coreskie was otherwiſe employed with part of the Polonian armie. Alrxander ſtayed not to haue theſe Rebels come to Yas; but ſent Viſnouiskie his brother in law with ſuch forces as he could draw together to encounter with them. They met together within two leagues of the citie, where Viſnouiskie charged the Tartarians with ſuch furie, as halfe of them were ſlaine vpon the place, and the reſt of them fled: there were a great number of priſoners taken, and all the poore inhabitants of Horreoua were brought vnto Yas in token of triumph. The dead being numbred, there were found about eight *hun*dred Tartarians and others ſlaine, and of the Polonians onely fiftie, and ſome hundred hurt.

The inhabitants of Horreoua defeated, with the Tartarians.

Prince Alexander hauing receiued newes of this defeat, was wonderfully glad, and went preſently to horſebacke with his companie of French, which hee had onely reſerued about him, to goe and meet with Viſnouiskie, and to congratulate his happie victorie. This beeing done with many complements and embracings, hee caſt his eye vpon the poore inhabitants of Horreoua, whome they led like a troupe of ſheepe, and had ſuch commiſeration on them, as he preſently ſent them backe againe, hauing taken their oath of fidelitie, hoping that this his clemencie would draw the moſt factious to obedience, hauing formerly tried the oppreſſions of a moſt cruell prince. Prince Alexander hauing giuen thankes to God for this new and vnexpected victorie, hee ſent a Gentleman vnto prince Coreskie, to aduertiſe him thereof, who at the ſame inſtant was buſie to diſpoſe of his troupes to meet with Stephano, who returned into Moldauia. The encounter was in a plaine Champaine, hauing on the one ſide the riuer of Sirette, the which diuides Moldauia from Valachia: the skirmiſh continued from ten of the clocke vntill it was noone with like aduantage; but prince Coreskie beeing aduertiſed that Stephano was in a ſquadron of horſe which was ſome two hundred paces diſtant from him; he ioyned vnto his troupe foure hundred Gerbeys, who were well armed, and led by a verie valiant Captaine, with the which hee charged him with ſuch violence and furie as he forced them to giue backe, yet fighting in ſuch ſort, as the euent ſeemed to be doubtfull: the which beeing diſcouered by another of the princes Captaines, who led a troupe of fiue hundred light horſe: he came ſo fitly to ſuccour him, as Stephano and his horſemen were forced to flie, whome the prince purſued and cut in pieces. Stephano eſcaped with a troupe which he had reſerued rather for the guard of his perſon than to fight. Prince Coreskie at his returne from the chaſe of his enemies, cauſed the dead to be numbred, where he found that of Stephano's ſide were three thouſand and foure hundred men ſlaine vpon the place, beſides thoſe that were priſoners and wounded; and of his part onely three hundred and fiftie.

Stephano defeated the ſecond time.

A Preſently after this victorie, the ſeaſon of the yeare beeing cold (it beeing the twelfeth of Nouember) prince Coreskie put his troupes into garriſon, and returned with one hundred and fiftie horſe to Yas, where hee was receiued with much honour and ioy. The princeſſe mother to Alexander, was yet in Poland, but being aduertiſed of her ſonnes fortunat ſucceſſe, ſhe returned to Yas, and brought with her Prince Bougdan her youngeſt ſonne, with Alexandrina her daughter, who was yet to marrie. At whoſe arriuall there was great feaſting and ioy; then they began to treat of a marriage betwixt prince Coreskie and the princeſſe Alexandrina; the which had beene then conſummated, if Bellona had not oppoſed it, ſtirring vp new and more powerfull armies than the precedent, to exerciſe the vertues and valours of the ſaid princes, and to trie the patience of the two louers, who loued one another reciprocally from B their youth.

A falſe alarme giuen to Alexander.

To continue the deduction of new affaires which troubled the quiet of the ſaid princes more than euer, you muſt vnderſtand that about the end of Nouember this yeare 1615 they were aduertiſed that Michna prince of Valachia with a Baſſa called Hebraim, came againſt them with an armie of fortie thouſand men, Turkes, Tartarians, and Valachians, to ſuccour the Vayuod Stephano: and moreouer, that Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania, had charge from the Graund Seigniour to arme againſt them, and to aſſaile them; which in effect was a falſe alarme; for the ſaid Baſſa had beene ſent by the Graund Seigniour to bring Caphtanes (which are robes of cloth of gold which the Graund Seigniour doth vſually ſend in fauour to princes that are vnder his power) both to Michna and Stephano, who hee held C to be in peaceable poſſeſſion of Moldauia; but not with any armie, nor with an intent to make warre againſt the ſaid princes; for hee was yet ignorant what had paſſed againſt Stephano. Notwithſtanding the princes holding this aduertiſement to be true, aſſembled a Councell of the chiefe Noblemen in Court, where it was reſolued, That an Embaſſadour ſhould bee ſpeedily ſent to prince Michna, both to know his intent, and to diſcouer whether he marched toward Moldauia, and with what forces. This charge was giuen vnto a braue Gentleman of Polonia called Boyartſtkie, who parted preſently from Yas, and beeing entered into Valachia, hee vnderſtood that prince Michna was then in his towne of Bonza, ſome twentie French leagues diſtant from the frontiers of Moldauia. The Embaſſadour beeing arriued demanded audience before Michna, by whom he was ſent vnto the Baſſa, who at his firſt D enterance (without hearing the ſubiect of his Embaſſage) demanded, who had made his maſter Alexander ſo bold, as to carrie armes in the Countrey of the Grand Seigniour without his authoritie; for the which hee ſhould be puniſhed, and thoſe that did aſſiſt him: commanding the Embaſſador preſently to be put in yrons, as if he had beene a theefe or ſome miſerable caitiſe. The Embaſſadors ſeruants ſeeing how they entreated their maſter, eſcaped as they could, fearing the like; who returning to Yas, enformed prince Alexander what had paſſed, aſſuring him that Michna had no armie readie, nor any intent to enter into Moldauia at that time. The Baſſa diſdaining to ſpeake any more to the ſaid Embaſſadour, he gaue charge to ſome of his officers to examine him particularly of all matters concerning Alexander, and what forces hee had: And within few daies after hee returned to Conſtantinople, leading the E ſaid Embaſſadour thither with him. But as ſoone as they were arriued, they ſent the Embaſſadour vnto the Diuano, where hee was againe examined by a Viſier, and in the end hee was condemned by him to the gallies there to remaine perpetually. So little acaccompt doe theſe barbarous people make, to violate the Law of Nations, eſpecially with Chriſtians, preſuming that all the World ſhould bow vnto them, as if they were Gods vpon earth.

An embaſſador from prince Alexander to prince Michna

Alexanders embaſſador put in priſon by the Baſſa.

Prince Alexander ſends an Embaſſador to Bethlem Gabor.

There was another Embaſſadour ſent by prince Alexander vnto Bethlem Gabor who was prince of Tranſyluania, beeing at Fureuar or Alba Iulia, whome hee receiued verie courteouſly; to whome the Embaſſadour deliuered the ſubiect of his charge. That prince Alexander his maſter had beene aduertiſed that hee made ſome leuie of men to ioyne F with Michna prince of Valachia, and to make warre againſt him; the which hee could not eaſily beleeue, for that hee had made profeſſion of friendſhip to his deceaſed father, and had no cauſe now to leaue it; entreating and coniuring him, not to meddle in the affaires which hee had to decide with Michna; and that in requitall (if any occaſion ſion were offered to ſerue him) hee would employ all his meanes. The Embaſſadour hauing ended his ſpeech, hee deliuered his princes letters of credit: To whome Bethlem Gabor made this anſwere, that hee neuer had any intent to take armes, nor to attempt any thing againſt prince Alexander, whoſe father was his true friend; neither would hee euer giue any cauſe to diſcontinue this loue and friendſhip betwixt them, whereof he would giue good proofe in all occaſions, eſpecially in this ſubiect now in queſtion. The Embaſſadour was much ſatisfied with this anſwere, the which was alſo confirmed by Letters; yet hee afterwards leuied forces againſt prince Alexander, but he would not ioyne with Michna his armie.

To returne to the courſe of our Hiſtorie; preſently after the Baſſa his departure from Cicouch to returne to Conſtantinople, Prince Michna ſent an Embaſſador to Alexander with letters, by the which he excuſed himſelfe for the ill vſage of his Embaſſadour by the Baſſa, proteſting, that he was much grieued, and that it was not with his conſent that he had carried him with him, promiſing him to employ his beſt meanes to mediate his deliuerie. Moreouer, that hee was not ignorant what authoritie and power the Grand Seigniour had ouer him, whome he might not reſiſt, nor by conſequence his Baſſaes; that he had no armie on foot, as he was giuen to vnderſtand, and that his deſigne was not to ſupport the cauſe of the Vayuod Stephano, vnleſſe hee were forced by the commandement of the Graund Seigniour. And whereas he entreated him to deliuer his enemie Stephano into his hands, hee could not doe it, vnleſſe hee ſhould violate the lawes of hoſpitalitie, in betraying his friend who had fled vnto him for ſuccour, and withall hee ſhould incurre the indignation of the Sultan, and bee in danger to be diſpoſſeſſed of his owne eſtate, hauing no ſufficient meanes to maintaine himſelfe againſt ſo great a power. Prince Alexander hauing heard this Embaſſador, and receiued an anſwer from the prince of Tranſyluania, by the aduice of his Councell, diſmiſſed all his footmen, and part of the Coſſackes, retaining onely fiue or ſixe thouſand men with him during the Winter.

Prince Viſnouiskie poyſoned by a Prieſt.

About this time there was one of the moſt curſed and impious acts committed that euer was heard of. Prince Viſnouiskie who was a Proteſtant of the Greeke Church, hauing prepared at Chriſtmas to receiue the Communion after their manner, the Prieſt (who had vſually ſerued him in that deuotion, beeing corrupted with money by his enemies) poyſoned the bread; which the prince hauing receiued, hee ſuddenly fell ſicke, and his torments were ſo violent, as he died the next day. This bred a ſuſpition that he had beene poyſoned; whereupon the Prieſt was apprehended, who preſently confeſſed that hee was guiltie, and had been prouoked by his enemies. As his offence was terrible, beeing committed by a man of that Coat, who had made vſe of ſo reuerent a Sacrament, to poyſon a prince beloued of all men for his rare vertues; ſo his puniſhment was verie ſeuere and long: being bound in a chaire made of copper wire, and a fire made round about him, ſo as hee was heard for twelue houres crying out fearefully for the inſupportable paines which hee endured. Whileſt that prince Alexander and his whole court mourned for this fatall and vnexpected accident, there arriued a ſpie which hee had ſent into Valachia, to obſerue the actions of Prince Michna, who gaue him to vnderſtand that there was a Baſſa arriued called Skinder, with a great and powerfull armie, and that Stephano was there in like manner, who preſſed them dayly to march into Moldauia; and to begin the warre, hee ſent foure hundred men to ſurpriſe the towne of Berlada, whereas prince Coreskie had left part of his men in garriſon during the Winter: who keeping bad guard, were ſurpriſed, and moſt of them cut in pieces, which ſo puffed vp Stephano with pride, as hee aſſured himſelfe of an eaſie victorie. But prince Alexander hearing of this defeat, hee ſent foure hundred Coſſackes, who made ſuch ſpeed, as within three dayes after they arriued at Berlada a towne not walled, no more than the reſt, where hauing ſet fire in many places, they forced his men to come forth, cutting them in pieces, and the reſt were burnt; ſo as there eſcaped not aboue fiue or ſix to carrie this bad newes vnto their maſter, who was much afflicted.

Skinder Baſſa comes with an armie againſt prince Alexander.

Stephano's men defeated by the Coſſackes.

A defeat of Turkes at Vaſſelloy.

At the ſame inſtant, when as the Coſſackes were ſent vpon this expedition, prince Coretky deſiring to be reuenged for the defeat of his men, tooke two thouſand and fiue hundred choice horſe, and put himſelfe ſpeedily into Vaſſelloy, fearing the garriſon hee had left there

A there would be in like manner ſurpriſed : whereof the Baſſa being aduertiſed, by ſome of the countreymen, he ſent his ſonne (being twelue or thirteene yeares old) and gaue him an old Turke of great experience for his conductor, with ſeuen thouſand men, holding this a good occaſion to get reputation to his ſonne. Prince Coreskie being aduertiſed of his march by ſome Moldauians, and that they ſhould ſurpriſe them early in the morning, knowing that they were of neceſſitie to paſſe a bridge of wood ouer a riuer that runnes by the towne, he diſpoſed his men in ſuch ſort as that the enemie could hardly diſcouer them, ſome of them were lodged within Vaſſelloy, and the reſt were couered with a little mountaine that adioyned vpon the towne : when as ſome of the Turkes had paſſed the bridge, two ſquadrons ſallied from the towne, and charged their foreward ſo furiouſly, as they were in a manner all put to the ſword, B and amongſt them the conductor of the whole troupe, the which was no difficult thing to execute ; for that the Turks who had marched in a manner all night, to arriue early in the morning, were benummed and halfe dead with cold ; the reſt of the Turkes which had not yet paſt, hearing the noyſe of this hot alarme, durſt not aduance, but retired ſpeedily, fearing perchance that the Baſſaes ſonne might be loſt as well as his conductor. Prince Coreskie purſued them vnto a village foure leagues diſtant from Vaſſelloy, killing and taking priſoners all hee found in the way. Among the priſoners there was one who gaue it out that he was neere kinſman vnto the Baſſa, who beeing brought to Prince Alexander, he receiued him verie courteouſly, and gaue him a garment fit for him, hauing beene ſtript of his owne, he alſo gaue him a horſe, and ſent him backe vnto the Baſſa with a good conuoy, to whom he ſent a letter, by the C which hee intreated him not to aduance in fauour of Stephano, promiſing that if the Graund Seignior would ſuffer him to enioy Moldauia quietly, he would be moſt faithfull vnto him afterwards, and pay him the yearely accuſtomed tribute : whereof the Baſſa made no great account ; for he was wonderfully incenſed, both for his ſonnes bad ſucceſſe in this enterpriſe, and for the death of his Turkiſh captaine.

The Baſſaes kinſman taken

Vpon the day of this victorie, prince Alexander ſent fifteene hundred horſe to fortifie prince Coreskie, whereof eight hundred were lodged in a certaine Borough ſix leagues from Ticouth, whereas the Baſſa and Michna were then with their armie ; being about fiue and twentie thouſand men. Theſe eight hundred men neglecting their guards, did nothing but drinke drunke, and moleſt their hoſtes with all kinde of inſolencies, and forcing their wiues D and daughters, which made them take a reſolution to be reuenged, and to that end they called vnto them certaine Boyers out of the countrey, who chuſing their time, cut all their throats when they were aſleepe, and moſt of them drunke.

800 of prince Alexanders men ſlaine by their hoſtes for their inſolecies

About the end of this yeare prince Alexander called a generall councell, whereas the princeſſe his mother, prince Coreskie, and all the chiefe noblemen and captaines aſſiſted, where it was reſolued that they ſhould retire to Cochina, beeing thirtie French leagues off ; for that it was the ſtrongeſt place and the beſt furniſhed of all Moldauia, and withall they ſhould be farre from their enemies, and neere vnto Polonia. According to this reſolution, prince Alexander parted the next day with his whole armie, and came in foure daies march to Cochina, in the extreameſt cold ſeaſon that could be ; hauing lodged his troupes, the princes E ſent diuers Gentlemen to all their friends and confederates to coniure them to come ſpeedily to ſuccour them ; and in the meane time they gaue order to make prouiſion of victuals, and of all other things neceſſarie for their armie. The Baſſa beeing aduertiſed of this retreat, hee marched with Michna and Stephano towards Yas, notwithſtanding the extremitie of the cold, which was ſo violent that many dyed vpon the way ; whereupon they ſtayed vntill the time was more milde.

Prince Alexander retires to Cochina.

In the beginning of March, the lord of Tiſchenich came vnto Prince Alexander with 3500 Coſſackes, and within few dayes after arriued the lord Potoskie, nephew to him who had been taken at the firſt battell, and carried priſoner to Conſtantinople, who brought with him a troupe of fifteene hundred Polonians well armed, there came alſo other ſuccors vnto him, F ſo as by the end of that moneth the princes armie was ten or twelue thouſand ſtrong foot and horſe.

Succours come to prince Alexander.

Prince Alexander hearing of the enemies approch, hee ſent footh 1000 horſe with his companie of French Caualliers to diſcouer the enemies armie, who ſtaying to refreſh themſelues ſelues within halfe a league of the towne of Eſpanocha, whereas Michna his Tartarians were G lodged: they were diſcouered and preſently inueſted by them and by a great number of Turks; and although that there were little hope to reſiſt ſo great a multitude, yet Alexanders men (who had alwayes beene accuſtomed to vanquiſh) behaued themſelues verie valiantly, deſiring rather to die, than to yeeld baſely without giuing proofes of their valour. This fight continued from ten of the clocke in the morning, vntill night; and of the whole troupe there eſcaped but twelue, ſeuen Polonians, and fiue French, the reſt were either ſlaine or taken pri-ſoners, among the which was the captaine of the French companie called Mounteſpin, whom they would haue ſent with the reſt vnto the Grand Seigniors gallies: But Stephano preſerued him vpon promiſe that he would doe him good ſeruice. Heere Fortune (which hath hitherto beene fauourable vnto prince Alexander) began to ſhew her inconſtancie, to teach princes not to runne raſhly into dangers, although they haue had ſome aduantage ouer their H enemies.

Ieſuits at Conſtantinople accuſed.

At Conſtantinople about the end of Auguſt this yeare 1616, Enuie, the moſt furious of all the windes that ſhake the affaires of the World, ſtirred vp a horrible tempeſt, whoſe violent guſts fell dangerouſly vpon the Ieſuites ſettled at Pera by the Sultans permiſſion, at the perſuaſion of Henrie the fourth, the French King; and labours to caſt them vpon the rockes where them might ſuffer ſhipwrecke, ſhamefull to their order, and preiudiciall to the Chriſtians, which liue in the middeſt or Mahometiſme. And to ruine them without all hope of helpe or reliefe, they accuſed them before the Graund Viſier, to bee ſpies to Spaine; to giue abſolution to renegadoes; to baptize Turkes, to conceale fugitiue ſlaues, and to ſend them into Chriſtendome; and withall they obiected the doctrine of killing of kings, if they I were tyrants, the which had been raſhly written by a Spaniard of their Coat: al which crimes are commonly puniſhed at Conſtantinople with death. They ſeiſed vpon their perſons, and lodged them in a dungeon, they were ſix in number, that is to ſay, Francis Bouton, Denis Guilier, Dominick Maurice of Chio, and Iohn Baptiſta Iobert their ſuperiour, all foure Prieſts, and two aſſiſtants, and with them a Franciſcan Frier, Vicar to the Patriarke of Conſtantinople. A ſuſpition of danger in an eſtate is eaſily beleeued vpon the leaſt accident.

In the meane time the Emperours Embaſſadour came to Conſtantinople, to renew the truce; they entered with their drummes beating and their enſignes diſplayed. They which thought to erect trophies to their glorie by their ruine of the Ieſuites, made vſe of this entrie, K and gaue falſe aduertiſements to the Seraglio, that there were in Conſtantinople, and at Pera many thouſands of Chriſtians diſguiſed in the habites of Greekes and Turkes, which came with this Embaſſadour, with an intent to put that in execution which the Ieſuites had proiected. Moreouer, they enformed the Grand Viſier, and the Muphti, that the Churches in Pera, and the Embaſſadours houſes were full of armes; and that now when as the Turkes eſtate, and eſpecially Conſtantinople, was vnprouided of forces, hauing employed their armies in diuers places, and at one inſtant, as in Poland, Perſia, and both the ſeas, that they meant to draw the Greekes into rebellion, and giue an entrie to the Coſſackes, by the blacke ſea. The Sultan and his Baſſaes tooke an alarme, they commanded euerie man to weare the habit of his owne Nation, with a prohibition to weare any hat except the Frankes, and they L to weare a Grecian habit; they alſo enrolled all the Chriſtians in Conſtantinople and Pera.
But the Sultan did not thinke his Citie of Conſtantinople free from the danger of ſurpriſe by this diligent ſearch, but hee would ſeeke his aſſurance in the bloud of Chriſtians: ſo

The Turke commands all the Chriſtians to be ſlaine.

as hee commaunded that all the Frankes ſhould bee ſlaine, without exception. But yet this commaundement tooke no effect, by reaſon of the remonſtrances which the Graund Viſier and the Muphti made him, repreſenting vnto him, that by this crueltie hee ſhould draw vpon his eſtate a dangerous warre from all the Chriſtian princes in generall. But all this freed him not from feare, hee walkes all night on horſebacke vp and downe the ci-tie, contrarie to his cuſtome, and hee cauſeth a Friar, Vicar to the Patriarke, who had been taken with the Ieſuites, to be executed in his preſence; and he doth expreſſely forbid the paſ- M ſage from Conſtantinople to Pera, and from Pera to Conſtantinople. During this prohibition, the French Embaſſador had paſt from Pera to the City, to ſollicite the Ieſuites libertie, At his returne he found the paſſage ſtopt, he goes vnto the Muphti, and leaues his people in
the

A the meane time at the ſea ſide (for it is the cuſtome, to goe to the Soueraigne of Mahomets law with a ſmall traine) during the time of his being there, a multitude of people ran downe to the ſhore, to ſee theſe men, thinking for certaine, that they went to put them to death: They lamenting their miſerable fortune, and the Turkes charging them furiouſly with iniuries, as the men whom they thought practiſed by conſpiracie their ruine. But the grand Viſier hauing written with his owne hand, and ſent one of his people to them that kept the paſſage, the Embaſſador with his whole traine was ſuffered to paſſe to Pera, but hee found the ſtorme as raging at Pera as from whence hee came: for one night after, the people of that place fell into ſuch a furie, as it was to be feared the law of Nations would haue been violated by the inſolencie of ſome furious people, although the ſubject were of ſmall importance. B About fiue hundred paces from the French Embaſſadours quarter, there fell out a diſpute in a lodging, betwixt ſome who ſpent the night in ſome kinde of employment: the Turkes that dwelt neere, beeing awaked with this noyſe, ran to armes, and trouped together in the ſtreet, being in all 1000 men armed, crying out, that this noyſe came from the Franckes, (that is to ſay from the Chriſtians in the Weſt, as Italians, French, Spaniſh, Engliſh, and others) who meant to riſe; and they reſolued to force the Embaſſadours houſes, and to put all to fire and ſword, if ſome better aduiſed of the troupe had not perſuaded them to delay the execution vntill day, the which beeing come, the French Embaſſadour had meanes to get the Sultan to interpoſe his ſoueraigne authoritie, to bridle the inſolencie of a multitude inconſiderately incenſed. Such is the danger, in the which many times the miniſters of Chriſtian Princes find C themſelues, who for their Maſters ſeruice liue at the mercie of a Nation barbarouſly furious, as the Turkiſh:

A tumult at Pera.

The Ieſuites in the meane time continued priſoners in the dungeon, vntill that the Baron of Sanſy Embaſſadour for France, had let the grand Viſier ſee their innocencie, and procured their libertie, and the Sultan by his letters Patents did publiſh the falſhood of the malicious accuſations inuented againſt them: but to auoid the furie of a multitude blind in their paſſions, and dangerous in their furie, they went to ſea to returne to France: but after they had ſojourned ſometime at the Dardanels, they were againe committed to priſon, by reaſon of ſome certaine aduertiſement that was giuen to the Sultan of the ſame ſubſtance: The Sultan informed himſelfe truely of their probitie, gaue them their libertie, calling backe two to D Pera, in liue there, with the ſame priuiledges they formerly had, and ſuffered the reſt to returne into France.

The Ieſuits ſet at libertie.

Alexander prince of Moldauia hauing loſt a thouſand horſe neere vnto Cochina, the laſt yeare as you haue heard, the Baſſa and Stephano were puft vp with this good ſucceſſe; but Michna had no joy of it, who hearing that the Princes attended him at Cochina, with a reſolution to defend themſelues, remembring that a certaine Italian making a profeſſion to foretell future things, had told him, That if he euer came to fight with the Polonians, hee would be in danger of his life. Wherefore by the aduice of his Chancellor and Camp-maſter, called Spaterlecha, he pretended, that he had receiued news from his Lieutenant, that there was a great troupe of Tartarians entred into Valachia, and ſpoiled the countrie; vpon which pretext hee E tooke leaue of the Baſſa and returned, leauing all his ſouldiers in the armie, reſeruing onely an hundred horſe for his guard. Being in Valachia, Stephano wrote vnto him, that he had defeated the Polonians in battell, in the which there were ſlaine ſix thouſand men vpon the place, and had taken a great number of priſoners, which they meant to ſend to the grand Seignior: all which was but a meere inuention to mocke Michna, and to make him ſorrie that he was not in the action: whereupon hee was ſo much diſcontented, as he cauſed the heads of his Chancellour and Camp-maſter to be cut off, for their bad counſell, charging them that they had ſome ſecret intelligence with the Polonians.

Michna feares to fight with the Polonians.

About the end of March, the Baſſa with Stephano, and a Tartarian Prince called Monoza, reſolued to aduance with their whole armie (being twentie thouſand men) towards F Chochina, and beeing within two leagues, they made a ſtand a whole day to refreſh their men. In the meane time the princes put their armie in order of battell, in a little plain within a quarter of a league of Chochina, leauing 1000 choice horſe within the towne vnder the command of prince Coreskie, aſſuring themſelues that the Turks would not faile to campe betwixt the towne and the princes armie, that if they were defeated, they might haue no meanes to retire into the fort, which was held impregnable. The Princes drew eight pieces of cannon out of G the fort, which they planted within a trench which was couered with a wood. The Baſſa on the other ſide thought that hee had the princes at his mercie, being aduertiſed that they had not halfe ſo many men in their armie; early in the morning hee cauſed his men to march in good order, who arriued neere to Cochina by ſeuen of the clocke in the morning, where hauing made a ſtand to diſcouer the princes armie, he went and encamped betwixt them and the towne, as it had been foreſeene. His men beeing put in order, the Tartarians who had a great deſire to bee reuenged of the Coſſackes, who had defeated them in many encounters, intreated to haue the point: the which was granted, and the trumpets ſounding, they aduanced towards a battalion of Coſſackes, nothing diſtruſting the cannon which was planted on that ſide, and not ſeene. Comming within the ſhot, they preſently played vpon them, H and ouerthrew a great number of the Tartarians and terrified the reſt, the which the Coſſacks perceiuing, they charged them furiouſly, and cut the reſt in pieces, and ſo retired towards their armie, ſeeing another ſquadron of Valachians and Moldauians come to ſuccour the Tartarians. The Lord of Tiſchenich with his troupe of fifteene or ſixteene hundred horſe well armed, went to encounter the ſaid ſquadron, which aduanced brauely towards the princes cannon. The combate was long without any ſhew of aduantage, which made the Marſhall of the Turkes armie to ſend three thouſand Turkes to ſuccour them: and the princes cauſed a ſquadron of Coſſackes and Moldauians to aduance, who carried themſelues ſo valiantly, as they forced the Turkes to retire aboue an hundred paces. Then prince Alexander cried out, Now my companions, behold the enemie is in diſorder, let vs charge I them reſolutely, and the victorie is certaine. After which hee aduanced with the reſt of his armie, commanding two cannons to be ſhot off together, for a ſigne to Prince Coreskie, that hee might ſallie foorth, and charge the Turkes rereward, as it had beene reſolued: But hee ſtayed not for the ſignall, beeing already aduanced aboue three hundred paces, fearing that the partie would bee ended without him, or that hee ſhould fayle at need.

The Baſſa ſeeing this ſtratageme, which he feared not, and the bad ſucceſſe of his men which hee had ſent to fight, and that hee was charged both before and behinde, hee began to be amaſed, and hauing cauſed a ſquadron of two thouſand horſe, Turkes and Valachians, to K aduance, to ſecond his troupes, hee retyred apart with Stephano (who was no leſſe afraid than himſelfe) with the reſt of the Turkiſh Cauallarie, to attend the euent of the battell. There was neuer a more furious combate ſeene (which continued for the ſpace of two houres) full of fearefull howlings of Turks, who in the end fainted, ſeeing no ſuccours come vnto them: whereas if the Baſſa and the cowardly Stephano had ioined with them, they had without doubt fortified their carriages, and renued their forces, and by all apparance woon the victory, which they loſt beyond all mans expectation. When as the Baſſa and Stephano ſaw that their forces were in rout, and no meanes to draw them againe together, they began to make a retreat with aboue two thouſand horſe, which had not yet fought. In the meane time the princes Tiſchewiſch and Coreskie (like two thunderbolts of warre) cut all in pieces they could meet; L and fearing leſt they ſhould make a new head, the princes drew all their men together, and made a ſtand vpon the place of battell, not ſuffering their ſoldiers to goe to the ſpoile, before they were aſſured that the enemie was retired in great haſte, fearing the princes would haue purſued them, the which they would willingly haue done, if their men and horſes had not been almoſt tyred in the former battell, in which there was ſlaine aboue 12000 men beſides the wounded and priſoners.

Flight of the Baſſa and Stephano.

Prince Coresky marries with the Princeſſe Alexandrina.

Prince Alexander being returned to Cochina with the other Princes and noblemen, they gaue thankes to God for the victorie they had obtained againſt the Turkes and their confederates; and there was much joy with the Princeſſe and all the Ladies, who were retired into the fort, attending the euent of this fearefull battell. Prince Coreskie burned with deſire to M enjoy his Miſtreſſe, whome hee loued as his owne life; ſo as by a free conſent of all parties, they were married within two dayes after the victorie, to the great content of all the Court.

Whileſt

A Whileſt that the princes began to enioy the fruits of their victorie, the Baſſa and wretched Stephano returned to Yas, but finding no ſafetie there, they parted preſently; the Baſſa to Conſtantinople, and the tyrant into Valachia to Prince Michna, who was his onely ſupport, notwithſtanding that he had mocked him apparently. But before this wretch departed from Yas (hauing no hope euer to returne againe) he cauſed the towne to be ſet on fire in many places; ſo as of two and twentie thouſand houſes, there were not aboue ſix hundred vntouched. The princes hauing aduice hereof in the beginning of Aprill, they marched ſpeedily thither, where finding it ſo deſolate, they reſolued to purſue Stephano into Valachia, and puniſh him according to his deſeruing. The next day they marched towards Valachia, being to paſſe the riuer of Siretta, there being on the other ſide a Borough in which Michna had foure hundred B men in garriſon, to keepe the Frontiers. The princes arriuing at this place, the garriſon put themſelues in defence, but they were ſoone forced and cut in pieces, ſo as there eſcaped not one, and as for the enhabitants, they were well entreated, hauing made no reſiſtance, and withall they hated Michna for the vexations they receiued from the ſaid garriſon. The armie hauing reſted there three dayes, aduanced with all ſpeed towards the citie of Bonza, whereas Michna then remained with wretched Stephano, who had no care but to make good cheere. The armie beeing come within a league of Bonza, it was diſcouered by ſome countreymen, who ran to aduertiſe their prince, wiſhing him to ſaue himſelfe ſpeedily, for that they had diſcouered the Polonian armie neere the citie. Michna was readie to ſit downe to dinner, hauing inuited Stephano to accompanie him: but he was ſo amaſed at this C vnexpected comming of the princes, as he ranne himſelfe to his ſtable, and mounted vpon the firſt horſe hee could finde, without ſaddle, and ſo tooke his way towards Tergouiſt, beeing followed by few of his people, one of which gaue him his owne horſe, which was better furniſhed, and as for Stephano hauing ſadled his owne horſe, he fled all alone towards Nicopolis.

A defeat of 400 of Michna's men.

Prince Michna and Stephano fly from Bonza.

The princes beeing entered Bonza without reſiſtance, they were wonderfully grieued that they had not found Stephano, which was their whole deſigne, and that prince Michna (to whom they intended no harme) had been ſo amazed. The armie at their firſt enterance ſpoyled the citie, which the princes could not hinder, nor yet the rauiſhing of many wiues and virgines, which drew the wrath of God vpon them, and in all appearance was the true cauſe of the D miſeries which afterward befell the princes. During their abode at Bonza to refreſh their men, many Boyers or Noblemen of the countrey (deſiring to ſhake off the yoke of prince Michna's command, who gouerned inſolently) came vnto prince Alexander, beſeeching him to ſtay in Valachia, promiſing that the whole Nobilitie would willingly yeeld him all obedience and fidelitie. But the prince (hauing no intent to diſpoſſeſſe Michna) thanked them for their good will, the which the Boyers vnderſtanding, they told him, that they would bee glad (ſeeing he refuſed it) that prince Cherbanne (who had been their Vayuod before Michna, and had beene expelled Valachia by Bethlem Gabor, and forced to retire into Germanie to the Emperour) might returne and take vpon him the gouernment of Valachia, entreating him to giue him paſſage through Moldauia if hee preſented himſelfe, the which prince Alexander E willingly granted, deſiring much that prince Cherbanne were reſtored, for that Michna fauoured his enemie, and had himſelfe a deſigne vpon the eſtate of Moldauia, which in the end hee obtained.

Prince Alexander refuſeth the eſtate of Valachia.

Prince Michna beeing come to Playa, which is betwixt Bonza and Tergouiſt, hee ſtayed ſome dayes there attending his traine, during the which hee ſent ſpeedily to his wife beeing at Tergouiſt, willing her to goe with all ſpeed to Nicopolis: for that hee feared the princes would ſeiſe both vpon them and their eſtates, as they might eaſily haue done, if they had foreſeene what afterwards befell them. Michna beeing come to Tergouiſt, hee preſently ſent an Embaſſadour to prince Alexander, to know vpon what deſigne hee had entered Valachia with an armie, hauing no cauſe; but contrariwiſe, that hee had giuen good F teſtimonie that hee was his friend, for that hee would not aſſiſt the Baſſa and Stephano, when they purſued him to Cochina, notwithſtanding that they were much ſtronger in ſhew; That if his intent were onely to ſeiſe vpon Stephano, hee aſſured him that he was not with him, but was fled another way; promiſing that if hee could euer take him, he would deliuer him into his hands: intreating him withall to retire out of his eſtate, not ſuffering his armie G to ſpoyle it any more, and that they might continue good friends. Prince Alexander receiued this Embaſſadour verie courteouſly, who hearing the ſubiect of his Embaſſie, made anſwere, That he had the day before ſent vnto his maſter to informe him of his intent, which was not to attempt any thing againſt his perſon nor eſtate, but onely to purſue Stephano who had ſet fire on the citie of Yas before he parted: and to let Michna know, That hee meant not to wrong him, nor to enrich himſelfe with any thing that was his, hee had ſent him backe his plate, with all his rich mooueables. Michna's Embaſſadour hauing thanked Prince Alexander, returned to Tergouiſta, and found all true that the Prince had ſaid; the which freed Michna from further feare.

1500 Tartarians defeated by Troianoskie.

Before Prince Alaxanders departure from Bonza, hee ſent the Lord Troianoskie with two thouſand horſe to purſue Stephano: but it was without effect, for hee vnderſtood that he had H paſſed the riuer of Danow with his wife, and a ſmall traine. At the ſame time a troupe of fifteene hundred Tartarians, being aduertiſed that the Polonians purſued Stephano onely with a thouſand horſe, and that they were tyred with their long marches, aduanced to charge them; but it was not with that ſucceſſe they expected: for Troianoskie diſcouering them a farre off in a plaine champion field, had leaſure to put his men into foure ſquadrons, and there attended them, who approching neere to diſcouer the number of the Polonians, would gladly returne without blowes, but it was too late: for Troianoskie commanded two of his ſquadrons to charge them ſuddenly, ſo as within leſſe than a quarter of an houre they were defeated, and aboue foure hundred ſlaine vpon the place, the reſt fled the ſame way that they came: of the Polonians there were not aboue fiue and twentie ſlaine, and about fiftie I hurt.

The inhabitants of Horreoua reuolt the ſecond time.

The Princes had reſolued to leaue Valachia, forbidding all captaines and ſouldiers vpon paine of death to carrie away any Valachian of either ſex with them, hearing they had ſeiſed vpon ſome, and meant to draw a ranſome from them: after which they began to march, and beeing vpon the way, they were aduertiſed that the inhabitants of Horreoua, were againe reuolted and in armes, refuſing to acknowledge Prince Alexander, or to pay the accuſtomed tribute, vnleſſe he would make it appeare that he was confirmed by the Grand Seignior. Prince Coreskie was ſent thither with fiue thouſand men, whoſe comming did ſo amaze them, as they yeelded without any reſiſtance. This Prince beeing loath to looſe any time, laid ſiege to the K towne and fort of Bialigront, ſeated vpon the riuer of Bohou, the which was held by the Tartarians Præcopences, in which fort there was a garriſon of Ianizaries, and many Boyers of Moldauia, who defended themſelues valiantly, and made many ſallies, in which they ſlew aboue three hundred of the Princes men, and he himſelfe was in danger to be taken, if hee had not been ſpeedily deliuered by the Lord of Tiſchewich and his troup, who charged the Ianizaries ſo reſolutely, as they forced them to retire, leauing many of their men dead vpon the place. The Prince ſeeing there was no hope to take the place without cannon, raiſed his ſiege and returned to Yas to Prince Alexander.

Hebraim Baſſa writes to prince Alexander.

Soone after, Hebraim Baſſa wrote to Prince Alexander (as if he had been his friend) giuing him to vnderſtand, That from thencefoorth hee ſhould liue quietly in Moldauia, for that L
the Graund Seigniors Lieutenant Generall or chiefe Viſier (from whom Stephano had alwaies drawne his chiefe ſupport) was in diſgrace, promiſing the Prince to imploy himſelfe for him to his Maſter: the which he did either to make him careleſſe of his owne ſtrength, or to draw ſome recompence or reward from him, if the Graund Seigniour ſhould confirme him in Moldauia, as there was ſome likelihood, ſeeing that Stephano had made himſelfe altogether vnworthie, as well by his flight, as by his wicked actions, which made him in the end ſo odious to the Graund Seigniour, as he reſolued to ruine him. So as ſoone after they were aduertiſed, That the Graund Seigniour had giuen commaundement vnto the ſaid Baſſa to ſeize vpon Stephano, who had retired himſelfe to Brahiſe, and to bring him vnto him aliue or dead, with whatſoeuer did belong vnto him: the which hee executed after this manner: the M

Stephano in diſgrace with the Sultan.

ſaid Baſſa marched with all diligence towards Brahile, carrying a Chiaus with him, and beeing within foure or fiue leagues of the towne, hee ſent one of his people to aduertiſe Stephano of his comming, and that he meant the next day to dine with him. Stephano (who diſtruſted

A nothing) holding the Viſier to be ſtill his friend, parted early in the morning to meet him, and comming neere him he alighted from his horſe to doe him reuerence, and the Baſſa did the like, where after ſome little conference together, he drew out the commiſſion he had to ſeiſe vpon his perſon, and to carrie him to Conſtantinople: the which Stephano perceiuing, he turned him to his ſeruants, and willed them to ſhift for themſelues, for that he ſaw he went to his death. His men being retired, the Chiaus who had his mace in his hand, gaue him a blow betwixt the ſhoulders, and then cauſed him to be bound hand and foot, and caſt into a cart drawn by foure good horſes, and in this manner they carried him to Conſtantinople; where being arriued, to auoid the puniſhment hee had deſerued, he denied his faith, and became a renegado: and withall he became very poore and miſerable: for at the ſame inſtant that he was taken, the B Baſſa ſent to ſeiſe and carrie away whatſoeuer he had at Brahile and Nicopolis, where his wife remained, ſo as hee had nothing left him but the remorſe of conſcience that tormented him continually, for the barbarous cruelties which he had practiſed in Moldauia. Some of his men returned to Yas, and there declared what had befallen Stephano in their preſence, for which they generally gaue thanks vnto God, and were very ioyfull.

Stephano carried to Conſtantinople and turns Turke.

Soone after, newes came to Yas, that the Sultan had appointed prince Michna to ſucceed Stephano in the principalitie of Moldauia (which is verie much better than that of Valachia) and that he ſent Skinder Baſſa his Generall in Europe, with a powerfull armie to ſettle the ſaid Michna, and to expell Alexander. The which prooued ſo true, as on the 25 of Iune this yere 1616, the ſaid Baſſa came to Tergouiſt, where prince Michna attended him, with great C preparatiues both to receiue him, and to refreſh his armie. The Baſſa making his entry into Tergouiſt, had amongſt other things of note thirtie or fortie muſitians on horſebacke, playing vpon certaine inſtruments almoſt like vnto gitternes, which made but ſilly muſicke; he had alſo many pages, who in ſtead of clokes, ware the skins of leopards, lions, and tygres, as if they meant to terrifie the world, and his armie conſiſted of about 20000 men, ſome Turks, ſome Tartarians, to whom Michna ioyned his forces, hauing 10000 horſe and foot, which he had drawne from Valachia and the neighbor countries. The Baſſa being entred the caſtle whereas prince Michna attended him, after many complements, they entred into a great hall well appointed, where the Baſſa preſented him his letters patents, and a robe which his maſter had ſent to Michna, which he cauſed to be put on in the preſence of all the noblemen of his court, D proclaiming him prince and Vayuod of Moldauia, with many ceremonies too long to relate. After which, prince Michna led the Baſſa into another great hall where a feaſt was prepared, as well for himſelfe, as for ſuch as hee would admit to his table, Michna offering to ſerue the ſaid Baſſa, but he would not ſuffer him, cauſing him to ſit downe right againſt him. On the ſecond of Iuly they parted from Tergouiſt, and marched into Moldauia, whereof the Polonian princes were aduertiſed: but the Princeſſe mother to Alexander maintained, that the Baſſa came onely to bring the patents to prince Alexander her ſon; which dangerous opinion of hers grew by reaſon of the letters which Hebraim Baſſa had ſent to prince Alexander, not remembring that it came from a Turke his ſworne enemie, and therefore not to be credited, eſpecially in a matter of that importance, ſo as ſhe was the cauſe of their vtter ruine.

Michna proclaimed prince of Moldauia.

E About this time the Generall of the king of Polonia's armie called Zolkelchy, enuying the honor which the Polonian Princes had gotten by ſo many victories, and withall drawn by his owne priuat intereſt, writ to prince Michna and the Baſſa, that if they would promiſe to procure the Sultan to aduance the eldeſt ſon of the deceaſed prince Simeon (who liued with him) to be prince of Valachia (whereof his father had been formerly Vayuod) he would ſo weaken princes armie, as they ſhould be forced to yeeld or flie. Whoſe demand being eaſily granted, this traitor writ to certaine captains of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould leaue the princes armie, and come with all ſpeed into Poland, to accompanie Vladiſlaus their kings ſon, who had been choſen Duke of Muſcouie, and meant to go thither with a great armie by reaſon of ſome croſſes, and that they ſhould be verie well paid. The Coſſacks (who depend vpon the crowne of F Poland, ſeruing thoſe that promiſe moſt) began to mutiny, ſaying plainly, That if they had not money ſpeedily, they would retire into their countrey, yet concealing that they had been called to any other ſeruice; and without any long ſtay, there parted early in a morning about 8000, carrying with them great ſtore of oxen, ſheepe, and other cattell, with all the ſpoyles hey had gotte in the precedent victories.

The treacherie of the Generall of Polonia.

The Coſſackes mutinie and leaue prince Alexander.

Bicho generall of prince Alexanders armie forſakes him trecherouſly.

After their example, Bicho General of prince Alexanders army, whether corrupted by bribes, ot for that hee had an apprehenſion of this powerfull armie which came againſt them, retired alſo ſecretly toward Michna and the Baſſa, being followed by 2000 horſe. This was a ſubiect of great amaſement to the princes armie; and yet as if they had been inchanted by ſome deuilliſh charmes, they could not reſolue to make a retreat, as they might eaſily haue done without danger. Many aduiſed prince Alexander to this courſe, euen prince Michna writ vnto him aduiſing him to retire into Polonia, before that his armie approched neerer to Yas; the which he did for feare of the ſucceſſe; wherof his falſe prophet had forewarned him, as we haue formerly obſerued: whereupon Alexander went to councel on the 25 of Iuly, but they could not reſolue; the commanders and ſouldiers beeing much diuided, moſt of them demanding their pay, elſe they would not fight; the which they tooke for a pretext of their retreat. In the mean time the Tartarians, which made the vantgard of prince Michnas army, approched; which made the princes to leaue Yas, and to march toward Cochina; but they could not do it ſo ſecretly but the Tartarians were aduertiſed, who paſt ſpeedily through the citie, and charged them in the reare, in which incounter George Potoskie, nephew to him that was taken with Conſtantine, hauing fought valiantly, and ſlaine many Tartarians with his own hand, was in the end ſhot thorow the bodie with an arrow, whereof he died preſently. The lord of Tiſchewich came ſpeedily to the charge with a troupe of Coſſacks which he had ſtaied, and charged the Tartarians ſo furiouſly, as he ſlew 800 vpon the place, and put the reſt to rout.

Prince Alexanders anſwer to Prince Michna

Alexander hauing receiued the letter aboue mentioned from prince Michna, he made anſwer, that (contrary to his promiſe to continue his friend, and neuer to take armes againſt him) he had craued aid from the Turke to diſpoſſeſſe him of Moldauia, to the which his predeceſſor had neuer pretended, neither could they according to the fundamental lawes of the countrie, and the conuentions accorded by the grand Seignior, when as the Moldauians ſubmitted themſelues vnder his ſoueraigntie, by the which no man could be Vayuod of Moldauia vnleſſe he were borne in the countrey. Moreouer, he ſhould remember that it was in his power to diſpoſſeſſe him of Valachia, when as he entred Bonza with his armie in purſuit of Stephano, the which he would not do, nor detain any of his precious moueables, which he had reſerued and ſent vnto him: that if he abuſed the power which hee then had, God would not ſuffer ſo great an ingratitude and vſurpation to remaine vnpuniſhed. And although his armie were far inferior to his, yet he would let him know, that he neither feared him nor the Baſſa, putting his chiefe confidence in the aſſiſtance of the Almightie, who had in many occaſions vſed them to abate the Turks pride, which he ſhould abhor if he were a true Chriſtian, rather than to joyne with them to ſatisfie his ambition.

Prince Michna hauing ſent this letter to Skinder Baſſa Generall of the Turks army, he was ſo incenſed, as hee preſently commanded his Lieutenant to purſue the Polonians with 12000 choice men, they being then at Cotnard, betwixt Yas and Cochina. Prince Alexander being aduertiſed hereof, he ſuddenly cauſed his armie to aduance towards the fort of Cochina. At the ſame time the Chancellor to prince Cherbanne who came with 150 horſe to prince Alexander, to aſſure him that his maſter was comming to his aid with fiue or ſix thouſand men, was purſued by the Turks neere vnto Yas, whereas he thought to haue found the ſaid prince, and of all his troupe onely himſelfe and one more eſcaped, ſo as the prince could haue no certaine newes of the ſaid Cherbanne. Prince Coreskie who had remained with 2500 horſe not far from Cotnard, was alſo encountred by a great troupe of Turks and Tartarians, which hee could not well diſcouer by reaſon of a little mountaine that couered them: the Prince ſeeing ſome of them appeare, charged them; but finding that as hee defeated one troupe, a freſh ſucceded in his place, he was forced to make his retreat, with this aduantage, that he had almoſt ſlain 6000 of his enemies, hauing not loſt aboue 250 of his owne men. But the prince was wounded with two arrowes, one in the thigh, and the other in the backe, which was a great diſaſter for himſelfe and for the whole armie. Hee which commanded this troupe of Turkes beeing much amaſed at this vnexpected encounter, hauing gathered his men together, and joyned them to 15000 others whom the Baſſa had ſent, hee beeing yet at Yas, he cauſed this army to approch within a quarter of a league to the Polonians, where hauing encouraged his men in what hee could, hee told them, that to ſhew his affection vnto the Sultans ſeruice in this occaſion, hee was reſolued to ſend a challenge to prince Coreskie, whome hee confeſt

A to be the moſt valiant of all the Polonian armie, ſo as he preſently diſpatched one of his captaines to goe vnto the prince, and to call him in the behalfe of his Generall. The Captaine comming to Alexanders campe, demaunded to ſpeake with Prince Coreskie, who beeing brought vnto him, deliuered the charge he had from his Generall. The Prince, although hee were neither able to ſtand nor to ſit on horſebacke, by reaſon of his wounds, yet would hee needs haue accepted this challenge, if prince Alexander, and the chiefe noblemen of the armie had not conjured him to excuſe himſelfe by reaſon of his indiſpoſition: letting him know, that the euent of ſuch a combat did not onely import him, but all thoſe of his partie, who had their chiefe hope in him: whereunto the princeſſes added their inſtant intreaties; and among others his deare ſpouſe, who was much afflicted for his wounds. The Lord of Tiſchevich (a
B braue and valiant Gentleman) being then preſent, intreated prince Alexander to giue him leaue to accept of the challenge for prince Coreskie his couſin; the which was willingly granted: ſo as he ſent a Gentleman with the ſaid Turke, to know if the Generall would yeeld thereunto, which he did willingly, not beeing ignorant of the qualitie and valour of the ſaid Tiſchevich. It was agreed that the combate ſhould bee betwixt both armies, lying in a plaine open field, within a quarter of a league one of another, with promiſe, that neither partie ſhould be aſſiſted.

A combat betwixt Tiſchevich and the Generall of the Turks armie.

Theſe two braue warriours hauing taken leaue of their friends, came to the place appoynted, in view of both armies. The Turkes Generall being about fiftie paces from his armie, cauſed water to bee brought, with the which hee waſhed his mouth, eyes, noſe,
C eares, and priuie parts, beleeuing (according to his law) that this waſhing would ſerue as a purifying; then turning toward the Eaſt hee made his prayer: after which he went to horſebacke, beeing richly armed and furniſhed, and then marched ſoftly towards his aduerſarie, who attended him wel mounted and armed, and ſo they began their combat; their chiefe arms beeing bowes and arrowes, which they ſpent without hurting one another; till at laſt Tiſchevich hauing a Petronell, ſhot the Turke thorow the bodie and ouerthrew him, who ſtriuing to riſe againe, Tiſchevich paſſed ouer him with his horſe, and wounded him in the right arme, and at the next blow ſlew him: after which he cut off his head, and carried it to prince Alexanders [illegible]

The princes of Polonia enuironed by their enemies.

The Polonians were verie joyfull of the happie ſucceſſe of this famous combate, and D the Turkes beeing much amaſed, aduertiſed the Baſſa and Michna, that it was neceſſarie they ſhould bring the reſt of their armie and their cannon, if they would be reuenged of the Polonians. In the meane time the traitour Bicho, who had abandoned Prince Alexander, with a troupe of two thouſand Tartarians and Moldauians, found meanes to get before the Polonian armie, and to cut off the way betwixt Cotnarde and the towne of Bothocan ſix leagues off. The Valachians and Tranſyluanians led by the Generall of Michna's armie, inueſted them vpon the right hand, and the bodie of the Turkes armie followed behinde: ſo as there remayned nothing but vpon the left hand a wood of timber trees which might fauour their retreat. Skinder Baſſa hearing the ſucceſſe of the combate, commaunded his armie to aduance preſently with ſixteene cannons. The Princes
E ſeeing themſelues enuironed by ſo many enemies, they reſolued to fortifie themſelues with their carts and carriages, and to defend themſelues: but what could fiue or ſixe thouſand men preuaile againſt two or three and twentie thouſand; for ſo many were thought to bee in the Turkes armie: True it is, they expected daily Prince Cherbanne, and the Lord Boſſi, who were within two dayes journey, and brought with them ten or twelue thouſand men. This made the Baſſa and Michna to aduance, to force the Polonians to yeeld, or to fight. Comming neere vnto their campe, and ſeeing them inueſted on all ſides but towards the wood, they approched their cannon, which had been able to haue ſpoyled their campe, but it was not their deſigne; they onely deſired to take the Princes and Princeſſes priſoners, with the chiefe Noblemen: Whereupon they ſent to ſum-ſome few daies before : ſo as all things ſeemed to foretell their ruine at hand. The Lord of Tiſcheuich, hauing iudiciouſly obſerued, that remaining in that encloſure, he could not eſcape death,or at leaſt captiuitie, reſolued with fiue hundred horſe(the moſt valiant among the Polonians) to force through three or foure ſquadrons which were ſet in guard by the wood ſide, to the end none might eſcape, that place being moſt ſuſpected to the Turkes : the which they executed with ſuch furie, as they ouerthrew all they encountered ; ſhewing that it is a verie dangerous thing to make head againſt thoſe who are reduced to that extremitie,as they muſt either vanquiſh or die. Prince Coreskie would not haue failed to haue made the like retreat,and H to haue carried prince Alexander with him : but he could not ſit on horſebacke by reaſon of his wounds ; and beſides, he had rather haue died than to leaue his wife in that extremitie. His laſt refuge was to diſguiſe himſelfe as well as he could, giuing it out, that he had eſcaped with Tiſcheuich, to the end hee might paſſe for a common ſouldier, if the priſoners were put to ranſome.

In like manner the princeſſes diſguiſed themſelues in the beſt manner they could, for the like intent.

The princes taken priſoners, and carried to Conſtantinople.

Prince Coresky being diſguiſed is diſcouered.

The Turkes cannon hauing ouerthrowne many of their carriages, which ſerued as a rampier, two ſquadrons, one of Tartarians, and the other of Turkes, preſented themſelues at one inſtant in two ſeuerall places to force the Polonians campe ; who ſeeing no meanes to make reſiſtance, and to repell the enemie, layed downe their armes, crying out with a loud voice, I
That they yeelded : whereat their enemies were exceeding glad, deſiring nothing more than to take theſe noble princes priſoners, and to diſpoſe of the reſt at their pleaſures. The Turks and Tartarians hauing entered their campe, making ſpoile of all, and ſeiſing vpon what they could lay their hands on, beginning to ſhare their priſoners, the princes Alexander and Bougdan, with their mother were deliuered vnto Skinder Baſſa, who led them to Conſtantinople, whereas ſoone after their arriuall they forſooke their God, denied their faith, and became renegadoes, for feare of perpetuall impriſonment, where with they were threatned. For which Infidelitie Bougdan was preſently puniſhed ; for hauing cauſed himſelfe to be circumciſed according to the law of Mahomet, he died, and the princeſſe his mother was confined to the old Seraglio. K As for prince Coreskie (in this generall ruine of a Chriſtian armie being forced to yeeld and ſubmit it ſelfe to the Turkes tyrannie) hee had ſo diſguiſed himſelfe, as he paſt for a time vnknowne, and was led to Yas among the common ſouldiers, where he was afterward diſcouered by a ſouldier of his owne partie, who obtained his libertie by this baſe trecherie.
The Turkiſh captaine who had gotten this prince, hearing of his qualitie by the aforeſaid villaine, he led him to Skinder Baſſa his General, who recompenced him well, and made both him and the ſouldier who diſcouered him, to take ſolemne oaths not to impart it to any man : for he had an intent to draw ſome great ranſome from this prince, and to reſtore him to his former liberty, knowing wel that if he carried him to Conſtantinople, the grand Seignior would confine him into his priſons, by which meanes he ſhould make no vſe nor benefit by his taking. L
But it happened, that another perfidious of the Polonian armie aduertiſed Michna of Coreskies captiuitie, and in whoſe hands he was ; who was ſo iealous, as he croſt and ouerthrew the good deſigne of Skinder Baſſa, telling him plainely in the preſence of many, that he knew for certaine, prince Coreskie was among his ſlaues, and that he ſhould beware he did not eſcape, for that the Graund Seignior would call him to account. The Generall made anſwere, that hee would be glad it were ſo, but he had not yet any notice of him, thanking Michna for his good aduice. But fearing that if hee did what he intended, ſuffering prince Coreskie to eſcape for a ranſome, the Sultan comming to the knowledge thereof, would be much incenſed, and puniſh him with diſgrace or death, the next day he told prince Michna plainely, that the aduice that he had giuen him was true, and that Coreskie had been found diſguiſed amongſt his other M priſoners, whom he would preſent vnto his maſter, with the princes Alexander and Bougdan, as he did, of whoſe deliuerie you ſhall heare hereafter. The young princeſſe, wife to Coreskie, hauing diſguiſed herſelfe, and diſfigured her face with her nayles, and other helpes, fell into

A into the hands of a Tartarian captain, with many others, who carried her into Tartaria, wheras ſhee was inhumanely intreated.

The courſes of the Florentine gallies.

In the Mediterranean ſea, Coſmo great Duke of Tuſcanie, continued his enterpriſes this yeare againſt the Turkes: his gallies part from Ligorne, and run into the Leuant, in queſt of ſome occaſions to annoy theſe Infidels. They drew neere vnto Cerigo, in old time Citharea, the fiue and twentieth of Aprill, where meeting with certaine Chriſtian ſhips, ſome Venetians aduertiſed them, that in the Iſland of Chio, the Turkes had prepared two gallies to paſſe into Barbarie. Inghirami (Admirall to the great Duke) reſolued to ſet vpon them; being on the way, hee turned with his fleet where they were to paſſe, and being couered by the night, hee caſt anchor vnder caſtle Roux. But as hee attended a fauourable occaſion, the Moone B ſhining, diſcouered him to the Turkes, and the guards hauing aduertiſed the Turkes gallies, they preſently began to flie, the one rowing amaine towards land, and the other continued her courſe at ſea with all ſpeed. Inghirami with his Admirall gallie got before that which was going to land, inueſted it, beeing followed by the gallie called Saint Stephen, and three houres within night grapled with it, and laboured to enter it: but the Turkes (who were all good ſouldiers) defended it valiantly, ſo as they were aboue an houre faſtened together, hewing one another furiouſly: yea the Turks (who were entered into Inghirami his gallie) fought valiantly vpon the hatches; but in the end the Florentines had the victorie, and tooke this Gallie, yet with much loſſe of Chriſtian bloud. It was the Patron gallie of that famous Pirate Amurath Raiſe, which was commanunded by the ſonne of Mammi a Portugall, C called Muſtapha Celebi, who was taken aliue, but ſore wounded. The other gallie which had fled to ſea and was the Captaine gallie of the ſaid Amurath Raiſe, commanded by the Bey of Mitilene, nephew and ſonne in law to that Pirate, called Amurath, who had married his daughter, beeing his mothers ſonne, was inueſted by the gallies of Saint Marie Magdalene, and the Patron Saint Coſmo; the combate was no leſſe furious than the other, the Turks making a wonderfull defence: But after ſome houres fight, in which time the bloud of either ſide was aboundantly ſpilt, the Florentines had the victorie: Amurath Bey of Mitilene, was ſlaine, and Muſtapha, whome theſe Turkiſh gallies carried to Algier in Barbarie. They were of fiue and twentie bankes a piece, carrying Lanthornes, and furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, and manned with foure hundred and twentie Ianizaries, all men of action, and D practiſed in piracies with that pyrate Amurath Rais. In this prize the Florentines tooke two hundred and forty Turks, and freed foure hundred and thirty Chriſtians: among the artillerie of theſe gallies, they recouered a cannon and two ſacres of the gallie of Saint Iohn, and a ſayle belonging to the Great Dukes Captaine gallie, which the Pyrat Amurath Rais had formerly ſpoyled. Theſe Turkiſh gallies were loden with great ſtore of rich commodities, the which was valued at two hundred thouſand crownes. But this conqueſt was gotten with the loſſe of much bloud: for the Florentines had two hundred twentie three men wounded, and fiue and thirtie ſlaine in thoſe two combats; the which made the Admirall Inghirami to reſt ſatisfied in this voyage with the taking of two gallies, after which he returned to Ligorne.

Turkiſh gallies taken by the Florentines.

Deputies meet at Vienna to confirme the peace betwixt the emperor & the Turke.

E Wee haue formerly made mention in the Ieſuites buſineſſe, beeing preſented at Conſtantinople, of the entrie which the Emperors Embaſſador made into that citie. And this was the effect of his embaſſage. The peace concluded at Situa Torok, in the yeare 1606, betwixt the Emperour and the Sultan, was ſomewhat altered by the diuers interpretations and explications, which they made of the Articles therein contained. But this yeare 1616, in the moneth of March, the Embaſſadours of both their Imperiall Maieſties aſſembled at Vienna in Auſtria; that is to ſay, the Cardinall Forgatſie Archbiſhop of Strigonium, and Chancellour to the Emperour, the Cardinall Kleſſel, Biſhop of Vienna, the Baron of Rainek, Count Adolph Althen, the Earle of Solmes, the Earle of Thoron, and Pauli Apponi Nagi, for the Emperour:
Hali Baſſa of Buda, Achmat Tybaia, and Gaſpar Gratſiani, for the Turke: where they F concluded theſe following Articles, to take away all pretext of controuerſie in the explication of thoſe which were agreed vpon at Situa Torok. But it was after that Embaſſadours had beene ſent of either ſide, as well to Conſtantinople, as to Prague, with royall and rich Preſents.

Articles extracted out of the Letters Patents of Achmat Emperour of the Turkes. G

Articles touching the differences of the peace.

1 For as much as many things haue happened of either ſide contrarie to the peace concluded at Situa Torok, it hath beene neceſſarie to confirme it anew, and to reduce it into the right courſe. Wherefore this holy peace made and concluded at Situa Torok, ſhall bee obſerued for twentie yeares compleat, to begin at the date of theſe preſents. Giuen in the moneth of ChomaZilabil, in the yeare of the Prophet, 1024.

2 That the peace heretofore concluded at Situa Torok, ſhall remaine firme in all the articles, according to the treatie which the Emperor Rodulphus did ſend vnto vs, ſigned with his hand, and ſealed with his ſeale, H the which wee haue receiued willingly, and the ſame treatie wee alſo ſent backe confirmed backe to the Emperor of the Romans: the which he receiued in like manner. And this treaty which was ſent vnto vs, beare date the ninth of December, in the yeare 1606 of Ieſus of reuerend and happie memorie: and that which we ſent vnto the Emperor of Romans, wherewith he was ſatisfied, was dated in the yeare of the Prophet 1021.

3 Since the time that Agria, Caniſe, Alba-Regalis, Peſth, Buda, Zolnok, Hatwan, and other places haue beene taken, that the villages which were of their appurtenances, ſhall hereafter remaine annexed vnto them. But thoſe villages which ſince the peace of Situa Torok, haue beene hindered from paying of their tribute by either ſide, or haue beene held by force, contrarie to the treatie of peace, that thoſe villages ſhall be viewed by Commiſſaries appointed by vs and the Emperour of the Romanes, and preſently ſhall bee ſet at libertie, and reſtored to their Lords and right owners. I As for the Villages which pay tribute to either part, thoſe which are ſcituate vpon the frontiers of the Emperour of the Romanes, towards Nouigrade and other places, ſhall be viewed by Commiſſaries thereunto deputed, who ſhall take a Regiſter, to the end thoſe villages may not be moleſted by our neighbors. In like manner the Commiſſarie ſhall make a Regiſter of the villages which pay to both ſides, lying neere the townes of the Emperour of Romanes, of Strigonium and other places; to the end they may take notice what villages are bound, to the one or the other partie, that hereafter there might grow no controuerſie. And for that which concerned the 158 villages about Strigonium, for the which there was ſome controuerſie, the 60 lying neereſt to the ſaid towne ſhall be adiudged, as it hath beene agreed, and the Commiſſaries of either ſide ſhall take order for it. K The foreſaid villages lying neere to Strigonium, and all others of the Realme of Hungarie, which ſhal be adiudged to the one or other partie, ſhal not in any ſort be diſquieted, more than of antient cuſtome, and there ſhall be nothing exacted from them more than the tribute.

The Iudges of villages ſhall pay vnto the Lord the tributes according to the antient cuſtome; if the Iudges do not bring the tribute, the Baſſa or Beg of the place ſhall ſummon the inhabitants thrice, to the end their Iudges may come and pay the tribute, and if they doe it not after theſe ſummonings, he ſhall write vnto the next Gouernour for the Romane Emperor, that the Iudges of the villages may be ſent vnto him with the tribute: And finally, if after all theſe formalities it be not paied, the Baſſa or Beg, may vſe force to fetch in theſe inhabitants, and make them ſlaues: the which ſhall be obſerued throughout all the villages which owe vs tribute in the realme of Hungarie, L yet nothing ſhall be exacted or demanded of them, more than they haue been accuſtomed to pay in antient times. The commiſſaries deputed ſhall view and ſet downe by a ioynt conſent the limits and bounds of the lands and Seigniories, which are held by either part in the vpper or lower Hungarie, and in the realmes of Croatia and Sclauonia.

4 They that ſhall breake the peace of either part, if they cannot be conuicted and puniſhed inſtantly; we haue decreed, that there ſhall be order taken of either ſide, and iuſtice ſhall be done within three moneths. All priſoners of warre, and others which haue beene taken ſince the peace of Situa Torok, ſhall be ſet at libertie without ranſome.

5 Achmet Tahaia hath preſented vnto vs a Roule of places built and fortified ſince the peace, M for the retreat of ſouldiers. Whereupon we haue ordained, that informations ſhould be taken of all fortifications made on either ſide ſince the peace of Situa Torok; and if it be found that any fortification hath been made contrarie to the peace, it ſhall bee viſited within foure moneths by the captains on both ſides, or by a Nobleman of either partie, and the fortifications which ſhall be found to haue been thus made contrary to the peace, ſhall be demoliſhed.

A 6 And for that ſome wicked and malicious ſpirits, haue attempted many things vniuſtly to infringe this holy peace and good amitie; we haue ordained, that if hereafter any perſons of either ſide ſhall attempt or practiſe any thing that is wicked and lewd, contrarie to the peace and mutuall coreſpondencie, wee will aduertiſe the Emperour of the Romans thereof: and in like manner the Roman Emperour, king of Hungarie and Bohemia, ſhall write vnto vs to our court, and no credit ſhall be giuen to the reports of ſuch perſons.

7 The Prieſts, religious men, and Ieſuites, among the people of holy Ieſus, which follow the Popes religion, may build Temples in our realmes, there to ſay diuine ſeruice after their manner, and read the Goſpell. Wee will yeeld them all fauour, and will not ſuffer any one to diſturbe them contrarie to law and equitie.

B 8 It ſhall be lawfull for the inhabitants borne in the realme of Hungarie of either part, to re-edifie the villages ruined and laied waſte, and after they are inhabited, they ſhall pay tribute to the one and the other, if they be ſuch villages as haue been accuſtomed to pay to both.

9 Merchants ſhall haue free leaue to traffique, paſſing from our port into thoſe countries, and the tranſport of merchandiſe ſhall bee free to ſuch as ſhall take letters from the Gouernours of the frontiers, or from the Receiuors of the thirties; the which they ſhall repreſent in paſſing, and the Lord of of the place or the Receiuor ſhall atteſt the ſaid letters, by his manuall ſigne or ſeale: for the which they ſhall not take any thing of the merchant. If the merchant be to paſſe by any dangerous place, they ſhall giue him a ſufficient conuoy to conduct him in ſafetie: and after that the merchant hath paied of either ſide the thirtieth, which is the full due, no man ſhall moleſt him nor hinder him to goe where C he pleaſeth.

10 The merchants which would paſſe from the realms and ſeigniories of the Emperor of the Ro- manes and the houſe of Auſtria, into our kingdomes, with merchandiſe or money, ſhall come vnder the enſigne of the Emperor of Romans and ſhall haue his letters patents to vs, without the which they ſhall not be ſuffred to paſſe. And if they enter without enſigne or the ſaid patents, the Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperor may ſeiſe vpon their veſſels, merchandiſe, and money, and ſhall giue aduice thereof vnto their Emperour: wherefore all the merchants of the Emperours countries, of the houſe of Auſtria, and of the king of Spaine, both as well thoſe of the Low Countries as his other realmes, may come with all aſſurance into our realmes, with their ſhips, money, and merchandiſe, paying three in the hundred.
And as for the Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperour, they ſhall pay vnto them two Aſpers for D the hundred: and in doing ſo the ſaid Agents and Conſuls of the Roman Emperour, ſhall haue a care of the merchants affaires. If any merchant chance to die, the Emperours Agent and Conſull ſhall cauſe his goods to be ſealed vp, and ſhall take them into their poſſeſſion, to the which our Treaſurer ſhall haue no colour of pretenſion. And when as the merchants haue paied the cuſtome of three for the hundred in one place, they ſhall not bee bound to pay it in another for the ſame merchandiſe. If the merchants haue any controuerſie amongſt themſelues, or with others, the Cadi or Iudge of that place may take knowledge of the cauſe, if it exceed not the value of 4000 aſpers, but it ſhall be iudged by the Cadi of our Port.

11 As long as this holy peace ſhal continue, the poſts which ſhall be ſent with letters by the Baſſaes, Begues, Lords, and Agents, or by the Viſiers on our behalfe to the Emperour of the Romans; and reſpe-E ctiuely from him to our Court, ſhall be honourably entertained by our officers: and if the way be dange- rous, they ſhall giue them aſſiſtance to conduct them into a place of ſafetie with their letters. And if the Agent which is with vs, deſire to write any particular letter vnto the Emperour, and not ſend an expreſſe meſſenger, that this letter ſhall be carried by the poſt, and deliuered ſafely where it is directed.
That the meſſengers of the Baſſaes and Begues ſhall goe no more into the villages, but the Iudges ſhall bring the tribute and deliuer it where they ought.

An accord for the execution of the Articles touching the Villages in controuerſie, and the raiſing of fortifications.

F To conclude all differencies touching the diuiſion of Villages, and demolition of fortifications made in preiudice of the peace of Situa Torok; Wee the commiſſaries deputed, had agreed vpon the time of foure moneths: But for that all controuerſies cannot bee decided within that time, by a common conſent wee haue concluded the time of twelue moneths, for the expedition of all that ſhall remaine vndecided; all things remaining in the ſame eſtate during the time. For the ending of theſe affaires G on the behalfe of the Maieſtie of the Roman Emperour, ſhall be ſent the noble Lord Adolph of Althen Earle of the ſacred Empire, with others according to his Maieſties good pleaſure. And on the behalfe of the Othoman Emperour hath beene named the noble Lord Ali Viſier Baſſa.

For the greater aſſurance of theſe things, wee the ſaid Commiſſioners haue cauſed ſix copies of this treatie to be diſpatched, in the Italian, Hungarian, and Turkiſh tongues. And we the director or preſident of the priuie Councell to his Imperiall Maieſtie, and Cardinall, with other Counſellors of his priuie Councell, and Commiſſioners, hauing full power and authoritie, haue confirmed theſe preſents vnder our hands and the Seales of our armes.

As alſo we Ali Baſſa of Buda, Viſier to the moſt powerfull Sultan Achmat. Tyhaia Mutafaraga, and Gaſpar Gratiani Embaſſadors to the Turkiſh Emperor, with the Imperiall Maieſtie of the Roman H Emperour, hauing full power and authoritie to conclude this treatie, haue ſigned it with our hands, and ſealed it with our ordinarie Seales: whereof there were three copies deliuered to either partie. Giuen at Vienna the firſt of March, 1616.

This new declaration of the Othoman Emperour, vpon the firſt Articles concluded at Situa Torok, ſhewes plainely how much the Turkes are of late daies refined from their antient barbariſme and rudeneſſe, hauing made themſelues capable of great affaires. And theſe frequent meetings betwixt the Emperour of the Romans, and the Sultan, by their Embaſſadors, as a holy watering of the Oliue tree of peace, ſeemes to make it ſo flouriſhing, as the ſweet ſauour may pierce further, and make vs hope that God will make vſe of this peacefull vnion, to I prepare vnto himſelfe ſome meanes to a new harueſt, or a healthfull conqueſt of ſoules wandring amidſt the falſhoods of the Alchoran.

Alexandrina wife to prince Coreskie hauing been taken at that vnfortunat ouerthrow of the Polonian princes in Moldauia, by Skinder Baſſa and prince Michna; ſhee was carried away (as you haue formerly heard) by a Tartarian Captaine, and led captiue vnknowne to Bialigrot, where ſhee receiued many indignities, beeing with childe; yea during the time of her lying in, which was fiue or ſix moneths after her taking: all which time ſhee bethought herſelfe of a meanes to haſten her owne deliuerie, and withall to free a Polonian ſouldier called Iaques, who had carried armes vnder Prince Coreskie. This man although hee knew the Princeſſe well, and might by her diſcouerie haue purchaſed his owne libertie; yet hee K would not do it: wherefore the Princeſſe hauing tryed his fidelitie, taught him a meanes how to worke his owne libertie, and hers in the end, by his care and diligence. The Tartarian being one day abſent from his lodging, Alexandria tooke occaſion to talke with Iaques the Polonian; telling him, That hauing found him faithfull vnto her, ſhee would direct him a courſe, whereby hee might redeeme himſelfe from captiuitie; ſo as hee would principally obſerue what ſhee did preſcribe. Iaques hauing promiſed to execute whatſoeuer this ladie ſhould enioyne him, yea with the hazard of his life; ſhe then ſaid vnto him: You know the Tartarian whoſe captiues we are, hath an elder brother, a very rich man, who of late is become blind and deafe, by reaſon of a great cattarch and defluction which is fallen downe into his eyes and eares, wherewith his brother ſeemes to be much afflicted: I haue a jewel which my L great Lord and husband gaue me when we were made ſure, the which I haue kept carefully, hiding it ſometimes in my haire, ſometimes in my old tatterd rags which I haue worne ſince my captiuitie, the which I haue much eſteemed; for that my deare ſpouſe had aſſured mee, that the ſtone which was ſet in this jewell had many and ſingular vertues, and amongſt others, that it would reſtore the ſight, which had been loſt by defluction, and cure deafeneſſe, ſo as it were not naturall or too inueterate. I am reſolued to take out the ſtone, and deliuer it thee: after thou haſt ſounded the Tartarian, whither hee will ſet thee at libertie if thou doeſt cure his brother of his infirmities; making him ſweare ſolemnly not to retaine the ſtone, but to ſuffer thee to carrie it away, to the end thou maieſt reſtore it vnto me without his knowledge. Hauing reſolued vpon this plot, the Ladie ſaid vnto him, You muſt alſo demand of the ſicke M man a horſe and ſome money, with paſſe-ports to goe into your Countrey, to the end thou maieſt goe ſpeedily to my deare husband, whereſoeuer thou ſhalt heare of him, and to deliuer him my letters, and bring mee an anſwere if it be poſſible. The Polonian hauing ſworne to performe whatſoeuer the Ladie commanded him beeing at libertie; the princeſſe deliuered him the ſtone, he ſwearing to reſtore it vnto her againe, as ſoone as he had done his cure, if it were not taken from him by violence.

The Polonian attended with impatiencie vntill the Tartarian did talke vnto him of his brothers infirmitie: who finding him one day much afflicted, tooke occaſion to tell him, that hee knew a certaine meanes how to cure his brother, without any paine, or taking any thing inwardly: I beleeue nothing, replied the Tartarian; for all the Phyſitions in the Countrey could not doe it; but if he could effect his ſaying, hee promiſed to ſet him at libertie without ranſome, and to giue him wherewithall to conduct him into his countrie: it is the recompence, ſaid the priſoner, I meant to demand, and that you ſweare vnto me by your great God not to faile of your promiſe when I haue performed mine, and not to retaine, nor ſuffer any one to take from me the thing I ſhall vſe in the cure. The Tartarian hauing ſolemnly ſworne, and layed his right hand vpon his heart, the Polonian tooke a time to make preparation for his cure. The Tartarian although he diſtruſted his new phyſition, yet he acquainted his brother with the proiect, who beeing deſirous to recouer his ſences, intreated his brother not to neglect the offer, promiſing to ſaue him harmeleſſe, both in regard of the ranſome which hee expected from the Polonian, and for the money he ſhould giue him. The day appointed being come, the Tartarian preſt the priſoner to perform his promiſe; to whom the ſicke man alſo promiſed a horſe and fiftie chequines to returne into his countrie, taking the ſame oath which his brother had formerly done. All things being readie, he applied his phyſicall ſtone, binding it faſt to one of his eyes for the ſpace of ſeuen houres, after which being taken away he ſaw clearely, and in like manner he recouered his other eye, and afterwards his hearing by the like application: whereat the Tartarians much reioyced, giuing vnto the Polonian what they had promiſed, and procuring him paſſe-ports from the Gouernour, without which hee could hardly get out of the countrie.

The Polonian before his departure told the Tartarian Captaine that hee had a ſuit vnto him, that was, that the Polonian woman which was alſo his priſoner was his neere kinſwoman, entreating him that in reſpect of his good office he had done to his brother, hee would vſe her and her little infant better, and that as ſoone as he were returned into his countrey, he would take a courſe for her ranſome, and it might be would bring it himſelfe. The Polonian hauing acquainted the Ladie with what had paſt, and deliuered her iewell faithfully vnto her, hauing receiued her letters to prince Coreſkie, and vowed to finde him out, hee tooke his leaue. This Polonian trauelling towards his countrey, met with one of the ſame nation, who hauing beene taken priſoner with prince Alexander, made an eſcape: theſe two diſcourſing freely of their aduentures, Iaques enquired carefully what was become of the princes which had beene carried priſoners to Conſtantinople by Skinder Baſſa, and eſpecially of Coreſkie; and hearing that hee was in the priſons of the Blacke Sea, hee enquired by what meanes he might ſpeake with this prince, or at leaſt how hee might conuey ſome letters vnto him: to whome hee anſwered, that it was verie difficult, for that he was ſtraightly guarded. But hee vnderſtood that the French Embaſſadour had ſometimes leaue to ſend to viſit him, whereof he might informe himſelfe more particularly. After this, Iaques intreated his countryman to deliuer certaine letters which the princeſſe had written vnto her kinſfolkes, the which hee promiſed to performe faithfully, and ſo they parted. Iaques comming to Conſtantinople, hee grew acquainted with one of the French Embaſſadours men, who was ſometimes employed to viſit the prince, and to carrie him mony and other neceſſaries, by whoſe meanes hee got acceſſe vnto the Prince, and deliuered his letters, the which hee receiued with much joy, hearing of his wiues health. Eight daies after, the Polonian comming to viſit the Prince, he receiued from him an anſwere to his wife, and ſo tooke his leaue; who after many troubleſome encounters, returned to Bialigrot, where finding the Ladie all alone (the Tartarian and his ſeruants being gone a hunting) he gaue an account vnto her of his negotiation, and deliuered his letters, whereat ſhee was much joyed, hearing that hee was aliue, though infinitly grieued for his captiuitie, vnderſtanding that the Grand Seigniour had refuſed to put him to ranſome. After their diſcourſe, the princeſſe aduertiſed her faithful Agent, That ſince his departure, the Tartar had grown jealous of her qualitie, and had enquired of her what her husband, her kinsfolkes and their eſtates were; to whome ſhe had anſwered, that her husband was a captaine who had been taken priſoner with prince Alexander, and carried with him into Turkie; and as for her other kinsfolkes they were all ſouldiers, which had beene ruined during the troubles of Moldauia: deſiring the Polonian to remember it well, leaſt they ſhould be found to differ when they ſhould come to treat of her ranſome. The Tartarian returning ſoone after to his houſe, he found Iaques the Polonian there, whom he entertained verie kindly, both in reward of the good offices he had done to his brother, and for the hope hee had of his priſoners ranſome, remembring that Iaques had told him that ſhe was his kinſwoman, and that it might be he would bring it. After ſome little diſcourſe, Iaques asked him, What ranſome hee would require for his Polonian Priſoner? to whom the Tartarian anſwered, That he would haue 6000 Chequines for her and her ſonne, vnleſſe hee would giue him the ſtone with the which he had cured his brother: to whom the Polonian replyed, That as for the ſtone it was not in his power, hauing reſtored it to a Nobleman whome hee had followed when hee was taken priſoner. And as for the ranſome which hee demaunded for his priſoner and her childe, it was more than ſhe and all her kindred were worth, ſhe beeing wife to a Captaine who had beene taken priſoner at the defeat of Alexander, and for want of means was ſtill detained. The Tartarian interrupted him; ſaying, That hee vnderſtood ſhee was of noble extraction, and that ſhee had rich kinsfolkes, who would not ſuffer her to ſpend her life in captiuitie. I confeſſe ſaid the Polonian, that ſhee is iſſued from Noble parents, but they are ruined during the troubles of Moldauia; adding withall, that he would not haue returned if he had thought hee would haue demaunded aboue 1000 Chequines, the which he offered him, intreating him to accept it, in regard ſhee was his kinſwoman, and for the good office he had done for his brother. You haue beene ſatisfied, replyed the Tartarian, and haue no cauſe to complaine: Notwithſtanding after ſome conteſting, by the mediation of the captaines brother, who had beene ſo well cured, the ladies ranſome was ſet at three thouſand Chequines, whereof her faithfull agent gaue preſent intelligence to prince Charles brother to prince Cereskie, who ſent this ſumme with all poſſible ſpeed; and ſo the princeſſe and her little infant were redeemed from captiuitie, and conducted into Polonia by their faithfull ſolicitor: From whence ſhee aduertiſed the prince by letters of her deliuerie. This relation was written by a Frenchman, who by his report was preſent in all the troubles of Moldauia: but as touching her deliuerie by meanes of the cure, I cannot warrant it, but leaue it to the cenſure of Phyſitions and Naturaliſts, who can beſt judge of the vertues of ſtones, hearbes, and plants; but it is certaine that ſhee was impriſoned and ranſomed as an vnknowne perſon.

A Chiaus ſent from Conſtantinople to Paris.

In the yeare 1617, there came to Paris a Chiaus, a Spaniſh Renegado, called Solyman, ſent from Conſtantinople with letters from the Emperor Achmat to the king, for the deliuerie of eight and twentie ſlaues, who had redeemed their libertie for money in diuers ports of Italie, and in their returne to Conſtantinople, had been taken by the ſhips of Marceilles: the King cauſed them to be ſet at libertie. But the Chiaus had alſo charge to intreat his Maieſtie to cauſe iuſtice to be done vnto the Moores Grannadines, expelled out of Spaine, and wronged in their goods and perſons, vpon their paſſage into France; wherein hee had what contentment he could expect of iuſtice. Notwithſtanding he did witneſſe openly his amaſement at their long delaies, in the diſpatch of ſuits; ſaying plainly, That France which had the reputation throughout the world, to maintaine euery mans right inuiolably, did no Iuſtice, but after long and tedious purſuits; and that the execution of decrees, was many times longer than the ſuit it ſelfe. Whereas the Turkes Iuſtice (ſaid hee) was ſpeedily adminiſtred to euery man; and within eight dayes they ſaw an end of the greateſt and moſt important ſuits. This Chiaus was fauourably entertained, and defraied with his traine for the ſpace of ſix or ſeuen moneths at the kings charge.

The cauſe of his voyage.

The eſtate of the Turks Empire this yeare.

As the Turkes eſtate hath not growne great but by combuſtions, ſo it is ordinarily full of troubles; whereby it ſeemes that the preſeruation thereof depends in making warre vpon others, or to ſupport it when as neighbour princes ſeeke to recouer that which they had vniuſtly wreſted from them, by the Othoman force. So this "great eſtate entertained this yeare foure great armies, two at land, the one againſt the Perſians his antient enemie, the other

And two nauall armies, the one in the Blacke ſea againſt the Coſſackes or Ruſſians, who made daily incurſions into the Othomans Countrey, men wholly giuen to armes, which goe to ſea in ſmall boats, able to carrie but fiue or ſix men, made of the bodies of hollow trees;
but they are in a manner inuincible with theſe kind of boats: for when as the diſaduantage of a combat forces them to ſound a retreat,they retire neere vnto the land, and in ſuch places whereas the Turkiſh gallies cannot approch; and ſo they eaſily preuent a totall ouerthrow.
Finally, in caſe of neceſſitie they carrie their veſſels with them. For in the end of the laſt yeare finding the paſſage of the Blacke ſea ſtopped at the mouth of the riuer of Danow
B by the Turkiſh gallies, they put their boats into carts,and taking the way by the mountaines, they brought them eaſily into the ſea. The Turkes fourth armie is in the white ſea, as they call it, employed either to conduct the Carauan, which brings the tribute from Ægypt to Conſtantinople, or in ſearch of the gallies of Malta and Florence,which ſcoure thoſe ſeas continually to annoy the Turke. The armie againſt the Perſian is led by Haly Baſſa, ſucceſſor to Mehemet Baſſa, hee who fled into Perſia after that hee had loſt threeſcore thouſand men in a ſet a battell: after which beeing ſent for to come vnto Conſtantinople, fearing that the Sultan would take reuenge of ſo great a loſſe vpon his life, hee retired to the Sophie,where he now remaines.

The Turkes complaine to the Venetians of the Vſcoques ſpoiles.

The Turks being much annoyed both at ſea and land by the Vſcoques,made great complaint
C to the Eſtate of Venice, with whome they are in league,beeing greatly grieued at their thefts; and complayning much that they could not paſſe by ſea without danger of ſeruitude or death: adding withall,that theſe pyrats hauing gotten a way into Turkie by the Venetians territories, they were by them made ſlaues and ſlaine in their owne countries; and although they went not from their houſes, nor vndertooke any voyages, yet they were ſtill in alarme, and ſubiect vnto ruine. That the ſmall reſiſtance which was made, gaue great cauſe of jealouſie, that there was ſome ſecret intelligence betwixt the ſubiects of the Seigniory of Venice and the Vſcoques, and that they diuided the ſpoile betwixt them. Finally, that in what ſort ſoeuer the matter paſt, they held them inſupportable to all men,but eſpecially to themſelues.
The Turkes threatened to take their juſt reuenge, the which beeing impoſſible to effect in D the countrie of the Vſcoques(for that by the letters of the commonwealth of Venice their paſſage was ſtopped) they reſolued to be reuenged vpon their ſubiects,and recouer a part of their goods which they had loſt. Finally,they prepared to come into the gulph of Venice with a mightie armie, the which without doubt had brought that State into great extremities, and been verie preiudiciall to many prouinces of Chriſtendome. But for that the inſolencies and thefts of the Vſcoques had like to haue ingaged the Venetians in a dangerous warre againſt the Turke with whome they were in league, it ſhall neither be vnpleaſant nor vnprofitable to make a little digreſſion, and ſhew what theſe Vſcoques were. About the yeare 1550, there aſſembled together in certaine plaines neere the ſea belonging to the princes of the houſe of Auſtria, people (who were cruell, violent, and infamous) from diuers parts of E the countrey of Chimera, Dalmatia, and the other confines of Hungarie, and ſuch as had beene baniſhed from the State of Venice; whoſe delight was onely to liue vpon ſpoyle and bloud. All theſe theeues beeing thus gathered together (whome they called by a generall name Vſcoques) as enemies to all art and induſtrie to liue honeſtly by their labours, retired themſelues into a deſart countrey, receiuing no pay from the Princes of Auſtria who commaunds there. Being thus by their naturall inclination giuen to ſpoyle, adding thereunto the ſpurre of pouertie, nothing mooued them to ſtay in thoſe places, but all libertie was left them to rob and ſpoyle: whereupon they applyed all their mindes and forces; ſo as hauing made certaine light foiſts, they began to make courſes at ſea, with the moſt barbarous and impious crueltie that euer was practiſed amongſt the Scithians,Tartarians, or any other inhumane F Nation whatſoeuer. And for that it is an ordinarie courſe for any one that will commit a great villanie,to ſeeke out ſome goodly pretext to couer it: ſo they concluded among themſelues, to ſhadow their inſolencies and thefts with a colour to goe againſt the Infidels.
Wherefore in the beginning, there were no merchants were they Turkes,Iewes, or ſubiects to the Turke, although they were Chriſtians, but if they entred into the gulfe either to trafique or to furniſh Venice with prouiſion and merchandiſe, they were taken by them, their goods diuided amongſt them, and they forced to pay a great ranſome, or to die miſerably. All the ports of the State of Venice, both of Iſtria, Dalmatia, and the Iſlands from whence they receiued their victuals and prouiſion, were ſoone after ſhut vp by theſe pyrats; who not content to ſpoile the Turks (which trafficked no more by reaſon of their great dangers and loſſe) allured by the rich ſpoiles which they tooke, and the deſire they had to encounter them, they began to ſet vpon the Venetian ſhips, forcing the merchants whom they tooke to confeſſe by torments, that the goods belonged to Turks, although in effect their chiefe booty came from Chriſtians. Hauing drawn many vnto them of their owne humors, and thinking their ſpoyles at ſea not ſufficient to ſatisfie their couetous deſires, nor the preſents which they were to giue to others, to bee faored and ſupported in the courts of princes, they ſtaied not long before they entered with all violence into the Turkes countrey, through the Venetian territorie, to whom they were as hurtfull as to the Turks; from whence they carried away rich ſpoiles and many priſoners. There was nothing that was precious, rich, or good, but was ſubiect to the inſatiable greedineſſe of thoſe pittileſſe theeues and pyrats, if paſſing by ſea they came neere vnthe maritine coaſts. Wherupon grew the great complaint you haue heard made by the Turks, threatening to be reuenged vpon the Eſtate of Venice for the inſolencie of the Vſcoques, which afterward bred a cruell war, betwixt that State and the Archduke Ferdinand of Grets, now Emperour, who ſeemed to ſupport them, thereby to ingage the State in a war with the Turke. But for that the ſucceſſe thereof doth not belong to our hiſtorie, wee will leaue it to them that haue written it at large.

Death of Achmat.

The diſpoſition of Sultan Achmat.

On the fifteenth of Nouember this yeare, Sultan Achmat Chan hauing liued 30 yeares, and gouerned that great Empire of Turkie fifteene, died. When he came to the Empire he was but fifteene yeares old; hee was of a good conſtitution, well complexioned, and ſomewhat enclined to bee fat, ſtrong and actiue, which appeared by his exerciſe in caſting of a horſemans mace of nine or ten pounds weight, wherein hee exceeded any one of his Court; in memorie whereof there are two pillars ſet vp in one of the courts of the Seraglio at Conſtantinople, with an inſcription, as markes of his dexteritie. Hee was by nature ambitious and proud, which ſome hold qualities befitting his great eſtate. He was not ſo cruell as many of his predeceſſors: but he was much giuen to ſenſualitie and pleaſure; for the which hee entertained three thouſand concubines and virgines in a Seraglio; beeing the faireſt daughters of the Chriſtians. His mother was a Chriſtian of Boſna, or of Cyprus; and therefore it is thought he was ſomewhat fauorable to Chriſtians. He was much delighted in hawking and hunting; and namely for hawking he kept in Grecia and Natolia fortie thouſand faulkoners, who attended his comming, and kept his hawkes in their ſeuerall places of charge, and had good yearely penſions. Neither were his huntſmen much fewer in number, or of leſſe charge. As the Turkiſh Emperours are bound by the law of their religion once euery day to practiſe ſome manuall trade, ſo Mahomet his father gaue himſelfe to the making of arrowes, and Achmat to the faſhioning of horne rings, ſuch as the Turkes weare when they draw their bowes: This they doe in the morning, after they are readie and haue ſaid their prayers, then they call for their exerciſe, but it is only for forme, for they ſcarce make an arrow or a ring in a whole yeare.

MUSTAPHA BROTHER TO ACHMAT AND SONNE TO MAHOMET THE THIRD, THE NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TURKES

Nought but Affliction, thundring out of Heauen, makes men of earth to any goodneſſe giuen:
Nor longer than ſhe thunders, any feare
that any Heauen holds any Thunderer:
So Muſtapha, while Heauen reſtrain'd his State,
and held him fettered in his brothers hate,
To vertuous actions did his ſtudies driue;
was courteous, pious, and contemplatiue:
But when his brother could no longer liue,
and Libertie did to him Power giue;
Then Pride, and Tyrannie, his horſes were,
and driue him alwaies paſt Heauens Loue or Feare.
Greatneſſe on Goodneſſe, loues to ſlide, not ſtand,
and leaues for Fortunes ice, Vertues firme land.
Honour had rather be with danger driuen, than ſtay with Vertue on the hand of Heauen.

THE RAIGNE OF MVSTAPHA,
THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, NINTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

Muſtapha aduanced to the Empire.

OSman the eldeſt ſonne of Achmat, beeing not aboue twelue yeares old, Muſtapha brother to Achmat, being fiue and twentie, was drawne out of a cell where hee liued as it were religiouſly and in contemplation; and proclaimed Sultan Muſtapha Chan. They write of him, that hee grew cruell, cauſing young Oſman to bee kept vnder ſure guards, putting to death his brethren: Hee alſo did many indignities vnto the Chriſtian Embaſſadours; and to confirme him in his Throne, hee gaue great ſummes of money to the Ianizaries and Spahie's; and ſent a meſſenger to Vienna to the Emperour, to aſſure him that hee would maintaine inuiolably whatſoeuer had beene concluded betwixt him and his deceaſed brother, Achmat. But growing odious by reaſon of his tyrannie, the Grand Viſier came out of Perſiia with an armie and depoſed him, forcing him to rerurne to his cell, ſetting prince Oſman at libertie, and ſeating him in the Imperiall Throne. But for that it may ſeeme ſtrange, that Muſtapha ſhould be preſerued aliue during the raigne of his brother Achmat (contrarie to the cuſtome of the Othoman Emperours, who doe vſually kill all their brethren at their firſt comming to the crowne, thinking thereby the better to aſſure their eſtates) it ſhal be fit to make mention thereof. Mahomet the third of that name, dying in the yeare 1602, and leauing Achmat and Muſtapha his ſonnes by the Sultana Flatra a Ladie of Cyprus, ſome ſay of Boſna, Achmat the eldeſt was ſent for ſpeedily out of Magneſia, by the Baſſaes, to take poſſeſſion of his fathers Crowne, beeing the firſt Emperour of that name. And for that the cuſtome of the Turkiſh Emperours was (as wee haue ſaid) to haue neither brother nor nephew aliue, vnleſſe they could ſaue themſelues by flight; yet the Viſier Baſſaes, and other officers of the court concluded in Councell, that it was not fit that Muſtapha brother to Achmat ſhould die; grounding their opinion vpon a good reaſon of State, for that their Emperour beeing but fifteene yeares old, they feared (that dying in his nonage, without children able to gouerne) the Empire might fall into combuſtion, and ruine it ſelfe by reaſon of ciuile wars. Whereupon they decreed, that Muſtapha's life ſhould bee preſerued; but with that caution and reſtriction, that hee ſhould remaine ſtill a priſoner in ſome chambers of the Emperours Seraglio at Conſtantinople.

Depoſed again.

During Achmats minoritie, and before he had children, there was no cruell decree made againſt Muſtapha, but hee onely continued in his contemplation without any libertie: But when as the Emperor ſaw himſelfe fortified with iſſue, and remembring the cruell cuſtome of his predeceſſours, hee many times propounded the putting of his brother to death to his Councell: the which may ſeeme verie ſtrange it tooke not effect, hauing beene often concluded. Among others, it is written that his death was concluded one euening, and that it ſhould G haue beene put in execution the next day: But Achmat was ſo frighted in the night with apparitions and fearefull dreames, as day beeing come, he ſaid, Seeing that the onely reſolution to put his brother to death had ſo terrified him, he did beleeue that his torments would much increaſe if he ſhould put it in execution; and therefore hee commanded his brother ſhould liue, more in regard of the terror of his mind, than for any brotherly affection. Another time Sultan Achmat being in one of the windowes of his Seraglio, he beheld his brother Muſtapha, who by his permiſſion was walking in the gardens with his guard: Some one of his Baſſaes or other officers that was neere vnto him, and willing to flatter his humour, told him that it was a matter of dangerous conſequence to ſuffer him to haue ſo great libertie. Achmat (moued with jealouſie and diſtruſt) grew into rage at his words, whereupon hee ſuddenly tooke his bow and arrow (beeing a verie expert archer, as all the Turkiſh Nation generally H are) and aimed at his brother to kill him; but at that verie inſtant hee felt ſo great a paine in his arme and ſhoulder, as not able to let looſe his arrow, nor to performe what hee had intended, hee ſaid with a loud voyce, That Mahomet would not haue Muſtapha to die. This prince had three chambers in the Seraglio, where hee remained a priſoner fifteene yeares, and ſpent his time in a contemplatiue kind of life, after the manner of the Muſulmans; his whole delight was to read the Arabian bookes of their doctors in diuers ſciences. The Grand Seignior gaue him leaue ſometimes to take the aire of his gardens with his guard, and called him to conſult with him of affaires of eſtate, taking his aduice many times, knowing him to bee of a ſound judgement.

After a long impriſonment, and a daily apprehenſion of death, the Emperour Achmat falling I grieuouſly ſicke in Nouember, as you haue heard, his Baſſaes and other Councellours about him (ſeeing the danger hee was in) perſuaded him to take ſome good courſe for the ſucceſſion of his Empire. Hee had children by the Sultana, but they ſo young as they were not capable to gouern the Empire. Moreouer, this Sultana was dead, and the children left friendleſſe, and none to ſpeake for them. But on the other ſide the Sultana Flatra mother to the Emperour Muſtapha was yet liuing, who thought that if the Baſſaes ſhould vndertake to gouerne the State during the minoritie of the Emperors children, her honor would be much eclipſed:
wherefore ſhe fauored Muſtapha, & perſuaded the dying Emperor to make him his ſucceſſour.
On the 15 of Nouember Achmat ſeeing his end grow neere, he called for his brother, and told K him, that ſeeing death approched, hee deſired to prouide for the preſeruation of the Empire, and therefore had made choice of him to ſucceed him, intreating him to take the gouernment vpon him preſently after his death. Muſtapha was much amaſed at his ſpeech, and anſwered him with words full of feare and humilitie, That he might not accept of the honour which he did him, ſeeing that the Empire did rightly belong vnto his eldeſt ſonne. Achmat diſabled his ſonne for ſo great a gouernement, both for his age and capacitie; beeing neceſſarie for the maintenance of ſo great a monarchie, that hee (who was of ripe yeares and deepe judgement) ſhould take vpon him the mannaging thereof; recommending the Children hee had by the Sultana, vnto him; intreating him to vſe them in the ſame manner that hee had vſed him; leauing the other children which he had by concubines beeing his ſlaues, to his diſcretion. L Soone after theſe words, Achmat dyed, and Muſtapha was generally acknowledged for ſucceſſour to the Turkiſh Empire: who at the firſt was ſo amaſed as he thought he had beene in a dreame, to ſee himſelfe aduanced to ſo great a power and ſoueraigntie, from a ſtraight priſon and a daily apprehenſion of death. At his firſt comming to the Empire, he cauſed the Perſian Embaſſadour to be ſet at libertie, whom his brother Achmat had cauſed to be reſtrained contrarie to the publique faith; for that newes came vnto the court of ſome combuſtions rayſed by the Perſian. After which hee ſent ſpeedily to the Baſſa of Buda in Hungarie, commaunding him to entertaine the treatie of peace made by his predeceſſor with the Emperour inuiolably. Yet notwithſtanding he carried himſelfe during the ſmall time of his raigne inſolently and cruelly; for violating the Laws of Nations, he had ill intreated the baron M of Mole ar Sancie Embaſſadour to the moſt Chriſtian King, ſetting guards vpon him as a priſoner, hauing cauſed his people to be put in priſon, and tortured after their manner. The reaſon of this indignitie which Muſtapha did vnto the French Embaſſador, and to his people,

A grew vpon an occaſion which will require an ample diſcourſe; for the better vnderſtanding of that which hath gone before. After the ouerthrow and taking of the Princes of Moldauia, Prince Coreskie, as you haue heard, was brought by Skinder Baſſa to Conſtantinople; whereat the Grand Seignior was wonderfully well pleaſed, for that he was held (euen by his enemies) for one of the moſt valiant and redoubted princes of Chriſtendome; wherefore hee was ſent away priſoner, and confined to the towers of the blacke ſea, the which are diſtant fiue miles from Conſtantinople; a place appointed for the guard of priſoners of great qualitie and importance, ſuch as hee was. Hee was ſhut vp with a French Captaine called Rigaut, in a little Chamber which was on the top of one of thoſe towers, in which chamber there was a window capable for a man to paſſe through, and yet it had no barres for that the B height of the place freed it from all ſuſpition. This prince was much ſolicited by the Turke to become a Renegado, as the Princes Alexander and Bougdan his brothers in law had done;
but hee reſiſted it with a generous reſolution, reſoluing rather to die in that tedious captiuity, than to commit ſo baſe an act againſt God and his conſcience: The which beeing made knowne vnto the King of Polonia, it mooued him to compaſſion, and made him write to the French Embaſſadour, and to entreat him to bee a meanes that this prince might be put to ranſome, and freed from captiuitie, at what price ſoeuer; the which the Embaſſador durſt not vndertake, although hee deſired it much, for that hee had no charge from the King his Maſter. The Emperours Embaſſadour did what poſſibly hee could, knowing how much the libertie of this prince might be auaileable to Chriſtendome: For which conſiderations, C the Turke would not yeeld in any ſort to ſuffer him to be releaſed; ſo as the friends of this captiue prince were out of hope euer to ſee him at libertie. But moſt commonly in ſuch extremities the Almightie workes by the ſecret inſtruments of his Diuine prouidence, and giues aſſiſtance vnto them that feare him, when as all humane helpe and hope failes, as you may vnderſtand in the ſequell of this hiſtorie: whence grew the Embaſſadours affront which he receiued.

The generous reſolution of prince Coreskie

About the ſame time, there had beene a Ladie taken out of Podolia with a faire young daughter of hers and a maid ſeruant, by the Tartarians, who ſould them vnto a Turke, and hee brought them vnto Conſtantinople to make his profit. This Ladie who was a Chriſtian, hearing nothing from her husband for the ſpace of nine moneths, went accompanied D with her daughter to the French Embaſſadours houſe which was at Pera, to craue his aid and aſſiſtance; where his Secretarie (who was called Martine) mooued with compaſſion and loue, promiſed vnto them all ſeruice, and afterwards aſſured the mother, that if ſhee would promiſe hee ſhould marrie her daughter, hee would endeauour to redeeme them from captiuitie: whereunto the Ladies yeelded, and they paſſed their promiſe in writing to the Secretarie; whereupon he payed two thouſand and fiue hundered crowns for their ranſome, and ſent them home into their countrey. Being returned, the Ladie made her husband and the reſt of her friends acquainted how they had beene freed from captiuitie; and of the contract of marriage which was paſt betweene her daughter and the French Embaſſadours Secretarie; but the father did altogether diſlike of this marriage, for that E Martine, hee ſaid, was no Gentleman, and had not an eſtate to entertaine his daughter according to her qualitie. The mother aduertiſed Martine ſoone after of the fathers refuſall; protesting vnto him, that he alone was the hinderance: and as for the mony which hee had disburſed for their ranſome, they would ſend it vnto him if hee pleaſed to Conſtantinople with intereſt. Martine was much diſcontented, and diuers Letters and expoſtulations paſt betwixt them, but he could not obtaine the execution of his deſire, and their promiſe; whereupon he grew full of griefe and melancholie, and thereupon went to viſite prince Coreskie who was in the Blacke Tower, to make his complaint vnto him, and to take his aduice what courſe were beſt for him to follow: Hee made his excuſe that hee had been ſent by his maſter to carrie the prince ſome money, as he had done at other times, who making the prince F acquainted with his diſcontent (for that he knew theſe Podolians, and had formerly allowed of the ſuit which he had made to this virgin) hee comforted him, ſaying, That if he might by any meanes get out of priſon, hee would willingly ſupplie the defects which they obiected againſt him, and would maintaine him againſt all that ſhould oppoſe themſelues againſt the accompliſhing of his deſires. This made Martine ſtudie by what meanes hee might free the prince, to the end hee might binde him to ſuccour him when hee was at libertie; G and loue which is many times the author of many goodly inuentions, ſuggeſted one vnto him which was verie ſubtile and difficult to execute: which was to ſend vnto prince Coreskie a bottome of packthread in a little pie, which hee ſent him with other meat, aduertiſing him by a letter, that vpon a certaine night concluded betwixt them, he ſhould put downe the packthred at his chamber window, whereunto a ladder of cords ſhould bee tyed, by the which hee might deſcend from the tower: the which was afterwards punctually effected, not by Martine himſelfe, but by a Greeke prieſt, who liued in Conſtantinople, to whome he had imparted his enterpriſe, and had ingaged him vpon hope of great reward from the prince.

In the meane time Martine doubting that hee ſhould be ſuſpected to practiſe this eſcape, reſolued to be gone, and tooke leaue of the Embaſſadour, whome hee gaue to vnderſtand H that hee had ſome ſpeciall vrgent affaires which did preſſe his ſpeedie returne into France; and therefore he left the execution of his deſigne to the Greeke prieſt, who failed not at the time appointed to doe as the Secretarie had directed him. The Prince hauing drawne vp this ladder of ropes with the helpe of his packthread, and beeing come to the foot of the tower, with his chamber fellow, hee found the Greeke prieſt attending for them, who told him that he had charge from Martine to conduct them to a certaine caue, which was in a great rocke a league from thence, where they muſt remaine all the day, and that in the euening hee would not faile to come vnto them, and bring them habits like vnto his owne, that beeing ſo diſguiſed, hee might conduct them to his lodging in Conſtantinople, and there conceale them as long as they ſhould thinke fit. This deuice pleaſed them well, and ſo I they went all three vnto the ſaid caue, whereas the two Cameradoes hid themſelues, and the prieſt returned to his houſe.

At the breake of day, it beeing the three and twentieth of Nouember 1617, ſome of the guards entering the priſoners chamber, ſaw that they were eſcaped, and found the ladder of ropes which they had vſed, tied to the window; whereat they were much amaſed, knowing well that they ſhould ſmart for it: notwithſtanding hee who had charge of the priſons, ſent ſpeedily to Conſtantinople, to giue notice of their eſcapes. As ſoone as this was knowne they ſent poſts ſpeedily to all parts, to make inquirie of theſe fugitiues, eſpecially at the parts, and paſſages, giuing them ſpeciall charge to obſerue all men that paſſed, if there were not one K who had the little finger of his right hand ſhrunke vp as prince Coreskie had by a wound which hee had receiued. Within few dayes after, the Turke ſeiſed vpon the ſeruants of the Baron of Sancie or Mole, Embaſſadour for the French, torturing two of them after their manner; which is to lay the partie vpon a table on his bellie, and to giue him three or foure hundred blowes with a ſtaffe vpon the ſoles of their feet, the calues of their legges, and their buttockes, yet could they not make them ſay any thing that might charge their maſter, as theſe Turkiſh tormentors did hope. Not content heerewith, they did as much to a poore Turke, who was a weauer by his trade, and dwelt neere vnto the Embaſſadour, thinking to force him by this cruell torture to depoſe falſly, that hee had ſeene the Secretarie Martine going and comming to his maſters lodging, vntill the time of the priſoners eſcape; but God would L not ſuffer the weauer to depoſe any thing but the trueth, notwithſtanding all the miſerable and cruell torments which hee had ſuffered. The which is worthie the obſeruation, for that the Turkes doe generally hate Chriſtians mortally, and doe greatly reioyce at their diſaſters.

As for the guards of the Towers, ſome of them were empayled, and ſome were pounded or beaten to pieces in great mortars of yron, wherein they doe vſually pound their rice to reduce it to meale.

Three daies after, the Chiaus Baſſa had charge to ſeiſe vpon the perſon of the French Embaſſadour, the which hee performed verie ſeuerely and vnciuilly, without any reſpect vnto his qualitie. Hauing taken him, the ſaid Chiaus led him vnto the Viſiers houſe, where hauing beene examined vpon many circumſtances touching the eſcape of prince Coreskie, M they left him as a priſoner in the hands of the ſaid Chiaus, where hee continued for the ſpace of three daies, during the which, the ſaid Embaſſadour deſiring to write to ſome of his friends, and alſo to ſpeake with the Muſti which is the Turks high prieſt, to acquaint him with his

A his juſt grieuances, he could not obtaine leaue, but by giuing two thouſand crownes vnto his Iaylor: True it is, that this Preſent made the Chiaus tell the Embaſſador, that if he would obtaine any fauour from the Muphti, he muſt procure it by money; according to which aduice he gaue three or foure thouſand crownes, whereupon the Muphti became tractable, acquainting the grand Seigniour Muſtapha with the Embaſſadours juſt complaints, and of what importance his detention was, ſeeing there was nothing found to charge him, That he had fauoured the eſcape of Prince Coreskie, as it was ſuſpected; and that his Secretarie who had practiſed it for his owne priuat profit, had left his Maſter aboue ten or twelue dayes before the ſaid eſcape, with an intent as he ſaid to returne into France. Finally, that all the world would tax him to haue violated the law of Nations, and that no Chriſtian Prince nor other would B hereafter put any confidence in him, and it was to be feared, that they would all joine together, and make war againſt him: and in truth the Embaſſadors, both the King of Englands and the Low Countries, were much diſcontented at this vnworthy vſage of the French, proteſting openly, That if he were not ſpeedily ſet at libertie, they would retyre themſelues into their Countries. All which conſiderations repreſented by the Muphti, mooued the grand Seigniour to command, that the ſaid Baron of Mole or Sancie ſhould be ſent backe to his houſe without any further diſpleaſure. But all this could not free his houſehold ſeruants from their impriſonment, but he was forced to pay two or three and twenty thouſand crowns for their redemption; for elſe they ſhould haue beene ſo tormented, as their liues had been in danger: for ſo they were threatened. Soone after, the grand Viſier hearing of the tyrannous gouernment of Sultan Muſtapha, returned from Perſia with his whole armie towards C Conſtantinople, where he forced him to leaue the Empire, and to retyre to his Cell, hauing raigned but two moneths and ſome odd dayes.

The Embaſſador ſet at libertie.

But to returne to Prince Coreskie, whom we left with Captaine Rigaut in the lodging of the Greeke Prieſt at Conſtantinople, whereas they lay hidden for the ſpace of two moneths, vntill that their good Hoſt got leaue from the Patriarke of Alexandria, as well for himſelfe, as for two others (who he ſaid were of his ſocietie) to go and confine themſelues in the deſarts of the Archipelagus, wito many Hermits which liued there after the manner of the antient Anchorites. Hauing gotten this leaue and paſport, they embarqued, being diſguiſed like Prieſts, and arriued at Etchut, where they found an Engliſh ſhip readie to ſet ſaile for Meſſina in Sicilie, from whence he went by land to Naples, where he made himſelfe knowne to D the King of Polands Embaſſador, who was wonderfull glad of his libertie, leading him to the Duke of Oſſuna, then Viceroy of Naples, who furniſhed him with all things neceſſarie, and a good conuoy to go to Rome, where the Pope receiued ſingular content to ſee him, and to heare of his ſtrange aduentures. From thence he paſt to Vienna, where the Emperour entertained him according to his merits. After which he retyred to his owne houſe, full of honour, gotten by his valour and conſtancie in his afflictions. Our Embaſſador that was late in Conſtantinople ſaith, he eſcaped by the blacke ſea, and ſo into Polonia.

Prince Coresky eſcapes from Conſtantinople.

OSMAN

OSMAN THE FIRST OF that name, tenth Emperour of the Turks,

he that now ſwaieth that mightie Empire.

1618

The French king ſends to Conſtantinople.

PRince Oſman beeing ſet at libertie by the graund Viſier, hee cauſed him to bee proclaimed Sultan, and ſeated in the Imperiall throne of the Othomans, with the generall
C applauſe of all the Baſſaes and armie. The French Embaſſadour beeing by the ſame meanes freed from rhis guard, aduertiſed the King his Maſter, how barbaouſly hee had beene entreated by Muſtapha, entreating his Maieſtie to reuoke him from that charge. Whereupon the King ſent two Gentlemen to Conſtantinople to the new Emperor Oſman, to demand reparation of the indignitie done vnto his Embaſſador and Secretarie; and to let him vnderſtand, that hee could not ſend any other Embaſſadour to his Court to condole the death of Sultan
D Achmat his father, nor congratulate his comming to the Eaſt, vntill that hee had receiued ſatisfaction from him befitting his dignitie, and the wrongs hee had receiued in his Embaſſador.
The Grand Viſier and the Muphti hearing this Embaſſie, and conſidering of the actions which had paſſed, aduiſed the Emperor Oſman to ſend an Embaſſadour to the moſt Chriſtian King, to confirme their league, and to teſtifie both by word and letters how much he was diſpleaſed for his diſcontent.

The Turk ſends an Embaſſador into France.

The Grand Seigniour by the aduice of his Viſier and others, ſent Vri Chiaus into France, to confirme the articles of peace betwixt the French and the Turks. At his firſt audience he preſented a letter vnto his Maieſtie with this ſuperſcription.

E To the moſt glorious and puiſſant Prince of the Beliefe of Ieſus, arbitrator of all the differences which happen among the Chriſtian Nations, and of all the moſt noble, and the moſt antient, the Emperour of France, to whom we wiſh the end of his daies to be happie, and his deſires accompliſhed.

His letter to the French king.

Know, that I ſend vnto you the capitulations and treaties of peace which are betwixt our maieſties :
giuing you to vnderſtand, that there is not any thing firme or ſtable in this world, neither king nor beggar although they liue long: that which pleaſeth God cannot fayle. If all mens deſires ſhould ſucceed, without doubt all men would goe to heauen. Man whatſoeuer he doeth, or in what dignitie ſoeuer hee be, ſhall not remaine in this fraile life; wiſe men know it, and it is apparent to the learned. By that F which we haue ſaid, wee deſire to let you know, that he who was in health, hath encountred death, and is gone to a goodlier place, to Paradiſe, my father Sultan Achmat Chan ; the God which hath no reſemblance haue mercy on him No man ſhal remaine in this lying world: And in Paradiſe are the approches to God, where there is no death. Finally he is gone.

Since the beginning of the Othomans vntil this preſent, the empire of my fathers & their countries from father and ſonne, from hand to hand, and from father to ſonne, the inheritance comming ſo vnto vs; our Vncle Sultan Muſtapha Chan, for that he was elder than our ſelfe, was preferred before vs to the throne of the Ottomans, and was ſome daies in peaceable poſſeßion of the Empire, yeelding iuſtice equally to all men both great and ſmall. But as he was ſhut vp many yeares in ſecret places, praying vnto God continually; ſo of himſelfe he hath relinquiſhed the dignitie of the Emperor, and contemned it. The Empire then belonging to thoſe of our high linage, and for that by right it ſhould come vnto me, the Almightie God by his infinit bountie and mercy hath reſtored it into my hands, my Viſiers, Baſſaes, Lieutenants, the Mufti, and other great perſonages, and they that are in any reſpect with me: and finally, all my ſubiects and vaſſals, by a generall conſent haue acknowledged me for Emperor, in the happy yeare 1027. About the firſt day of the Moone of Ianuarie, in a good houre. Wherefore I am ſeated in the great throne of the Othomans, like vnto that of Salomon, a powerful and able Emperor, and in all our countries and cities: All the Muſulmans being aſſembled together in their churches to preach, the greatneſſe of my name hath beene proclaimed, and through all the mints of mine Empire they haue grauen it in their ſtamps, to coine pieces of gold and ſiluer. Finally, whereſoeuer there are any Muſulmans, and in what places there are men, my name ſhines like gold. Heereafter iniuſtice nor impietie ſhall haue no place, but iuſtice ſhall be done equally. Now we are in ioy and for that our naturall diſpoſition is good, and the ancient freindſhip betwixt vs is perfect, I therefore thought good to aduertiſe you of all that hath paſſed here, and to ſend you our letters of Imperial alliance by Vreiu Chiaus who is my antient ſeruant, hauing had the managing of my treaſure, whereof hee hath giuen me good account, being arriued at your court, carrying my ſaid letter, hee deſerues to be receiued with honour: ſwearing and proteſting againe vnto you, to obſerue in all points the full capitulation made betwixt my predeceſſors, and your great grandfathers, and for our part, you may be aſſured, that the faith promiſed ſhal be maintained as it hath been heretofore by our predeceſſors. And from the day I entered into my throne, I haue made my will knowne to all my Viceroyes, and other officers which do my Iuſtice, and generally to all thoſe of my obedience; intreating you to giue the like commandement to your Gouernours of prouinces, and other officers of Iuſtice, as in like manner to all your ſubiects. And as your grandfathers haue taken the faith of our high family, ſo it may pleaſe you to continue with me, and we deſire that on both ſides it may bee good and firme. Know then that for my part it ſhall be obſerued, ſo as of your ſide, there be nothing done contrarie to the promiſed faith. And if before we came vnto the Imperiall throne, your Embaſſadour which did your affaires hath receiued any diſtaſte, and hath not receiued the honor and friendſhip accuſtomed, in my time he ſhall be the more honored and reſpected as the chiefeſt Embaſſadors haue beene: I haue commanded that he ſhall be greatly fauored, and our reſpect ſhall be vnto him as Quineo, that is to ſay, Gold, and doubt nothing of it: for I doe certifie you.

The French king hauing receiued by this action a full ſatisfaction for the indignitie done vnto his Embaſſador: ſoon after he called the Baron of Mole or Sancie home into France, ſending the Earle of Sezi to ſucceed him as Embaſſador at Conſtantinople.

A battell betwixt the Turks and the Perſians.

The war continuing ſtill betwixt the Turkes and the Perſians, the grand Viſier was ſent to inuade Perſia with a great armie, where after many exploits of war, newes came to Conſtantinople, that the Viſier had gotten a great aduantage vpon the Sophy of Perſia in a battel which had beene fought, wherein there had been 100000 men ſlaine. And although the Turks loſt the greateſt number, yet they remained maſters of the fielde, and ſpoiled the Perſians campe, who was retired or fled. For that the manner of the Sophie is to fight with the Turks in retiring or giuing way a little; and with this manner of fighting they haue alwaies made head againſt the Turks. After this ouerthrow the Viſier aduanced with his armie, and entred far into Perſia, which made many doubt that his returne would proue difficult: yet ſoone after there came letters to Conſtantinople, importing that the Turkes being in Perſia in great diſtreſſe for victuals, the Sophie had ſent an Embaſſador to the Viſier to demand peace, promiſing hereafter to ſatisfie the tributes of ſilkes which he ought yerely vnto the Turke; and that the Viſier (in regard of the neceſſitie of his armie) had accepted his offer, and graunted him peace, the which Sultan Oſman did afterwards ratifie. After the concluſion whereof, the Sophie ſent many Cammels loaden with victuals vnto the Turkes armie, which was in great diſtreſſe and want.

A peace concluded bewixt them.

A comet ſeene ouer Conſtantinople.

During the Turkes warre in Perſia, vpon the anniuerſarie day of Sultan Achmat, there appeared in the night a Comet ouer the Citie of Conſtantinople; in forme like vnto a crooked

A crooked ſword, or Turks ſcimiter: and it was ſo great, as it extended from the meridian neere vnto our zenith, vnto the horizon: the point began to ſhew it ſelfe an houre after midnight, and then it appeared little and ſomewhat whitiſh, and gaue but a glimpſe, after an houre it was more apparent and of a deeper color, and the more it did riſe, the redder it was, and like vnto bloud; but at the breake of day it vaniſhed by little and little in the light: And it was ſo big when the point approched neere vnto the zenith, as the hilt was hidden vnder the horizon; the Mathematicians did obſerue, that it followed the motions of the heauens; it did alwayes riſe in one place, and the bending of the ſaid ſword was toward Crates, more Southerly than it. It did appeare directly in the Eaſt a quarter towards the South, the point comming directly towards Conſtantinople, and the blade extending it ſelfe to the ſaid Eaſt a quarter to the B South, which is juſtly the part where Perſia is ſcituated. The edge looked directly towards Conſtantinople, the which made men diſcourſe diuerſly, and many were amaſed, fearing that it did ſignifie the loſſe and defeat of their armie in Perſia, whoſe returne they feared much.

Vri or Huſſeine Chiaus hauing finiſhed his Embaſſie in France, came into England with the like charge, and had audience from his Maieſty at White Hall, Sir Thomas Glouer being Interpreter, from whom I receiued a true diſcourſe of his whole ſpeech, as followeth.

The Turkiſh Embaſſadors ſpeech to his Maieſtie.

The Interpretation verbatim is thus. H

Moſt happie Emperor, as I haue with mine owne hands, bowing my ſelfe to the duſt of your princely feet appreſented vnto your excellent Maieſtie the moſt mightie and high Sultan Othoman my lord and Maſter his Imperiall Letter, ſo likewiſe I moſt humbly beſeech your Maieſtie, that you will be pleaſed in conformitie thereof, to vouchſafe your princely anſwer by your noble Letter, and to deliuer the ſame into the hands of me your ſlaue: and be euer partaker of all bleſſedneſſe and happineſſe.

A Copie of the Letter of Sultan Oſman the preſent Othoman Emperour, written to the Kings Maieſtie, and preſented by Huſſeine Chiaus. I

Although in this tranſitorie world, if the king or the beggar ſhould enioy the longeſt terme of life that might be, and obtaine all that his heart could wiſh, yet it is moſt certaine, that in the end hee muſt depart and be tranſported to the world eternall; and it is well known vnto the wiſe, that it is impoſsible for man to abide for euer in this world. The occaſion of this prologue is, that the Immortall, omnipotent, and onely God hath by his Diuine will and pleaſure called vnto himſelfe our father of bleſſed memorie Sultan Achmat Chan, who in life was happie, and in death laudable; and departing out of this momentarie world to be neerer the mercifull Creatour, being changed into perfect glorie, and eternall bliſſe, hath his habitation on high, and his reſt in Paradiſe. This paternall Empire and Monarchicall kingdome hath almoſt vntill this preſent bleſſed time, beene alwayes hereditarie, from grandfather to father, from father to ſonne, and ſo curſiuely on that manner; but hauing regard vnto the age K and yeares of our great and noble Vncle Sultan Muſtapha, hee was preferred and honored to ſit on the Othoman Throne, and being ſetled for ſome time, tooke care for the affaires of the Empire, and for all that might concerne the people both in generall and particular. But he hauing been many yeares retired in ſolitarineſſe, and giuen to deuotion and Diuine obedience, being alſo as it were wearied with the cares of the Empire, of his owne accord withdrew himſelfe from the gouernment; for that the Diademe and Scepter of the Empire of the ſeuen Climats, was the true right and inheritance of our moſt excellent Maieſtie, of the which (with the meeting and conſent of all the Viſiers, and other deputies of State, of the Primat of the Muſſulman Law, and of the other honourable Doctors, of the ſouldiers, and of all ſubiects both publike and priuate) the Almightie Cod hath made an high Preſent and worthy gift vnto L vs. And in the happie day in the beginning of the Moone Rebea-il euel of this preſent yeare 1027, in an expected time, and in an acceptable houre, was our bleſſed and happie ſitting eſtabliſhed vpon the moſt fortunat Othoman Throne, the ſeat and wiſedome of Salomon. *In the pulpits of all the Moſques the congregations of the faithfull, and deuotion of the Muſſulmen) throughout all our dominions is read to our imperiall name the * Hutbeh. And in the mints (where innumerable ſummes of money are coined, as well vpon the ſiluer as the gold) our happie name and ſtampe is ſigned. And our moſt powerful commandemets are obeyed in all the parts and dominions of the world: And the brightneſſe of the light of the Sunne of Iuſtice and equitie, hath cauſed the darkneſſe of iniuries and moleſtations to vaniſh away.*

Now ſeeing it hath been an ancient cuſtome of our famous Predeceſſors to giue notice of the ſame vnto ſuch Princes as are in ſincere friendſhip, and do continue it with the Houſe of great Maieſtie and M our Imperiall Court: Wee alſo haue written theſe our princely letters, and appointed for their Bearer the choice among his equals Huſſeine Chiaus (whoſe power is great) one of the honoured and reſpected

ſeruants

A ſeruants of our magnificent Port, the refuge of the World, to the end that ſuch newes might cauſe great joy of our moſt honourable aſſumption. And wee doe hope that when they ſhall come to your hands (in conformitie of the well grounded friendſhip vpon the ſure league, articles, and writings which hath been eſtabliſhed of old with our moſt royall Race, and permanent Empire) you will manifeſt infinite joy and gladneſſe, and certifie as much to the Rulers and Gouernours of the dominions and Countries vnder you, that they may know that the articles of peace and league, and the points of the oath which are firme and to be deſired on both parts, from the time of our grandfather and predeceſſour of royall ſtocke now in paradiſe (whoſe ſoules God enlighten) vndoubtedly during the time of our raigne ſhall be obſerued with all reſpect. And let there not bee the leaſt imagination of any want of due obſeruance of the ſignes of friendſhip on our part, or by any manner of meanes on your part, for the violating the foun-

The Copie of a Letter written by Hallil Baſſa, chiefe Viſier, and Generall in the expedition againſt the Perſian, at his returne from the warres, to the Citie of Senit in Aprill 1618, vnto Sir Paul Pinder Knight, then Embaſſadour for the Kings Majeſtie at Conſtantinople.

The humble Viſier Halil Baſſa.

To the courteous Lord of the Nation of the Meſſiah, both great and honourable among the people of
C Ieſus and the true determiner of Chriſtian affaires; our good friend Paul Pinder, the Engliſh embaſſador whoſe latter daies be with all felicitie. To whoſe noble preſence (after our many kind ſalutations tending to all good affection and manifeſtation of joy, worthy and beſeeming our friendſhip) our louing aduice is this, That if you deſire to heare of our eſtate and being, you ſhall vnderſtand, that after wee departed from the happie port with the armie for the wars of Aſia, we arriued and wintered in Meſopotamia, and remouing thence in the Spring with all the Muſſulman hoſte (alwaies victorious) we went to Van, from which place vntill we came to Tauris, the Muſſulman armie went on alwaies ſacking and deſtroying all thoſe places and townes of the Perſians which wee met withall by the way in thoſe parts, where were burnt, pillaged, and ruined, ſome thouſands of villages, and tormenting all thoſe people that came to hand. And when wee were come neere to Tauris, the Generall of the Perſian forces (of D peruerſe religion) called Carelghai Han (the accurſed) retired himſelfe into the ſaid Tauris, where beating vp his drummes in euerie quarter, he made a ſhew that he had a will to fight, ſo we ſent a little before vs ſome Tartars and others of our armie to hearken out and take notice of the enemie; who meeting with 7 or 8 hundred Perſians of note put them to the ſword, very few eſcaping, and that with verie great difficultie and hazard. By which the ſaid Generall finding himſelfe vnable to reſiſt the power and furie of the Muſſulman hoſt, or to ſtay any longer in the ſaid place, the verie ſame day that we arriued there, the ſaid Generall hauing ſpoiled all the Citie, fled away; ſo we tooke the place, ranſacked it, and burned all the buildings, towers, gardens, and whatſoeuer elſe we found within it: And thus the great citie Tauris by Diuine fauour and grace became ours. Then forthwith we ſent after the enemy the Tartar with ſome Beglerbegs, who ouertaking them gaue them battell; and albeit ſome of ours did fall,
E yet they which fell on the enemies ſide were innumerable. And ſo going forward towards Erdeuill (their obſcure reſidence) about ten daies journey of country, we went burning and ſpoyling it, and killing all the Perſians that we met; that indeed there was ſo much glorie and honor won, as that all the antient men of the country do affirme, there was neuer ſeene the like; inſomuch, that from the confines vnto Erdeuil, 20 daies journey of countrey was on that manner by vs deſtroied. Thus afterward the king cauſed to emptie the ſaid place of Erdeuill, and fled into a place called Hulchal, and cauſed his armie to goe to the top of a high mountaine, from whence hauing ſent 3 or 4 times men of qualitie vnto vs, ſeeking and entreating for peace, with promiſe to giue yearely to our Emperour 100 Somes of ſilke, and all ſuch places as are vpon the confines gotten in the time of Sultan Solyman, except Der Ne and Der Tink; wherewith we were contented with the peace, and his Embaſſadour is vpon the way comming toward vs.
F And ſo we returning the ſame way againe (alwaies ſpoyling) wee came to Erzirum. And this our preſent letter is written vnto you for the reſpect and preſeruation of our friendſhip: and euen as our amitie hath euer been hitherto ſincere and firme, ſo likewiſe by the Grace of God at our arriuall in the the happie Port, it ſhall be in like manner maintained and continued, that more cannot poſſible be. And ſo God keepe you in health.

Bethlem Gabor vndertakes to ſuccour the Bohemians with the Turks conſent.

The wars growing hot in Bohemia againſt the Proteſtants, and the Emperour raiſing what forces hee could to ſuppreſſe them, the directors or gouernors of the country wrote their letters G to Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania, to acquaint him with the eſtate of their affaires.
To whom hee made anſwer, That his countrie ſtanding euen in the very jawes of the Turkes, whoſe councels were neuer quiet, but euer working like to the waues of the vaſt ocean, and alwayes watchfull to embrace all occaſions vpon any diſcord of the Chriſtians, eſpecially now when they had pacified all quarrels with the Perſian, and had no Rebels in Aſia, againſt whom they might imploy their forces; he had propounded to himſelfe to attend the conſent & fauor of the Othoman Emperor, wherby he might take from him al occaſion to make any irruption into the neighbor countries, & haue the better means to imploy his beſt means to reconcile the diſcords among the Chriſtians; wherefore hauing ſent vnto Conſtantinople to acquaint the Graund Seigniour with his intent, and to craue his fauour, hee receiued letters from H thence the 17 of Auguſt, whereby he was aſſured of the Grand Seigniors conſent and fauor.
whereupon he reſolued (notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the houſe of Auſtria, the Pope of Rome, and others of that faction) to take armes in defence of the Bohemians; promiſing to be in September following vpon the confines of Morauia, vnleſſe hee found ſome ſtay in Hungarie.
Being aduertiſed of the ſtate of Bohemia and Morauia, he leuied an army at Clauſenburg, and entered into the vpper Hungarie, whereas moſt of the Barons ſubmitted themſelues vnto him; onely Humanoie a great man in that countrey oppoſed himſelfe: but not able to make his partie good, he fled into Polonia. After which he ſent his armie (being 18000 ſtrong) and took Filek, Ternau, Vacci, Nouigrade, and others; after which he ſeiſed vpon Neuheuſall, the Gouernour being deliuered bound vnto him. The Palatine of Hungary wrote letters to Redei Generall I of the prince of Tranſyluania's armie, wiſhing him to conſider what the forces of the kings of Spaine and France were, with the houſe of Auſtria and their allies, and that the Electors of the Empire (ſome excepted) would ſend aid vnto the Emperor. Who anſwered, that hee doubted not of the power of thoſe kings, and that the Electors would ſend ſupplies vnto
the Emperour; yet hee hoped that before they came, all ſhould bee ended, and their dinners ſhould be prouided.

Bethlem Gabor takes many towns in Hungarie.

Soone after, the Prince of Tranſyluania came to Presburg with his armie, a towne of note in Hungarie, whereas their kings are vſually crowned. The newes thereof comming to Vienna, they ſent 3000 ſouldiers with three pieces of ordnance downe the riuer of Danow, who K entred the ſuburbs on the 13 of October, the night was very ſtormy and rainie, and the Tranſyluanians taking this opportunitie charged them, and ſlew the greateſt part, their Commander flying away with ſome few. The ſuburbs being taken, Bethlem Gabor ſent to the Palatine, to know whither he would yeeld the towne and caſtle without force, giuing him ſome time to reſolue; who after conſultation with ſome noblemen, they reſolued to yeeld, and ſo the town was deliuered into his hands. After which he ſent part of his army vnder good Commanders into Auſtria, to the gates of Vienna, where they committed great ſpoile, the particular relation whereof I leaue to the Hiſtorie of the Emperors liues, to which it doth properly belong.

Propoſitions made by the Tranſiluanians & Hungarians to the Bohemians.

In Nouember Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania, and the Eſtates of Hungarie, ſent Embaſſadors to Prague, where they propounded diuers articles vnto the Councell, and amongſt L others, That they ſhould joyntly ſend Embaſſadors to the Grand Seignior, & that the prince of Tranſyluania ſhould negotiate the buſineſſe. And for that the kingdome of Hungarie was much exhauſted, whatſoeuer ſhould be taken iu Stiria, Carinthia, and Carniola, ſhould be vnited vnto it, to the end it might be the better able to reſiſt the Turke: all which tended to the prejudice and ruine of the houſe of Auſtria. The Prince of Tranſyluania hauing taken diuers townes in Hungarie, belonging to the Emperor as king of Hungarie, and entred Auſtria in hoſtile manner in fauor of the Bohemians; knowing that he had thereby much incenſed the Emperor, and the whole houſe of Auſtria, and that if he ſhould preuaile ouer the Bohemians, the whole burthen of the warre would lie vpon him, hee therefore in the end of this yeare ſent an Embaſſadour with preſents to Conſtantinople, to craue aſſurance of the Graund Seigniors M aid and ſupport (vpon whoſe fauour he had alwaies depended) in caſe the Emperor ſhould inuade Tranſyluania: where beeing countenanced by many of the chiefe Baſſaes, he had aſſurance of Sultan Oſmans ſupport and protection, the which he confirmed by a ſolemne oath vnder his hand, as foloweth:

The

G

The Great Turkes Oath to Bethlem Gabor, Prince of Tranſyluania.

Sultan Oſman,

By the grace of God vnconquerable Turkiſh Emperour, ſweares by the Higheſt, Almightieſt, and Almightie Gods Holineſſe, by his Kingdome, by the ſubſtance of the Heauens, the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, by the earth, and by all vnder the earth, by the braines and all the harie ſcalpe of my mother, by my head and all the ſtrength of my ſoule and bodie, by the holy great Mahomet, and by my Circumciſion, That I thee my brother and ſonne Bethlem Gabor, ſucceeding King of Hungarie, in no manner of way, in thy great and weightie affaires will leaue, though it be to the ouerthrow of my Kingdome, H to be brought to nothing, vntill there ſhall bee no more left but my ſelfe, or foure or fiue Turkes at the moſt, yet will I be ſtill obliged to defend thee, and all thoſe that doe any wayes appertaine vnto thee. And if thou ſhalt haue need of mee, I will be alwaies readie to goe with thee. And in caſe this my promiſe ſhall in any wiſe be fruſtrated, then let Gods Iuſtice fall vpon my head and deſtroy me and my poſteritie, and wipe away whatſoeuer belongeth vnto mee, and gather it together into a rocke of ſtone, or ſubſtance of earth, and that the earth may cleaue aſunder and ſwallow mee vp bodie and ſoule.

Dated at Conſtantinople the fifth of Ianuarie, 1619.

I

Bethlem Gabor being aſſured by this oath, of protection made by the Graund Seigniour, in the beginning of the yeare 1620, hee called an aſſemblie of the Eſtates of Hungarie at Presbourg, whither Embaſſadours were ſent from the King of Bohemia, and the States of that Countrey, which the incorporated Prouinces, where a perpetuall league was concluded betwixt them, and afterwards concluded at Prague; where among other articles, it was concluded, that foraſmuch as neceſſitie did chiefely require, that a peace ſhould bee concluded and inuiolably kept with the Turke, therefore a new Embaſſie ſhould be ſent to the Graund Seigniour from all the confederate Kingdomes and Prouinces; and that Bethlem Gabor ſhould K take vpon him the chiefe care of that buſineſſe; but yet in ſuch ſort, as the Bohemians and incorporated Prouinces ſhould ſend their Embaſſadours with the Hungarians, and beare their ſhares of all that ſhould bee diſburſed, as wel for the Preſents, as for the Embaſſadors charges.

A league betwixt the prince of Tranſyluania, Bohemians, & Hungarians.

In Iune following, Bethlem Gabor went to an aſſemblie of the Eſtates of Hungarie at Neuheuſall, where he propounded diuers heads vnto the States: That hee deſired nothing more than to reſtore the Kingdome of Hungarie, ſo miſerably afflicted, to libertie; and that they might enjoy their Religion and priuiledges: That he had ſpared no coſt for the lawfull defence of the countrey; and for a teſtimonie that he deſired peace, he had refuſed the Crowne which the Eſtates offered him at Presburg: That the ground of peace was to maintaine the L league which they had begun with the Bohemians: That he had alwaies deſired peace with the helpe of other Princes, ſo as it were ſincere and without fraud or deceit, for the obtaining whereof hee had aſſiſted his confederates miſerably afflicted: That he knew for certaine the Emperor deſired not peace but war, hauing ſuffered the Coſſackes to enter into Hungarie, and to ſpoile many places with fire and ſword, and denied paſſage for the Embaſſadors of Bohemia and Auſtria; for this cauſe they were not now to treat of peace but of war, and to conſult how it might be begun and maintained: for the leuying of money which is the ſinewes of warre: for the furniſhing of their forts vpon the frontiers, and for the ſpeedie ſending of Embaſſadours to the Turkiſh Emperour, leſt beeing engaged in an inſteſtine warre, there might be ſome attempts made vpon thoſe bordering forts. Hauing deliuered his minde vnto the M Eſtates, there came diuers Embaſſadours thither from Bohemia, Auſtria, Sileſia, and Luſatia, Venice, Poland, and Turkie: The Venetian Embaſſadour was content their Commonwealth ſhould enter into the league, and the Turke made offer to conclude a perpetuall league with them.

An aſſembly of the Eſtates of Hungarie at Neuheuſall.

On

Bethlem Gabor proclaimed K. of Hungarie.

On the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania was proclaimed King of Hungarie by the Palatine, at the inſtance of the Turkiſh Embaſſadour, and G with the conſent and applauſe of moſt part of the Eſtates of the countrey: After which hee leuied a great armie of thirtie (ſome ſay fiftie) thouſand horſe and foot, and made many Enſignes with diuers Emblemes and deuices; which beeing knowne, the Proteſtants of Vienna, with the conſent of the Emperour, wrote vnto him, humbly entreating him to ſpare the Citie and Countrey, for their innocent wiues and childrens ſakes: but in the meane time all the citiſens were commanded to make prouiſion of victuals for ſixe moneths.

A viſion ſeene at Medina Talnabi.

There came newes to Conſtantinople of a ſtrange apparition or viſion, which was ſeene at Medina Talnabi in Arabia, whereas Mahomet their great Prophet was buried: to viſit H whoſe tombe the Turkes vſe to goe in pilgrimage, but they muſt firſt goe to Mecha, which is ſome few daies iourney off, and there they take a ticket from the Grand Seigniors Beglerbeg, elſe they are not allowed to goe to Medina. This viſion continued three weekes together, which terrified the whole countrey, for that no man could diſcouer the truth thereof. About the twentieth of September, there fell ſo great a tempeſt, and ſo fearefull a thunder about midnight, as the heauens were darkened, and thoſe that were awake, almoſt diſtracted; but the vapours beeing diſperſed, and the element cleare, the people might read in Arabian Characters theſe words in the firmament, O why will you beleeue in lies! Betweene two and three in the morning, there was ſeene a woman in white compaſſed about with the Sunne, hauing a cheerefull countenance, and holding in her hand a booke: comming from the Northweſt, oppoſite againſt her were armies of Turkes, Perſians, Arabians, and other Mahometanes, I ranged in order of battell, and readie to charge her; but ſhee kept her ſtanding, and onely opened the booke, at the ſight whereof theſe armies fled; and preſently all the lampes about Mahomets tombe went out; for as ſoone as euer the viſion vaniſhed (which was commonly an houre before ſunne riſing) a murmuring winde was heard, whereunto they imputed the extinguiſhing of the lampes. The antient pilgrims of Mahomets race, who after they haue viſited this place neuer vſe to cut their haire, were much amaſed, for that they could not conceiue the meaning of this viſion: onely one of the Deruices (which is a ſtrict religious order amongſt the Turkes, like vnto the Capuchins among the Papiſts, and liue in contemplation) ſtepped vp verie boldly, and made a ſpeech vnto the companie, which incenſed K them much againſt him, ſo as this poore prieſt for his plaine dealing loſt his life, as you ſhall heare.

A Deruice ſpeech vnto the Turkes.

The ſumme of his ſpeech was this: That the world had neuer but three true religions, euerie one of which had a Prophet; firſt God choſe the Iewes, and did wonders for them in Ægypt, and brought them forth by their Prophet Moſes, who preſcribed them a Law, wherein he would haue maintained them, if they had not beene obſtinat and rebellious, and fallen to Idolatrie: whereupon hee gaue them ouer, and ſcattered them vpon the face of the earth. Then preſently after he raiſed a new Prophet, who taught the Chriſtian Religion. This good man the Iewes condemned and crucified for a ſeducer of the people, not moued with the pietie of his life, his great myracles, nor his doctrine. Yet after his death, the preaching of a few L fiſhermen, did ſo moue the hearts of men, as the greateſt Monarchs of the world bowed to his verie title, and yeelded to the command of his miniſters. But it ſeemes they grew as corrupt as the Iewes, their Church being diſmembred with the diſtinction of the Eaſt and Weſt, committing Idolatrie again by ſetting vp of Images, with many other idle ceremonies, beſides the corruption of their liues, ſo as God was wearie of them too, and not onely ſent diuiſions among them, but forſooke them, diſpoſſeſſing them of their chiefeſt cities Hieruſalem and Conſtantinople: yet God is ſtill the Gouernor of the World, and prouides himſelfe of another Prophet and people, raiſing our great Mahomet, and giuing way to our nation, ſo as no doubt wee ſhall be happie for euer, if we can ſerue this God aright, and take example by the fall of others. But ahlas! I tremble to ſpeake it, wee haue erred in euerie point, and wilfully M broken our firſt inſtitutions, ſo as God hath manifeſted his wrath by euident ſignes and tokens, keeping our Prophet from vs, who prefixed a time to returne with all happineſſe to his people, ſo as there are now fortie yeares paſt by our account: Wherefore this ſtrange and fearefull viſion is a prediction of ſome great troubles and alterations.

A For either the opening of this booke in the womans hand, doth foretell our falling away ,, from the firſt intent of our law, whereat theſe armed men departed as confounded with the ,, guilt of their own conſciences; or elſe it ſignifies ſome other booke in which we haue not yet ,, read, and againſt which no power ſhall preuaile: ſo as I feare our religion will be proued corrupt, ,, and our Prophet an Impoſtor, and then this Chriſt whom they talke of, ſhall ſhine like ,, the ſunne, and ſet vp his name euerlaſtingly. Hitherto the companie was ſilent, but hearing him ſpeake ſo boldly, they charged him with blaſphemie; & knowing their law, which makes all blaſphemie capitall, they preſently condemned him, and hauing the Beglerbegs conſent and warrant, they put him to death.

The Dernice put to death for his ſpeech.

As their rage againſt him was violent, ſo their execution was extraordinarie, for they neither B cut off his head nor ſtrangled him, as they vſually doe to malefactors, but they tortured him by degrees: for ſtripping him firſt naked, they gaue him a hundred blowes on the ſoles of his feet with a flat cudgell, vntill the bloud iſſued forth, the poore prieſt crying continually on the woman that opened the booke. After which they tooke a bulls pizzell, and beat all his bodie vntil his ſinewes crackt, and in the end they laid him vpon a wheele, and with an Indian ſword made of ſinews, they brake his bones to pieces, the poore man crying to the laſt gaſpe, O thou woman with the booke, ſaue mee, and ſo he died: At which time there was a fearefull tempeſt. The Beglerbeg ſent certaine Spahis to the port of Sidon to imbarke for Conſtantinople, to the end they might aduertiſe the Emperour of theſe tidings.

Sultan Oſman from the firſt entrance into his raigne was freed from all cares of forraine C war, or inteſtine combuſtions; for he had that happineſſe (being himelfe very yong, and not able to gouerne ſo potent an eſtate) as by the counſell and aſſiſtance of Halil Baſſa his grand Viſier, hee had forced the king of Perſia to demaund a peace, and to pay the tribute which had bin formerly promiſed. His rebels in Aſia were all pacified, and the truce with the Emperour (which had beene ſomewhat interrupted by miſinterpretation, or the practiſe of bad miniſters) was newly confirmed a little before his comming to the crowne, onely Moldauia had beene the theatre of war for ſome yeares, where his father had exerciſed his armes, and imployed his forces, to aduance whome he pleaſed to be Vayuod of that Countrey, againſt another partie that was ſupported by the Polonians, as you haue formerly heard. Michna prince of Valachia, being made Vayuod of Moldauia by Achmat, and the Polonian partie D wholly ouerthrowne in the yeare one thouſand ſix hundred and ſixteene, hee enioyed it not long: but whether he died of a naturall death, or fell into diſgrace with the grand Seignior, I doe not read: yet I finde that after him there was another Vayuod or prince of Moldauia, who is yet liuing, but in diſgrace with the Sultan, his name is Caſparo Gratſiani: and to the end you may vnderſtand, that the Turkes neuer reſpect the birth and qualitie of any man in their aduancements, I will relate what this man was, from the mouth of him that knew him verie well.

This Caſparo was borne at Gretz (a Towne of great ſtrength belonging vnto the Archdukes of Auſtria, by the which a branch of that houſe is diſtinguiſhed from the E reſt, and whereof the Emperour now raigning is the head) but beeing a man of ſmall fortune, and little expectance in his owne countrey, hee went to Conſtantinople, and put himſelfe in ſeruice with Sir Thomas Glouer, before that hee was Embaſſadour for his Maieſtie to the Grand Seignior, vnder whom he learned both to write and read the Turkiſh tongue. After which hee came with him into England, and there by his recommendation was employed to Conſtantinople for the redeeming of young Sir Thomas Sherley, who was then a priſoner among the Turkes. Hauing performed his charge orderly, and beeing come to Venice with the young Knight, hearing that Sir Thomas Glouer was ſent Embaſſadour to the Graund Seignior, he left Sir Thomas Sherley, and went to Conſtantinople to his old maſter, where he was emploied yerely to buy or exchange Chriſtians for Turks, carrying F the Chriſtians into Italie, and ſo returning Turkes for them. About the end of Achmats raigne arriuing at Conſtantinople with a ſhip full of Turkes, which he had exchanged, hee acquainted the Baſſa Viſier with the good ſeruice he had done vnto the Grand Seignior; who demanding of what countrey he was and his breeding, asked him if he would vndertake a ſeruice which ſhould be for his aduancement, which was to goe vnto the Emperour to reconcile all difficulties concerning the peace, wherein he carried himſelfe ſo diſcreetly, as Commiſſioners were appointed, who concluded all difficulties, as you haue heard. But before his returne home, the Grand Seignor was dead; yet hee preſſed the Baſſa for the performance of his promiſe, deſiring him, that hee might bee made Vayuod of Moldauia, which the Baſſa effected: but the preſents he gaue aduanced him more than his merits. Since hee grew into ſome diſgrace; ſo as the Graund Seigniour making choice of another Vayuod, gaue charge to certaine Capigis, to go into Moldauia to ſtrangle Gaſparo, and that they ſhould take foure hundred Turkes vpon the frontiers to aſſiſt them: But Gaſparo hauing good ſpies at Conſtantinople, who aduertiſed him of their deſigne, reſolued to preuent them; wherefore taking ſome troupes with him, hee met them vpon the way, and cut them all in pieces; then returning to Yas, hee ſlew one thouſand Turkes. After which he fled into Poland with two thouſand horſe; from whence they write that he hath made diuers incurſions into Moldauia, and committed great ſpoiles vpon the Turkes, being aſſiſted by the Coſſackes, and keepes poſſeſſion of the countrie, although there bee another Vayuod made by the Turke.

He is in diſgrace and flies into Polonia.

The Turks preparation to armes.

Sultan Oſman ſeemes to be much incenſed againſt the Polonians, as well for this ſupport, as for former quarrells, making it his colour for the leuying of the greateſt armie that hath been ſeene ſince that Solyman went vnto the ſiege of Agria, conſiſting, as it is ſaid, of three hundred thouſand men, hauing drawne down all his forces out of Aſia. God knowes where he will imploy it, but it is much to be feared that he will make vſe of this diuiſion betwixt Chrſtian princes, who ſhould vnite their willes and forces, to oppoſe them againſt the common enemie of Chriſtendome, who watcheth only to get an aduantage, little regarding his word and promiſe.

Manfredonia taken by the Turks.

taken by urkes.

The Turke hauing no imployment for his forces by land, ſent three ſcore gallies to ſea, to make ſome enterpriſe vpon the Chriſtians. They came into the Mediterranean ſea, and hauing coaſted the Iſland of Sicile, they ſent twentie gallies to land in the kingdome of Naples, where they ſurpriſed the towne of Manfredonia, and ſpoiled it, carrying away foureteene or fifteene hundred captiues, and ſo retyred againe to ſea. The reſt of their fleet lay about Vellona in the gulfe, which made the Spaniards iealous that the Venetian had been acquainted with this enterpriſe. And ſince there is newes, that the Gallions and Galliots of Algiers, haue taken Iniſa, a ſmall Iſland of foure miles compaſſe, neere vnto Maiorca: It is a place of great importance, for that it hath a hauen able to containe much ſhipping; for the gard whereof the king of Spaine entertaines a great garriſon, and it did much annoy them of Algiers. They tooke the towne; but it is not yet certaine whether they haue taken the caſtle.

The greatneſſe of the Turkes Empire.

This is all I could learne of the Turkes affaires ſince the yere 1609 vntill this preſent. The reader may obſerue, that ſince the raigne of Ottoman their firſt Emperor, this great empire of the Turkes, is proudly built vpon the foure monarches of the world; that is to ſay, of the Aſſirian, Perſian, Greeke, and Romane. For they enioy Babylon, and all Chaldæa, with the countrie of the Medes: We haue ſeene them in Tauris the capitall citie of Perſia, Greece is ſubiect to the yoke of their command, Conſtantinople ſometimes called New Rome, by the tranſport of the Imperiall ſeat, is now made their throne, and ſo many prouinces and realmes which in former times depended vpon the Romane Empire, do now acknowledge their power; they are maſters of the realmes of Egypt and Cyprus; the Iſlands of Rhodes, Meteline, Negrepont, Chio, and many others acknowledge them, the empire of Trebiſond is theirs; the realme of Colchos, now called Mingrelia, payes them tribute: they of Tunis and Algier in Affrica obey them; Dalmatia, the Illyrians, Triballiens, the countries of Tranſiluania, Valachia, and Moldauia do them homage, and we ſee them commaund euen in the chiefe townes of the realmes of Hungarie: But all this power of the Ottomans had neuer beene ſo great nor ſo fearefull, but by the diſcord, diuiſion, and bad intelligence betwixt Chriſtian princes, as you may read in the courſe of this hiſtorie, as well in Greece, at Conſtantinople, as in other parts of Europe, whereas theſe princes contending one with anorher, haue furniſhed matter and meanes to the Turke to diſpoſſeſſe them of the chiefe pieces of their monarchies. They meaſure the continuance of their Em-

A pire by the diſcord betwixt the Princes of the beleefe of the name of Ieſus, and they confeſſe truely, that this diuiſion is the onely cauſe of their greatneſſe, the which hath made them beleeue, that among Chriſtians, there was a bad Angell enemie to peace, which they call the ſtrong or powerfull Spirit, which kindling the fire of reuenge and ambition in the hearts of great men, drawes from their affections the good of their beleefe, to entertaine them in perpetuall diſcord; during the which, they promiſe vnto themſelues a firme and an aſſured reigne. So the Mufti, and the Taliſmans praying on Friday in their Moſques, demand of their Prophet the circumſtance of this bad intelligence betwixt Chriſtian Princes, to the end they may inioy the empire which they haue vnjuſtly vſurped. Yet their prophecies do not promiſe them a perpetuall poſſeſſion; behold one in their own tongue, which hath alwaies made them B feare the vnion of Chriſtians.

A Turkiſh Propheſie.

Patiſſabomomos ghelur, caiferun menleker alur keuzul almai alur kapze ilerie di yladegh Giaur Keleci cſikmaſſe on ikigladegh on laron Begbhgheder. Enſi iapar, bagbi diker batheſai baglar, ogli keſi olar; onichi ylddenſora Hriſtianon-keleci cſcchar, al Turkci ghereſſine Tuſchure.

C That is to ſay;

Our Emperour ſhall come, he ſhall poſſeſſe the realme of an Infidell prince, he ſhall take the red apple, and make it ſubiect to his power: if at the ſeuenth yere of his command the Chriſtians ſword doth not aduance, he ſhall rule vnto the twelfth yeare, he ſhall build houſes, plant vines, compaſſe in gardens with hedges, and beget childrne: but after the twelfth yeare that he hath held the red apple, the Chriſtians ſword ſhall appeare and put the Turke to flight.

The expoſition of their propheſie.

By the Infidell prince they vnderſtand a Chriſtian Prince (for ſo they call them) and by the Red Apple an Imperiall towne ſtrong and important; in the which, and elſe where the Turkes D ſhall build houſes; that is to ſay, conuert holy temples to the vſe of the Mahometan impiety: for by this word to build, they that haue commented vpon this propheſie vnderſtand, vſurpation of the houſes of God: Plant vines, by theſe words they ſignifie the extent of the Turkiſh Empire, and the ſetling of their colonies, as we ſee in Hungarie and Tranſyluania: Compaſſing in Gardens, that is to ſay, they ſhall fortifie the townes which they haue taken from their enemies: Beget Children, extend the Mahometan religion, far in the Chriſtians countries. But after the twelfth yeare, &c. within a certaine time beſt knowne to God, his diuine Maieſtie, opening the eyes of his clemencie vpon the Chriſtians, will vnite the wills of their princes, kindle their affections with a holy zeale, and bleſſing their armes, wil make them victorious ouer E the Turke, whom he wil baniſh out of the Eaſt, and chaſe into Scythia, from whence they came to be a ſcourge vnto Chriſtendome. Theſe are my wiſhes, wherein I hope all good Chriſtians do concurre.

The beginning of the Turkiſh Empire.

Hauing runne ouer the occurrents which haue happened in the Turkes eſtate for the ſpace of eleuen yeares, I muſt according to maſter Knolles his method, conclude the worke with a deſcription of the Graund Seigniours port or Court, of his Gouernement, Officers, Riches, Force, and Religion. The Turkes (a people of Scythia) hauing like a violent deluge ouerthrowne a great part of the Eaſt, and taken diuers prouinces, beeing expelled from Hieruſalem by Godfrey of Bouillon, and the Chriſtians, their remainder retired to Nicea where they liued without any head or ſoueraigne commander, vntill that Ottoman about F the yeare of our Redeemer 1300, by practiſe, made himſelfe ſole and abſolute monarch. His ſonne conquering diuers prouinces, remoued his imperiall ſeat to Pruſia, now called Burſia, the chiefe abode of the Kings of Bythinia. Amurath the firſt (beeing drawne in by the Emperour of Conſtantinople to ſuccour him, and allured with the wealth of Europe) turned his armes againſt him, taking diuers prouinces and townes from him, amongſt others Adrianopolis, which hee made the ſeat and reſidence of the Turkiſh Emperours, in the yeare 1363. But Mahomet the ſecond hauing taken the citie of Conſtantinople, and expelled G the Emperour in the yeare 1453, he made it the royall ſeat of the Othomans, for which he had great reaſon, being one of the faireſt and ſweeteſt ſeats of the World.

Deſcription of Conſtantinople.

Conſtantinople hath in circuit by the opinion of ſome writers fifteene or ſixteene miles, and is called by the Turkes themſelues Stambull or Stambolda, the ſea beating vpon it vpon the North and South ſides: Towards the Eaſt it is diuided from Aſia by a large channell, which runneth from the one ſea to the other, and is about ſeuen miles in length. The Citie is built vpon the declining of a hill, in which there are many rare ſingularities which I omit, beeing deſcribed elſewhere. There are in this Citie ſeuen little hils, vpon the which are built ſeuen principall Moſques or Churches, by ſeuerall Emperours, whereof the faireſt and moſt ſtately is that of Sultan Solyman. Vpon the North ſide of the citie H ſtandeth the Graund Seigniours Pallace or Seraglio, commonly called by the name of the Port: The which hath on the one ſide thereof the Sea, and of the other ſide of it the hauen, the other two beeing towards the citie, beeing about three miles in compaſſe, ſome write of foure. It is walled about, and within it are many gardens, orchards, medowes, and woods. Being entred into the firſt port (which hath double gates of yron) into a large Court, on the left hand there ſtands a building like vnto a Turkiſh Moſque, which now the Graund Seigniour vſeth for a ſtore-houſe, wherein are great ſtore of armes which are for the defence of his Seraglio. And on the other ſide of this Court are ſeuerall gardens walled in, from which they paſſe to another Court with a gate like vnto the former, where are targuets and cemitars hanging, and many porters attending, as at the former. I After this, they paſſe into another large court which is planted with cypreſſe trees, and full of graſſe, where deere feed; but round about it is a cloiſter which is in length about ſix hundred and fourescore foot, and aboue fiue hundred in bredth, paued with ſtone, and couered with lead, it beeing ſupported with one hundred and fortie pillars of white and gray marble, ſtanding vpon baſſes of copper, with capitals of the ſame; vpon the North ſide whereof ſtands the Diuano, whereas the Viſier Baſſa and the other Baſſaes ſit in Councell, and heare cauſes of importance, whereof wee will ſpeake hereafter. In this Seraglio the Grand Seigniour hath many chambers which are richly appointed, wherein hee remaines, and there hee hath ſixe young men which attend his perſon and the ſeruice of his chamber, whereof two wait daily, and at K night they watch when he ſleepes, the one of them at his head, and the other at his feete, with two torches burning in their hands. In the morning (as Sanzouino writes) when the Graund Seigniour attires himſelfe, they put into one of his pockets a thouſand aſpers, and into the other pocket twentie duckats of gold, the which if he giue not away that day, is their fee at night, neither (as they ſay) doth hee euer put on the ſame cloathes: and whenſoeuer hee goes to hunting, or to any other exerciſe (beſides the money which he hath with him) his Caſnadar Baſſa or chiefe Treaſuror ſtill followes him with great ſtore of money to giue away. The office of theſe ſix young men (who are changed as it pleaſeth the Graund Seigniour) is diſtinct, for the one carries his ſhooes, the ſecond his bow and arrows, the third L his veſt, the fourth a veſſell with water, the fifth carries a ſeat, and the ſixth called Oda Baſſa is head of the chamber.

He hath dayly a great number of perſons reſident in his pallace, imployed in their ſeuerall charges, ſome in one place, ſome in another, vnder their ſeuerall commanders. But among all the great men in his court theſe are of chiefeſt eminencie and note.

Firſt the Capi Aga, that is to ſay, the mouth of the graund Seigniour, by whom the Sultan ſpeaketh to ſuch as haue any great ſuit vnto him: for no Embaſſadour is admitted vnto him, but at his firſt arriuall when he deliuers his letters of credit and his preſents, and when he hath any buſineſſe to treat of he repaires to the Viſier Baſſa or his Aga.

The ſecond is Caſnadar Baſſa, the chiefe Treaſurour of the houſhold, or ſuperintendent of the Treaſuror.

The third Chilergi Baſſa, chiefe cupbearer. M

The fourth is Seraglio Agaſi, ſteward or maſter of the houſhold.

The fifth is Chiller Agaſi, or Saraidar Baſſa, Ouerſeer of his Seraglio of concubines, who is alwaies a eunuch as the reſt be.

A The ſixth and laſt is Boſtangi Baſſa, chiefe Gardiner, and ouerſeer of all his gardens, Captaine of his Iamoglans, and ſtearer of his Barge whenſoeuer he goeth by water. Hee hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many Gardiners vnder him, which are called Boſtangi, who when they come out of the Seraglio, become Ianizaries, Solacchi, or Capigi, according to their qualities.

Theſe ſixe Officers of the Sultans houſe aboue mentioned haue no authoritie out of his pallace, yet the greateſt Baſſaes ſtand in awe of them, and feare them, for that they haue free acceſſe vnto the Sultan, and haue dayly opportunitie to incenſe him againſt them: for by their ſecret ſuggeſtion and falſe informations, many of the greateſt Baſſaes are manie times ſuddenly and vndeſeruedly cut off in the height of all their pompe B and glorie.

The Sultans dumbe men.

Hee hath many Mutes or dumbe men attending about him, whereof eight bee his daily companions and play-fellowes in the Seraglio, in whoſe companie hee takes great delight: beſides many others to the number of fortie, which attend vpon him as pages. They are all borne deafe and dumbe, yet by long practiſe they grow ſo perfect, as they will vnderſtand any thing that ſhall be acted vnto them by ſignes and geſtures; and will themſelues by the geſture of their eyes, bodies, hands, and feet, deliuer matters of great difficultie, to the great admiration of ſtrangers.

A Seraglio of young men.

The Graund Seigniour hath within his pallace a Seraglio, of young men to the number of fiue hundred, from eight yeares of age to twentie: theſe are the well-fauouredſt C and beſt proportioned of all the tribute children which hee draweth from Græcia and Natolia, and they are choſen out of his Seraglioes at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places, and brought to this to bee bred vp, where they are inſtructed in diuerſe Arts, according to their diſpoſition, but eſpecially to read and write, and in the doctrine of their Law, and to ride, there beeing a great number of horſes kept within this Seraglio for their exerciſe, and for the Eunuches. They neuer goe out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinkes them to be of fit age to vndergoe ſome charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtari, and to ſome hee giues greater places, according to their valour, or the fauour they haue gotten with him.

They that carry his Launce.

Hee hath in like manner about foureſcore Mutaferache, that is to ſay, Launce-bearers D to the Graund Seigniour: which carrie his Launce whenſoeuer hee goeth to field, and acknowledge no other commander, and in time by his fauour or their merites, are made Captaines.

The Sultans Eunuches.

Hee hath alwaies aboue one thouſand Eunuches entertained in ſeuerall places, whereof ſome of them are in verie great credit with him, and can preuaile much: they are called Hudurni, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgines in his Seraglio. They are not onely depriued of their genitors, but in their youth they haue their whole priuities ſmoothed off by their bellies, and in their Turbants they beare ſhort quills of ſiluer, through which they make water. This inhumane cuſtome was firſt in- E uented by Sultan Solyman, who ſeeing a Gelding make offer to couer a Mare, grewe ſuſpitious that they were able to doe ſome ſmall thing, notwithſtanding the loſſe of their genitors.

The Sultans Seraglio of women.

The Graund Seigniour hath a Seraglio for his women without his pallace, in the which there are alwayes foure or fiue hundred young Virgines, the faireſt of the Chriſtians children, which hee gathereth vp out of Græcia for tribute. The Sultan repaires ſometime thither to make choice of ſuch as he ſhall like beſt for his pleaſure; whereof they are aduertiſed the day before by the Eunuches, that they may prepare themſelues in their beſt habits to giue him content. Being al in a roome, and ſtanding vpon either ſide, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and viewes them; to her that hee likes, he caſts a hand- F kercher, (whereof hee hath many hanging at his girdle) and in this manner it may bee hee makes choice of halfe a dozen, the which his Eunuches obſeruing, they put them preſently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his pallace. In this ſeraglio they haue good entertainement, and are apparelled in ſilke twice a yeare, and are taught to make diuers workes by antient matrons, and are attended on by the younger ſort.

yeare 1363. But Mahomet the ſecond hauing taken the citie of Conſtantinople, and expelled G the Emperour in the yeare 1453, he made it the royall ſeat of the Othomans, for which he had great reaſon, being one of the faireſt and ſweeteſt ſeats of the World.

Deſcription of Conſtantinople.

Conſtantinople hath in circuit by the opinion of ſome writers fifteene or ſixteene miles, and is called by the Turkes themſelues Stambull or Stambolda, the ſea beating vpon it vpon the North and South ſides: Towards the Eaſt it is diuided from Aſia by a large channell, which runneth from the one ſea to the other, and is about ſeuen miles in length. The Citie is built vpon the declining of a hill, in which there are many rare ſingularities which I omit, beeing deſcribed elſewhere. There are in this Citie ſeuen little hils, vpon the which are built ſeuen principall Moſques or Chutches, by ſeuerall Emperours, where of the faireſt and moſt ſtately is that of Sultan Solyman. Vpon the North ſide of the citie H ſtandeth the Graund Seigniours Pallace or Seraglio, commonly called by the name of the Port: The which hath on the one ſide thereof the Sea, and of the other ſide of it the hauen, the other two beeing towards the citie, beeing about three miles in compaſſe, ſome write of foure. It is walled about, and within it are many gardens, orchards, medowes, and woods. Being entred into the firſt port (which hath double gates of yron) into a large Court, on the left hand there ſtands a building like vnto a Turkiſh Moſque, which now the Graund Seigniour vſeth for a ſtore-houſe, wherein are great ſtore of armes which are for the defence of his Seraglio. And on the other ſide of this Court are ſeuerall gardens walled in, from which they paſſe to another Court with a gate like vnto the former, where are targuets and I cemitars hanging, and many porters attending, as at the former. After this, they paſſe into another large court which is planted with cypreſſe trees, and full of graſſe, where deere feed; but round about it is a cloiſter which is in length about ſix hundred and fourescore foot, and aboue fiue hundred in bredth, paued with ſtone, and couered with lead, it beeing ſupported with one hundred and fortie pillars of white and gray marble, ſtanding vpon baſſes of copper, with capitals of the ſame; vpon the North ſide whereof ſtands the Diuano, whereas the Viſier Baſſa and the other Baſſaes ſit in Councell, and heare cauſes of importance, whereof wee will ſpeake hereafter. Attendants vpon the Grand Seigniour.

The chiefe officers of his houſe.

He hath dayly a great number of perſons reſident in his pallace, imployed in their ſeuerall charges, ſome in one place, ſome in another, vnder their ſeuerall commanders. But among all the great men in his court theſe are of chiefeſt eminencie and note.

The ſecond is Caſnadar Baſſa, the chiefe Treaſurour of the houſhold, or ſuperintendent of the Treaſuror.

The third Chilergi Baſſa, chiefe cupbearer. M

The fourth is Seraglio Agaſi, ſteward or maſter of the houſhold.

The fifth is Chiller Agaſi, or Saraidar Baſſa, Ouerſeer of his Seraglio of concubines, who is alwaies a eunuch as the reſt be.

A The ſixth and laſt is Boſtangi Baſſa, chiefe Gardiner, and ouerſeer of all his gardens, Captaine of his Iamoglans, and ſtearer of his Barge whenſoeuer he goeth by water. Hee hath a Protogero or Lieutenant, and many Gardiners vnder him, which are called Boſtangi, who when they come out of the Seraglio, become Ianizaries, Solacchi, or Capigi, according to their qualities.

They are all borne deafe and dumbe, yet by long practiſe they grow ſo perfect, as they will vnderſtand any thing that ſhall be acted vnto them by ſignes and geſtures; and will themſelues by the geſture of their eyes, bodies, hands, and feet, deliuer matters of great difficultie, to the great admiration of ſtrangers.

A Seraglio of young men.

The Graund Seigniour hath within his pallace a Seraglio, of young men to the number of fiue hundred, from eight yeares of age to twentie: theſe are the well-fauouredſt C and beſt proportioned of all the tribute children which hee draweth from Græcia and Natolia, and they are choſen out of his Seraglioes at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places, and brought to this to bee bred vp, where they are inſtructed in diuerſe Arts, according to their diſpoſition, but eſpecially to read and write, and in the doctrine of their Law, and to ride, there beeing a great number of horſes kept within this Seraglio for their exerciſe, and for the Eunuches. They neuer goe out of the Seraglio till the Sultan thinkes them to be of fit age to vndergoe ſome charge, and then he makes them Spacoglani, or Silichtari, and to ſome hee giues greater places, according to their valour, or the fauour they haue gotten with him.

They that carry his Launce.

Hee hath in like manner about foureſcore Mutaferache, that is to ſay, Launce-bearers D to the Graund Seigniour: which carrie his Launce whenſoeuer hee goeth to field, and acknowledge no other commander, and in time by his fauour or their merites, are made Captaines.

The Sultans Eunuches.

Hee hath alwaies aboue one thouſand Eunuches entertained in ſeuerall places, whereof ſome of them are in verie great credit with him, and can preuaile much: they are called Hudurni, many of them are employed to attend his Concubines and Virgines in his Seraglio. This inhumane cuſtome was firſt E inuented by Sultan Solyman, who ſeeing a Gelding make offer to couer a Mare, grewe ſuſpitious that they were able to doe ſome ſmall thing, notwithſtanding the loſſe of their genitors.

The Sultans Seraglio of women.

The Graund Seigniour hath a Seraglio for his women without his pallace, in the which there are alwayes foure or fiue hundred young Virgines, the faireſt of the Chriſtians children, which hee gathereth vp out of Græcia for tribute. The Sultan repaires ſometime thither to make choice of ſuch as he ſhall like beſt for his pleaſure; whereof they are aduertiſed the day before by the Eunuches, that they may prepare themſelues in their beſt habits to giue him content. Being al in a roome, and ſtanding vpon either ſide, the Sultan enters, attended by an Eunuch or two, and viewes them; to her that hee likes, he caſts a F handkercher, (whereof hee hath many hanging at his girdle) and in this manner it may bee hee makes choice of halfe a dozen, the which his Eunuches obſeruing, they put them preſently into a Coach, and are carried into another little Seraglio within his pallace. In this ſeraglio they haue good entertainement, and are apparelled in ſilke twice a yeare, and are taught to make diuers workes by antient matrons, and are attended on by the younger ſort.

They haue many Eunuches with their Aga or Captaine, and they haue one hundred Capigi's and Ianizaries, which keepe their gates. When as the number of theſe virgine ſlaues decreaſeth, and they haue not wherewithall to ſupplie them with their tributarie children, they ſend to the market in Conſtantinople, where they ſay there are dayly ten thouſand ſlaues of all ages and ſexes to bee ſold: and there they buy the faireſt they can get, but they will not haue them aboue eight yeares old, leſt they ſhould bee corrupted before they come into the Turkes Seraglio.

As for the other Seraglio within the Sultans pallace, there remaines the Sultanaes with their children, and ſuch other Concubines as hee hath made choice of for his delight. He neuer marries, but when any one is brought vnto him, hee giues her an attire for her head of gold, and tenne thouſand aſpers, cauſing her to liue in a chamber apart, encreaſing her dayly maintenance. The firſt that beares him a childe, is called Sultana, and is miſtreſſe of all the reſt, and moſt fauoured by him, as the chiefeſt of all his women, the reſt as they are fauored by the Prince, are brought vnto him to haue his pleaſure, and then returned backe againe: if they chance to be with childe, they are put into the number of the Sultanaes, and are much reſpected by him. Such as the Prince hath had the vſe of, but no children by them, are giuen in marriage to his ſlaues, who are aduanced to dignities, and made Gouernours of countries.

His guard, footmen, & porters.

Hee hath three hundred Sollacchi, which march continually about his perſon, and make as it were his guard, beeing vnder the commaund of the Aga of Ianizaries; they are richly attired, hauing lawne garments hanging downe beneath their knees, and ouer it a quilted waſtcoat with halfe ſleeues of taffatie, damaske, or ſatten, and on their heads caps and feathers like vnto the Captaine of the Ianizaries, and they attend on him with bowes and arrowes. He hath alſo ſtill about him when he rides abroad fortie Peichi, that is to ſay, footmen or poſtes which runne wonderfull ſwiftly, and are ſtill at hand to attend his commandements, where hee ſhall pleaſe to employ them: they weare long coats of cloth of gold with a broad girdle of the ſame, and caps like vnto womens thimbles, with a horne of ſiluer and gilt ſtanding vp before. There are about foure thouſand Capigi's or Porters which continually attend his pallace and Seraglios, they are attired like vnto the Ianizaries, and haue ouer them thee Capigi Baſſaes. Theſe men are many times employed to execute the Grand Seigniors commandements, when he will haue any great mans head, or his throat cut, as we haue ſeene of late yeares in Gambolat Baſſa, and in Naſſuf Baſſa, who was graund Viſier to Achmat.

The Turks gouernment.

The Grand Seigniors gouernment is ſo abſolute, as they all tearme themſelues his ſlaues, and no man how great ſoeuer can aſſure himſelfe of his eſtate, no not of his life, but by the great Turks ſpecial fauor. He commits the managing of his eſtate to ſuch as haue abjured the Chriſtian religion, & haue bin brought by way of tything in their infancies from Greece and Natolia, and afterwards for their merits are aduanced to great dignities, as Baſſaes, Beglerbegs, and ſuch other. The Prince hath a court or Councell which they call Diuano, and this is held within the Seraglio foure dayes in the weeke; that is to ſay, Saturday, Sunday, Munday, and Tueſday, where they treat of matters of State, and afterwards of the affaires of priuate men. To this Councell are admitted the Graund Viſier, eight or nine Baſſaes who are are alſo called Viſiers, and are continually reſident at Conſtantinople, (for there are many more which are employed abroad in the conduct of armies or gouernment of Countries) the Beglerbegs and others. At the riſing of the court or councell, the Grand Viſier informes the Sultan of all the proceedings in particular; wherein he dares not diſſemble, for that the Prince hath a window joyning to the Diuano, where he may heare and ſee any thing and not be ſeene. He ſeldome impugnes what they haue reſolued, vnleſſe it be to moderate ſome rigorous ſentence, or to giue anſwer to ſome Embaſſadour, and what he himſelfe concludes is irreuokable.

The Turks iuſtice.

Their ſuits are verie ſhort, for they haue no aduocates to breed delaies, as they haue in Chriſtendome; yet commonly hee that bribes moſt ſpeeds beſt; for the Turkes are the moſt couetous and corrupt nation in the World, neither will they doe any man a kindneſſe without a fee; and yet they are not ſure to enjoy any thing they get no longer than it ſhall pleaſe

A the Prince. They puniſh crimes with great ſeueritie, and ſpeedily, the fact being prooued; which doth ſo terrifie them, as by the report of ſuch as haue conuerſed long there, you ſhall ſeldome ſee a murder or a theft committed by any Turke; and if any foule fact be committed, it is moſt commonly done by Græcians.

The Grand Viſier.

The chiefe of the Grand Seigniors Councell, is the Graund Viſier, who weares the princes ſignet, and is as it were the Lieutenant Generall of the whole monarchie: he hath authoritie ouer the other Baſſaes, and they are bound to yeeld him an account of their imployments. Hee is ſtill about the prince his perſon, and is not ſent abroad for any imploiment, vnleſſe it bee for an important warre, as they haue done of late yeares againſt the Perſian. When the Viſier is ſent abroad, he makes choice of one of the Baſſaes to be his Lieutenant and to execute his authoritie, and he is called Chimacham. Mechmet Baſſa is at this preſent
B chiefe Viſier.

The Beglerbegs and Sanzacks.

Next vnto the Baſſa (which is as much to ſay as great Lord) follow the Beglerbegs, and haue their places in court next vnto them. They are men of great authoritie, and haue the command of great kingdoms and armies, vnder whoſe obedience are diuers Sanzacks which are ſent as Gouernors into prouinces during the princes pleaſure. Theſe are men of great experience, and haue command ouer the Spahi, and Timariots, the Turks chiefe forces on horſebacke, whom they cal continually to exerciſe their armes. There is one Beglerbeg of Greece, which hath all the countries in Europe in the Turks dominions vnder his charge, and this is the firſt of all the Beglerbegs, who hath vnder him aboue thirtie Sanzackes. There are ſix other Beglerbegs in Aſia, whereof the firſt is he of Natolia or Aſia the leſſe. He hath the go-
C uernment of Pontus, Bythinia, and other Kingdomes, and hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Caramania with ſeuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Aladuley, vnder whoſe command are ſeuen Sanzackes. The Beglerbeg of Amazia and Toccato, hauing foure Sanzackes. There is alſo one in Meſopotamia, and vnder his command twelue Sanzackes or Gouernours of prouinces. There is likewiſe a Beglerbeg of Damas, Suria, and Iudæa, who hath vnder him twelue Sanzackes. And there is one of Caire, who commands ouer ſixteene Sanzacks, his charge extends to the Arabians, but they are not ſo obedient as the Turks other countries.

The great Turks forces.

As for the Turkes forces, they conſiſt of horſemen, footmen, and fleets at ſea. His horſemen conſiſt of Spahi, Timari, Spachoglani, Silictari & Olofagi, who haue aſſignations of lands
D for the entertainment of them and their horſes. For no man can enjoy any poſſeſſions, but he is enjoyned to entertaine a certaine number of ſouldiers proportionable to the reuenues of the land: ſo as the Gouernour or Baſſa is alwaies bound to haue this number ready to march when they are called. Of theſe Timariots they are able to raiſe about an hundred and fiftie thouſand horſe alwaies readie at the firſt call, for the which the prince disburſeth not a penny; for in regard of the land which is allotted them, they are bound to maintaine themſelues, their horſe and armes in the war. Whereſoeuer the Turke conquereth any countrey, he diuides it among his ſouldiers; aſſigning 4000 aſpers yerely (which is little aboue ten pound ſterling) to euerie one for himſelfe and his horſe, and ſo proportionably if he haue more land. Theſe horſemen are much peſtered with armes when they goe to warre: for they haue a jacke, a E ſpeare with a little white banner, a caliuer hanging vnder his left arme, a cemitar, a bow and arrows at his girdle, and a battleaxe at his ſaddle bow. And of theſe kind of horſemen they ſay there are 80000 in Greece, beſides an infinit number in his other countries. This Turkiſh Cauallerie worke two great effects, for they ſerue as a ſupport to his eſtate, to ſuppreſſe all ſeditions, and they are readie to vndertake any enterpriſe. Beſides theſe he enteraines many horſmen about his perſon, whereof ſome are Spahi, and theſe are Chriſtian ſlaues bred vp yong in the princes ſeraglio, who by their merits attain to that degree, and afterwards to greater dignities. They are alwaies attending about the princes perſon whereſoeuer he goes, beeing commonly thirteene hundred.

The Timariots.

The Spahi.

The Caripices & Spachoglani.

The Caripices are held for the flower of all his horſemen, beeing in number about eight F hundred, who march ſtill about the princes perſon during the wars. The Spachoglani which is as much to ſay as yong men on horſebacke, are aboue three thouſand, who haue yearely penſions in money, which they are bound to receiue yearely at Conſtantinople, or elſe they are held as dead men. In the wars they march on the right hand of the Grand Seigniour, and are knowne from the Spahis by the banners of their launces, which haue two points and of diuers G colors, the others being pointed and all white, but they are armed alike. They are men at armes of a good faſhion, and are commonly aduanced by the Sultan to higher places. They haue a Captaine or Aga of great eſteeme, with a Lieutenant, and euerie twentie haue a Boluch Baſſa.

The Salichtari.

The Salichtari are alſo horſemen, and lodge vpon the left hand of the Prince, being in number about 3000: Their breeding is like to the Spahi, and there is no difference betwixt them but in their march, the one hauing the right hand, and the other the left, which is the more honourable among the Turkes.

The Oloſagi.

There is yet another ſort of horſemen, which they call Oloſagi, being about 2000 in number, and they march on the right and left hand of the prince. Theſe ſeuerall troupes are as it were a nurſerie for all the chiefe officers of that empire; out of which they doe commonly H chuſe their great commanders. Beſides they haue their mercinarie ſouldiers called Alcanzis, which come to ſerue the Turke from Tartaria, Valachia, and Moldauia.

The Ianizaries and their breeding.

As for his foot forces they conſiſt chiefly in Ianizaries, into which number they haue not vſed to enroll many of Aſia, whom they haue held faint hearted, but thoſe of Europe, who haue alwaies had the reputation to be valiant. Their manner to entertaine this diſcipline, is, to ſend euerie three yeares into all the prouinces of Europe, from whence they bring 10 or 12 thouſand Chriſtian children as a tribute, making choice of ſuch as haue any ſhew of magnanimitie, agilitie, or courage, which are parts fit for a ſouldier. Theſe children being brought to Conſtantinople and viſited, ſome of them are ſent into Natolia, Caramania, and other prouinces I to dig and weed the ground, where they forget their parents, country, and faith, and learne the language and vices of them with whom they conuerſe, and ſo become Mahometans. They continue in thoſe places 3 or 4 yeares, without any charge to the prince, being entertained by them for whome they labour; after which time they are called home, and put into the Sultans Seraglios at Pera, Adrianopolis, and other places. But they that haue the beſt faces & are moſt actiue, are reſerued for their princes ſeruice.

The Aiamoglani.

Theſe children being brought into the princes Seraglio's, are of two ſorts; the one are called Aiamoglani, that is to ſay, ſimple Boy: they are inſtructed by ſeuere maſters in diuers manuall and painefull exerciſes, as ſhoomakers, gardiners, and ſuch like baſe trades. Their feeding and apparell is verie meane; and for the moſt part they lie in great and ſpacious rooms, K like vnto religious men, hauing a light continually burning, and guards about them. Theſe haue libertie to goe abroad, who after the age of twenty yeares, are diſmiſſed; whereof ſome are ſent into the Sultans gardens, which are many and great; others are employed as car-men to carrie wood, hay, water, and or other prouiſion for the pallace, and ſome are ſent to the kitchins and ſtables; yet when places fall they are preferred to be Ianizaries, and haue competent penſions to maintaine them during their liues. The leaſt hath fiue aſpers a day, and none aboue eight, and the Spahies ten. They are attired in long blew gownes girt with a broad girdle, and on their head they haue long yellow caps without brims, and ſharpe like vnto ſugar loues: and of theſe Aiamoglanes there are alwaies aboue twentie thouſand which ſerue to ſupplie his armies. L

The Ich-Oglani

The other ſort of youths, which are bred vp in the Turkes ſeraglio's or nurſeries, are called Ich-Oglani, that is to ſay, chamber pages, beeing the choice of all the Chriſtians children for proportion and fauour, and theſe are better bred vp then the Aiamoglani, and come to better preferment, of whom we haue formerly made mention; for the meaneſt places theſe yong men attain vnto at the firſt is to be Spahies, or to attend vpon the grand Seignior as his chamberlaines and pages. And many of them hauing extraordinary parts are ſuddenly aduanced to places of great dignitie. Of theſe the prince hath euer 5000, who vntill they come vnto the age of twentie yeares are neuer ſuffered to goe out of their ſeraglio, nor to ſee any perſon but ſuch as inſtruct them and attend vpon them.

The Ianizaries

The Ianizaries (who are the grand Seigniors chiefe ſtrength on foot) are raiſed out of Chri- M ſtians children, bred vp in theſe nurſeries as we haue ſaid, where they are taught to ſhoot with their bowes and arrowes, to vſe the harquebuſe, and all other weapons fit for ſeruice; and are at length inrolled among the Ianizaries, and are held the moſt valiant and reſolute ſouldiers among all the Turkes. There are commonly reſident in Conſtantinople and thereabouts

A twentie foure thouſand of theſe Ianizaries when as the Grand Seigniour is there, (for in his whole eſtate he hath a far greater number) vnder their Aga or Captaine Generall, which is a place of great credit, but not like vnto any of their Baſſaes; the great Turke fearing to ioyne power and authoritie together. Being once Ianizaries, they are either ſent to the wars, or put in garriſon, or elſe they remaine at the Sultans court (which they call port) where they haue certaine ſpacious places for their dwelling, like to religious houſes, where they liue vnder their commanders: and the younger ſerue the antient with great reſpect. All the Ianizaries of one ſquadron eat together at one table, and ſleep in certaine long halls, and if any one chance to be abſent all night, he ſhall (the next night) be beaten with a cudgell, which he takes ſo patiently as he kiſſeth his hand that hath thus corrected him. They are much reſpected and feared of B all men, and are diuerſly imploied in the citie; as to ſee the peace and good orders kept, to looke to the prices of things, to arreſt malefactors, and to guard the gates. If they buy any thing they will haue it at their owne rate, they cannot be iudged but by their Aga or Captaine. There is ſeldome any one puniſhed with death by the courſe of iuſtice, without danger of a mutinie; and therefore they execute them very ſecretly. They haue many meanes to get money; for ſome attend vpon Embaſſadors aud keep their houſes; others go with trauel-lers, to guard them ſafely through the Turks Eſtate. They haue a great power in their princes election; ſo as to winne their loues euerie new Emperor at his firſt comming to the Crowne giues them a donatiue, and increaſeth their pay, preſuming vpon their valour and multitude.
They many times commit ſtrange inſolencies vpon any diſcontents; as in firing of houſes, brauing the Baſſaes, and ſometimes bearding the Sultan himſelfe, as you may read in this C Hiſtorie.

The chiefe ſtrength of the Turkes forces conſiſts in the Ianizaries; and yet there are other ſorts of footmen, whereof ſome are called Acouizes, which is a forlorne hope, and receiue no pay, but march before the armie, and haue leaue to ſpoile; ſo as they giue the fifth part of their bootie to the prince. There is another kinde called Azapi: theſe are ſouldiers of ſmall effect, and ſerue rather with the pickaxe and ſpade than with the ſword: they are fitter to tire an enemie with their numbers, than to vanquiſh them with their valour; and they are accu-ſtomed to fill vp ditches with their dead bodies to make a paſſage for the Ianizaraies to aſend vnto a breach. The grand Seignior hath euer 6000 Gunners in pay whom they call Topegi.
And for the guard of the powder and ſhot when the armie marcheth, there are alwaies 12000
D men in pay, whom they call Iebegi.

Acouizes.

Azapi.

Topagi and Iebegi.

The grand ſeignior hath alſo certaine officers attending on him to the number of 3000, whom they call Chiaus, which are as it were ſergeants at arms. Theſe are men well eſteemed, and are often imployed in embaſſies to forreine princes: They alſo carrie letters and commendations from the prince or his chiefe Viſier, and they apprehend offendors. Theſe neuer go to the war but when as the Sultan is there in perſon. They are commanded by a Chi-aus Baſſa, who is of ſo great credit with all men (as Sanzouino writes) that when he is ſent by the grand ſeignior to any Baſſa, Sanzacke, or Cadi, with order to haue any mans head cut off, he is obeyed, although he haue no warrant in writing, as if the prince were there himſelfe, and commanded it.

The Chiaus.

E Thus we haue ſet downe the grand ſeigniors forces at land, whoſe numbers are ſo great, as in ſhew they ſhould breed confuſion and ruine themſelues; but they keepe verie good order and diſcipline, ſo as in that point they yeeld not to any. They liue of a little bread baked in the aſhes, with rice and the powder of fleſh dried in the ſunne: They may drinke no wine, and there are no women ſeene in their armies: they obſerue a wonderfull ſilence, and all the ſouldiers are gouerned by the becke of the hand, or any ſhew of the countenance. Quarrels and thefts are ſeuerely puniſhed. When they march they dare not enter into any corne fields nor vines. The valiant are aſſured of preferments, and cowards of puniſhment.

The Turks diſcipline in their armies.

Hauing ſpoken ſufficiently of their land forces, let vs ſee what ſtrength he hath at ſea: they haue great ſtore of foreſts for the building of ſhips; neither want they good ſhipwrites, for that couetouſneſſe hath drawne many Chriſtian carpenters into the grand ſeigniors arſenal:
F And he hath great numbers of men trained vp in marine affaires, in regard of the gallies which he hath at Mitilene, Rhodes, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and for the retreat hee giues pyrats at Tunis, Bona, Bugia and Algiers, from whence hee drawes commaunders and his beſt mariners, as hath beene ſeene by experience in the enterpriſes of Malta, Gulette, and elſewhere. G

The Turkes reuenues.

To maintaine theſe great forces, it is requiſite he ſhould haue the ſinews of war; yet his ordinarie reuenews (conſidering his large dominions) are not ſo great, as in reaſon they ſhould be: for ſome are of opinion, that he hath not aboue eight millions of gold for his ordinarie reuenew; for which they giue diuers reaſons: firſt, that the Turks haue no care but of armes, the which do rather ruine than inrich a countrie: ſecondly, they conſume ſo many men in their enterpriſes, as they ſcarce leaue ſufficient to manure their land, ſo as the ſubiects (deſpairing to enioy their wealth and neceſſarie commodities, which they might get by their labour and induſtrie) imploy not themſelues to worke nor trafficke, no more than neceſſitie ſhall conſtraine them: for to what purpoſe is it ſay they, to ſow that another man muſt reape? or to reape that which another will conſume? And for this reaſon you ſhall ſee in the Turkes H eſtate whole countries lie waſt, & many times great dearth, which growes by the want of men to manure their land; for that the countrie men for the moſt part either die in the voyages which they make, or in carrying victuals, and other neceſſarie things for their armies; for of 10000 which they draw from their houſes to row in their gallies, ſcarce the fourth part returns to their houſes, by reaſon of the great toyles they indure. Another reaſon why the Sultans reuenues be no greater, is, for that when he conquers any countrie, he aſſignes the lands to his Timarri, who are bound to maintaine ſo many men, and ſo many horſes, according to the proportion of land which he giues them, reſeruing no rent.

But although his ordinarie reuenues be no greater than we haue ſpoken, yet he drawes I great profit by his extraordinaries, eſpecially by confiſcations and preſents; for being all his ſlaues, no man enioyeth any thing longer than it pleaſeth him: yea the Baſſaes and greateſt officers of that crowne, which oppreſſe his ſubiects, and gather together ineſtimable wealth, in the end for the moſt part, it comes into the Turks Caſna or Treaſurie. It is not ſtrange there to ſend for any ſubiects head, vpon any ſuggeſtion whatſoeuer, which no man dare contradict: after which execution, his ſlaues and goods are ſold in the market at Conſtantinople, and the mony applyed to the princes coffers. His preſents alſo amount to great ſummes, for no Embaſſador may come before him without a preſent, neither may any man expect any office or dignitie without mony: no gouernor being returned from his prouince, dares preſent himſelfe to the Sultan emptie handed, neither are their preſents of ſmall price. The Sul- K tans exchequer is gouerned by two Treaſurers called Deftardari, who are more rightly gouernors of the reuenues, for that they keepe an account of the princes Caſna or treaſure, the one hath charge of the reuenues which are raiſed in Natolia, and the other in Europe. Alſo they draw great profits from their tributarie prouinces, eſpecially from Valachia, Moldauia, and Tranſyluania, where the princes maintaine themſelues by preſents and gifts; ſo as they change dayly, for that they that offer moſt are aduanced, whereby they are forced to ruine the countrie to performe what they haue promiſed.

The lawes whereby the Turks are gouerned.

But hauing ſpoken of the Turks forces and reuenues, whereby they maintain their armies to inuade their neighbors, we muſt now ſpeake ſomething of their laws whereby the ſubiects are gouerned, which are inſtitutions and anſwers of wiſe men, the which they hold as an inter- L pretation of their Alcaron, which is the ground of their law. Theſe inſtitutions are contained in 12 volumes, treating of all things belonging to ciuile conuerſation. Some prouinces of Turkie are gouerned by cuſtomes, and enioy their priuiledges, and their wiſe Iudges ſupplie many things which are not written. The Sultan makes choice of the wiſeſt and worthieſt perſon that can be found, of a ſincere life according to their law, and he is called Mufti, that is, Interpreter of their Alcaron; he is (as it were) their high prieſt, attending only matters of religion and faith: he is head of the church among the Turks, and decideth all queſtions of their law. He is of ſuch eminencie, as all the Baſſaes are ſubiect to his direction: he abaſeth not himſelfe ſo much as to ſit in the Diuano, only paſſeth through it when he is ſent for by the Sultan, who (ſo ſoone as he ſeeth him) riſeth from his ſeat as it were to honour him, and F then they both ſit downe face to face, and ſo confer together.

The Mufti.

The Cadileſquiri.

They make triall of the ſufficienteſt of their Iudges, before they chuſe any, for which there are two Cadileſquiri Taliſmani, that is, Doctours of the law, and Examiners at Conſtantinople, or whereſoeuer the Prince remaines; Theſe examine the Iudges or Cadi's of diuers prouin-

A prouinces. The one hath his charge ouer Europe, and is called Cadileſquirie Romly, before whom (after good information of his life, and ſufficiencie) he ſweares that he will doe iuſtice to all men, and yeeld an account of his charge when he ſhall be called. The other Cadileſquirie is for Natolia: they are ſoueraigne judges in all cauſes, and as it were Patriarks. They are of great authoritie, and haue place in the Diuano with the Baſſa's to conſult of weighty matters.

The Mulli, Muderiſi, and Cadi.

There is a third degree of their churchmen, belonging to their law, called Mulli, which are biſhops and chiefe gouernors vnder the Mufti; and their office is to place and diſplace churchmen at their diſcretion. Next are the Nuderiſi, who are ſuffragans to the Biſhops, and their charge is to ſee the Cadies do their duties. Next come the Cadi's who are Iudges to puniſh offendors, of which there is one in euerie citie vnder the Seigniors command.

The Naipi.

B Vnder theſe are another kind of yong Doctors of the law called Naipi, who are not ſo wel read as to be abſolute Iudges, but yet ſupply their places in their abſence.

The Hogi, Calſi, and Soſti.

After theſe are the Hogi, who write their bookes, for that they allow no printing: and inferior vnto them are the Calſi, who read vnto them that write. And the yongeſt of all are called Soſti, who are yong ſtudents or nouices in their law.

Theſe are their ſeuerall degrees of lawyers or churchmen: for the Turks are gouerned by a kinde of Eccleſiaſticall law, according to their Alcaron. They haue colledges (called Medreſſæ) at Conſtantinople, and in other places, where they liue and ſtudie their law and diuinitie, and ſo they aſcend by degrees to the higheſt dignitie of their profeſſion.

The Turkes religion.

As for their religion, it began in the time of the Emperour Heraclius, when as the empire was much diſmembred by the hereſies of Arrius and Neſtorius. Mahomet borne in Arabia C imbraced this opportunitie, ſeeking to ouerthrow the diuinitie of Ieſus Chriſt, which was oppoſed by the Iewes and Arabians: he was aſſiſted by two hereticks, the one was Iohn a Neſtorian, and the other Sergius an Arrian. After which (being aſſiſted by many ſlaues, to whom hee allowed all that was pleaſing to the ſence and fleſh if they ſhould receiue this law) he obtained many victories. By Mahomets law they make a diſtinction of clean & vnclean meats to content the Iews, and alſo it maintains circumciſion, but not at the eight day of their birth, as the Iews vſe it, but after the eight yeare, when the infant is able to make confeſſion of his faith, where lifting vp his finger he ſpeakes theſe words, which are grauen in their temples in the Arabian tongue: There is but one God, whoſe Prophet Mahomet is, one God and equall Prophets. The circumciſion being ended, they feaſt three daies together, and then they carry the circumciſed D to a bath with great pompe; after which the gueſts conduct him to his houſe, and preſent him with gifts. The women are not circumciſed, but onely ſpeake the words. If any Chriſtian abiure his faith and indure circumciſion (as they often do by reaſon of their tributes and vexations) they are led through the towne with great honor and reioicing of the people, who do alſo giue vnto them, and they pay no tributes. Mahomets law denies the diuinitie of Ieſus Chriſt, to pleaſe the Arrians who were then powerfull: It is full of fables to pleaſe Idolaters, and it giues libertie to the fleſh, which is pleaſing to moſt men.

They confeſſe one God, and honor Ieſus Chriſt, not as the ſonne of God, but as a prophet borne of the Virgin Marie. They neither honor nor allow images. Friday is their Sabbath as Sunday is ours. They obſerue a Lent of 30 daies, which they cal Ramadan; during which they E eat nothing in the day time, but when night comes all meats are indifferent, but ſwines fleſh; yet they abſtaine from wine and women. They haue their Eaſter called Bayran, which continues three daies, in which they enioy all pleaſures: but this feaſt is not alwaies prefixed, for that they account not the day according to the courſe of the Sun, but of the Moone; and therfore they do carefully obſerue the new Moone, and ſalute it.

They haue no bels in their Moſques, neither do they ſuffer the Chriſtians which liue there to haue any. They put off their ſhooes when they go into their Moſques, and take them again at their comming forth. Whereſoeuer they ſit in their churches or houſes, they haue tapeſtrie couerlets or mats vnder them: they are not much giuen to contemplation or learning, yet the Turkiſh women being married and hauing iſſue, are carefull to breed vp their children, and to F be inſtructed; for the which there are many ſchooles, where they read their lawes, to the end they may ſerue in their Moſques, and be able to gouerne the common weale.

The Turkes by Mahomets law haue leaue to marrie as many wiues as they can maintaine; and a Turkiſh woman being once with childe, her husband neuer toucheth her vntill ſhee be deliuered, but lies with his ſlaues out of the houſe where his wiſe remaines. They haue a certaine kind of marriage made at pleaſure, which they call Kebin, the which is many times practiſed by ſtrangers, who being out of their countrey contract with women, whom they are to enjoy during their pleaſure, and when they caſt them off, they giue them a certaine ſumme of money, and keepe the children. The Cadis or Iudges allow not this kinde of contract, eſpecially amongſt Chriſtians, vnleſſe it be with an oath of marriage. A Turke hauing had the vſe of a Chriſtian woman, they are both condemned to die, vnleſſe ſhe will abiure her faith: the like is obſerued betwixt a Chriſtian and a Turkiſh woman, if they haue been found together. Diuorce is allowed among them in caſe of barrenneſſe and incontinencie.

There are foure orders of religious men among the Turks which differ in their liuing, habit, and ceremonies. Theſe be the Terlaques, Deruis, Kalenders, and Huquiemales, and theſe laſt are very vicious, and wicked impoſters, deceiuing of the common people. The Deruis is a ſtrict order liuing in contemplation, much like vnto the Capuchins among the Romiſh Papiſts. The Turkes forbeare to blaſpheme either God, Chriſt, or Mahomet, or any other Saint whatſoeuer, and they puniſh blaſphemie ſeuerely. They conuerſe with Chriſtians, and eat and traffique with them freely; yea ſometimes they marrie their daughters, and ſuffer them to liue after their owne religion. But they hate the Iewes, and deſpiſe them as the baſeſt people in the world. They haue an aſſured confidence, that he that ſhall duely obſerue the laws of Mahomet, ſhall haue eternall life, and a Paradiſe full of delights: and contrariwiſe they that ſhall breake the lawes of their Alcaron are threatned with hell and eternall death; yet they haue an opinion that hee that beleeues in the Alcaron when hee dies, ſhall bee vndoubtedly ſaued.

The diſpoſition of the Turkes.

To conclude this relation with ſome few lines of their humours and diſpoſitions; they write of them that they are groſſe witted, idle, and vnfit for labour. They are exceeding couetous and corrupt, aboue all other Nations; for juſtice is ſold to him that offers moſt. They are humble among themſelues, and obey their ſuperiors with great ſilence. They are proud and inſupportable to ſtrangers, thinking none fit to be compared with them. They are giuen to gluttonie and drunkenneſſe, and will ſpend whole daies together in feaſting, and will drinke with exceſſe if it be in priuate, for that it is forbidden by their law. They are vaineglorious, proud, and deceitfull, neuer keeping their words, but when it may be to their profit. They are much inclined to venerie, and are for the moſt part all Sodomites. They are very ſuperſtitious, giuing credit to dreams and diuinations; and they hold that euery mans deſtinie is written in his forehead, which cannot be altered or auoided.

Thus I haue continued this hiſtorie for eleuen yeares, hauing informed my ſelfe out of the beſt authours and intelligencers I could finde that concerne this ſubiect: I ſhould haue beene glad that ſome which haue reſided at Conſtantinople moſt part of this time, would haue aſſiſted me with their obſeruations which ſhould haue been for the generall good of our nation; but I hope notwithſtanding the reader ſhall finde content and ſatiſfaction.

A CONTINVATION OF THE TVRKISH HISTORIE, FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD, 1620. VNTILL THE ENDING OF THE YEARE OF OVR LORD 1628.

COLLECTED OVT OF THE PAPERS and Diſpatches of Sir THOMAS ROE, Knight, his MAIESTIES Embaſſadour with the Grand Seigniour during that time.

By M. B.

1620.

BEfore wee come to ſpeake of the great preparations made by the Grand Seigniour, in the yeare 1621, to inuade the Kingdome of Poland; and thoſe by that King to reſiſt him; I hold it ſomewhat neceſſarie, briefely to ſet downe the cauſes and reaſons of the enſuing warre.

The cauſe of the warre between the king of Poland and the grand ſeignior.

The Chrim Tartar, confining vpon the dukedome of Ruſſia and borders of Poland, made many incurſions, and did great ſpoile vpon the Coſſackes within the ſayd prouince of Ruſſia, and other parts belonging to the Kingdome of Poland, and carrying away people of all ages and ſexes, made ſale of them within the Turkiſh Empire. Now Iean-beagh-Ghiray-Han Prince of the Tartars, being wholly dependant on the Ottoman Emperours, his Majeſtie of Poland ſent manie ſeuerall Embaſſadors to complaine at that Port; That notwithſtanding the antient league betweene him and the Ottoman Family, the Tartars greatly ſpoiled his Countries; which was both vniuſt and vnreaſonable. Howſoeuer the complaints were many and great, yet the King of Polands Miniſters found no redreſſe for thoſe their alledged wrongs; but were anſwered, That the Tartars were abſolute Lords ouer themſelues, and that they pretended to haue an annuall tribute of fourtie thouſand florins from the King of Poland; which beeing denied them, they had reaſon ſo to doe: and that the Grand Seigniour could onely entreat, but not command them to ſurceaſe. The Tartars ſeeing the Polacke thus ſleighted at the Port, grew more inſolent and outragious euery day: wherewith the Turkes were well content, for the great benefit they receiued by ſlaues which were continually brought to be ſold in their dominions, (as was ſayd before) finding for the moſt part, that thoſe men had able bodies, and fit G to be applied to the oare. It is true, that the Chrim Tartars in antient time, being ſo neere neighbours, were wont to receiue ſuch a ſumme from the Crowne of Poland, for which they were obliged to ſerue in euery occaſion of warre. But of later times the payment diſcontinued, becauſe they rather receiued hurt, than any aſſiſtance of that vagabond and predatory people.

When the Coſſacks ſaw that after ſo many complaints they could not liue in quiet, nor procure reſtitution of their wrongs, nor take their reuenge vpon the Tartar (being a flitting and fugitiue people, and had no certaine place of abode) they reſolued to fall into the dominions of the Grand Seigniour, who ſeemed, if not to protect, yet to conniue at injuries they re-ceiued from theſe their neighbours. The Coſſacks then that inhabited vpon the banks of the H riuer Boriſthenes (which emptieth it ſelfe into the blacke ſea) were coniectured to be fitteſt for the execution of this reuenge: and therefore they prepared a great number of well armed Barques, and falling downe the ſaid riuer, did very great damage to the Turke, by robbing, burning, and ſpoyling diuers Townes and Villages bordering vpon the Blacke ſea. This newes being brought to Conſtantinople, the Graund Seigniour tooke it in great ſcorne, that ſuch a baſe and rude people ſhould come and affront him ſo neere his dores. Therefore hee cauſed ſome gallies to be armed forth with ſpeed to ſuppreſſe them: but his forces were foure or fiue times valiantly repulſed, and ſtill the Coſſacke went ſafely home with his prey. Now the tyde of affaires was turned, and this great Emperour, who was formerly petitioned by the I Polacke, is now become a ſuitor to him himſelfe, and findes his Miniſters meaſured by the anſwer the Grand Seignior had giuen concerning the wrongs done by the Tartars: That though the Coſſackes adhere to the Crowne of Poland, yet are they a free people of themſelues; but when the Tartar ſhall ceaſe from his hoſtilitie, it is like enough the Pole will entreat the Coſſacke to do the ſame; and that is all the authoritie he can exerciſe ouer them.

The preparation of the grand ſeignior for the war with the King of Poland.

Affaires ſtanding thus, no accommodation for wrongs on either ſide could be made; and the Grand Seigniour, although he was but now fifteene yeares of age, yet was he ſtrong, vigorous, and of a high ſpirit, and more than deſirous of a war, but eſpecially with the King of Poland, from whom he looked for better ſatisfaction. This deſire was nouriſhed in him by the counſels of Ali Baſſa, grand Vizier; notwithſtanding it was vtterly diſliked by all the reſt of K the Miniſters of State, and Officers of warre in that Empire. A war was neuertheleſſe thereupon proclaimed throughout all the Turks Dominions, which did in generall diſpleaſe the common ſouldier alſo.

The Grand Seigniour the foure and twentieth of Aprill commanded payment to be made to all the Souldierie, and the day following cauſed all his Tents and Pauilions, with thoſe of his Viziers and other Officers, to be ſolemnely pitched without the citie, with thoſe of all trades that were to attend his Royall campe.

The Grand Seigniour hauing now gathered of foot and horſe three hundred thouſand (though reported to be ſix hundred thouſand) ſet forward together with his Court and traine out of Conſtantinople the nine and twentieth of Aprill, with three hundred field pieces, be- L ſide a hundred double cannon ſent vnto the frontiers by ſea; leauing Achmat Baſſa and the Boſtangi Baſſa Gouernours of the citie till his returne.

The beginning of the warre with the king of Poland.

When he was arriued at the confines of Poland, he firſt attempted the fortreſſe of Cotyn in the prouince of Moldauia, lately giuen by Gaſparo Gratiani to the Polacks. The which being ſtrong of ſcituation, and well furniſhed for defence, the Turke finding it difficult to carrie in few dayes, left it aſſieged; and paſſing the riuer of Boriſthine, found there the Chancellour of Poland intrencht vpon the borders, in a ſtrong place, and of good aduantage, kept with fourtie thouſand Polacks and Coſſacks, and eight thouſand high Dutch ſent by the Emperor in aid of the King of Poland. The Prince was incamped at Caminitza, and ſtrongly intrenched with ſixtie thouſand ſouldiers; the King abiding in Cracouia with the Nobility and his M Court. The Grand Seigniour facing the trenches vpon Boriſthine, with the multitude of his armie incloſed them round, and ſhut vp all the paſſages; ſending preſently the prince of the Tartars, Iean-beagh-Ghiray-Han with thirtie thouſand light horſe to make incurſions within the heart of Poland: who did great ſpoyle, and brought away captiues twentie fiue thouſand

A ſoules of all ſorts; which dammage did not ſo much proceed from the will of the Prince, as from a Captaine of his, a nobleman of Tartarie called Kante-Emir-Emirze, in great fauour at that time with the Emperour: for it was thought that betweene the King of Poland, and the Prince of Tartarie, there was ſome ſecret intelligence by the vertue of money.

During the ſpace of foure and thirtie daies that the Grand Seignior held theſe Trenches beſieged, almoſt euerie other day hee gaue them terrible aſſaults, but was alway forced to retire with loſſe. The Polacke in brauerie making ſome ſallies and encounters, were alſo glad to recouer their ſtrength; onely once they ſo farre aduanced in the euening with their ſhot vpon the quarter of the Ianizaries, that they made a great execution, and almoſt put the whole Campe into diſorder; and as the Turkes themſelues did confeſſe, if this ſallie had beene B giuen in the night, it had hazarded the confuſion of the whole armie: All which beeing ſeene by the Graund Seigniour, and little hope of aduancing further, for diuers reaſons hee was enforced to treat a ceſſation of Armes with the Chancellour. The firſt was, That conſidering hee had ſpent ſo much time without any aduantage, and the Winter approching, whereby his armie ſuffered great extremities of cold and other miſeries, by reaſon of terrible raines which had carried away diuers tents, horſes, and other cattell, and ſome part of his cannons. Secondly, the prouiſion of fodder was become ſo deare, that diuers forſooke their horſes for want of meanes to feed them: beſides the great mortalitie of men, of fluxes, Feauers, and colds, and the horſes of Aſia not vſed to ſuch a climate, that many men of qualitie that came out with ten and twelue, were compelled to returne on foot. Thirdly, the armie either C for wearineſſe, or for diſcontent receiued from the Emperour himſelfe, for his narrowneſſe and auarice ſhewed to the ſouldier, contrarie to the glorious example of his anceſtors in like enterpriſes, not onely refuſed to fight, but were little leſſe than mutined. Fourthly, this attempt from the beginning, proceeding meerely from the obſtinacie of the Grand Seigniour, contrarie to the counſell of all his Viſiers, who deſired generally a peace: at their ſolicitation and by the mediation of Radula Prince of Valachia, both parts were eaſily induced to treatie, and the Chancellour was drawne to ſend a Secretarie to the Grand Seigniour; where it was agreed, as followeth.

Firſt, That the Emperour ſhould raiſe his armie, and retire from the confines of Poland; and the Tartars as the occaſioners of this warre ſhould ſend an Emirze to reſide as a pledge from enſuing D incurſions. The Chancellour promiſing in the name of the King of Poland, to keepe another in the Court of the Prince of Tartarie, with condition to pay yearely as aforeſaid fortie thouſand florins (an antient pretenſion of the Tartars) as a donatiue from the King of Poland; promiſing moreouer, for the better confirmation of the future peace, to maintain a Reſident in the Port of the Ottoman Court; and vpon the arriuall of euerie ſuch Embaſſadour to ſend a preſent conformable to the Ledgiers of other Chriſtian Princes. And as the Grand Seigniour was obliged for the Tartars that they ſhould forbeare all inuaſions vpon the Polacke; ſo the Polacks ſhould binde themſelues in behalfe of the Coſſacks, that they ſhould commit no robberies in the dominion of the Grand Seignior. And further coucnanting in the name of the Poliſh merchants for the priuiledge of free traffique, to make a preſent of an hundred thouſand checquins in plate, ſables, and Bulgarie hides; alway intended with this E reſeruation, that this treatie ſhould not preiudice or binde, vntill the Graund Seigniour did ſend a Chiaus to the King of Poland with theſe ouertures, that he might haue time to aſſemble his Parliament, and there reſolue to ſend an Embaſſadour with ample authoritie to treat and conclude a finall peace in the Port. Whereupon the Grand Seignior being ſatisfied with theſe conditions, did diſpatch preſently his Nuntio into Poland, and ſuddenly to the great content of all his armie, he raiſed his campe and returned to Adrianople.

The loſſes in the Turkiſh and Poliſh armies.

By relation of diuers preſent in that warre, it was reported, That there died in the Turkes campe, by the ſword, famine, ſickneſſe, and cold, about eightie thouſand men, and aboue an hundred thouſand horſe; and the remaine at their returne appearing ſo naked, ſickly, and poore, made euident demonſtration of the great loſſe and miſerie ſuſtained. The Polacks in F their trenches loſt aboue twentie thouſand by the famine ſuffered in their beſieging: ſo that if the Winter, and other wants had not conſtrained the Grand Seignior to riſe with ſome pretence of honor, and that he had ſtaied a few daies longer, they had been enforced to render or periſh; which is euident, in that they were glad and prompt to accept of any agreement, although as yet there was nothing fully concluded.

The Grand Seigniour enraged that the Emperour had ſent aids to the Pole.

The Grand Seignior being informed that the Emperour of Germany had ſent aid of eight thouſand Dutch to the King of Poland, and enraged that he had ſo little aduanced in that attempt; pretending that the Emperour by giuing ſuccours had broken the peace; to vent his choler, contrarie to the aduice of his Councell, preſently vpon his ariſing from the confines of Poland, in his campe proclaimed warre againſt Germanie for the next Spring; commanding vpon great penaltie, all his ſouldiers and ſlaues to be readie for that inuaſion. Which gaue great diſcontent to the Armie, inſomuch as they did almoſt publiquely profeſſe, they neither could nor would follow him. And conformable to this his raſh reſolution, hee gaue order to Kante-Emir-Emirze , a Tartarian Captaine then Baſſa of Siliſtra, to winter with twentie thouſand of his ſouldiers in the countrey. Preſently hereupon, Cæſar Gallo the Emperours Embaſſadour was ſtayed at Buda; the Grand Seigniour pretending, that the ſaid Cæſar Gallo had promiſed vpon his life, That the Emperor would giue no aid to the king of Poland. Not conſidering that hee himſelfe, contrary to the peace, the Sommer before had ſurpriſed Vatz a towne of Hungarie, and had permitted many of his ſouldiers to follow the Prince of Tranſyluania, as voluntiers againſt the Emperour.

The King of Poland hearing of this reſolution againſt the Emperour, called the Chiaus ſent about the Treatie, before him, and told him, That if the Grand Seigniour ſhold proceed to make war vpon the Emperour for his occaſion, that he could conclude no peace with him, being obliged to take part with the Emperour as his deere brother and confederate. Which meſſage the Chiaus ſent to the Grand Seigniour, when he was yet at Adrianople, where hee either purpoſed to Winter to affright the Emperour, or to quicken the Polacke to a concluſion of peace: cold in his ſudden pretence, by the perſuaſions of the Viſiers and Mufti, hee changed his reſolution, and tooke his way to Conſtantinople, where hee entred the laſt of December.

Now it being giuen out, that the Emir of Sidon in Siria was in rebellion, and that he had poſſeſſed himſelfe of the citie and caſtle of Tripolie, the Grand Seignior pretended to go in perſon againſt him, and gaue out 60000 Checquines to prepare his carriages and pauilions; and tooke order to prouide his pallace in Aleppo, determining to paſſe that way to amuſe and raiſe ſuſpition in the Perſian: and likewiſe commanded the armie of Aſia to be in readines by the end of the month of April; & gaue out commiſſion for victuals, munition, & other neceſſaries. The Mufti, Hoja, & other the Viziers (who knew not the miſtery) miſliking this counſell, with great inſtances & reaſons diſſuaded him, as being a courſe verie dangerous to his eſtate. Firſt, that his Maieſtie ſhould go in perſon, leauing all Greece deſolate, and commit the care & gouernment of his Imperial ſeat to a poore Chimacham or lieutenant; it not being probable that the Emir of Sidon would ſtay to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the force of his royal armie, but rather make an eſcape, and retyre himſelf to ſome part of Chriſtendom: & that a Generall by land, and the Captaine Baſſa Admirall of the ſea, with his Fleet of Gallies, would ſuffice to puuniſh and deſtroy him. Beſides, if his Maieſtie vndertooke the journey in perſon, it was neceſſarie that all his ſouldiers ſhould attend him, which were a charge ſuperfluous and aboue the enterpriſe, and almoſt impoſſible for them, hauing been ſo harraſſed and diſtreſſed in the late inuaſion of Poland (who did euen publiquely murmure that they would not go.) For which reaſons the King changed his reſolution, and was content to make a Generall by land with the Armie of Aſia; to which charge was named the Baſſa of Cairo. The next day after the Grand Seigniours comming to the Arſenall, he called the Vizier Baſſa, the Admirall, and the great Treaſurer before him; where it was concluded to make readie at leaſt a hundred Gallies: for the preparation whereof ſixtie thouſand Checquines were then deliuered; the Vizier promiſing to furniſh the reſt of the whole charge with expedition, of his owne purſe, and to take it vp vpon the Kings aſſignations. Whereupon the Grand Seigniour with great content did veſt them as a marke of fauour, and gaue preſent commiſſion to the Admirall to be readie and to depart by the middeſt of Aprill following; and for his better ſtrength he gaue a command to ſend for aids to Tunis and Algier: which was thought requiſite, becauſe it was reported, that the Prince Philibert of Sauoy, then Viceroy of Sicilie, had in readineſſe ſixtie Gallies and ſix Gallions at Meſſina, which force was doubted would be employed to giue ſuccour to the Emir of Sidon, or to reuenge the attempt and late ſacke of Manfredonia; ſo that they were with all expedition rigging and preparing the Armado in the Arſenall; nall: and for prouiſion and preuention of the worſt, there was ordained twelue ſmall gallies and the ordinarie fleet of Frigots to keepe the blacke Sea from the incurſion of the Coſſacks. And though it was giuen out that this army was onely prepared againſt the Emir, yet many that vnderſtood the ſecrets of that empire, knowing it to be too great, did beleeue it ſhould be ſent to preuent a generall reuolt which was then murmured and ſuſpected in Aſia.

The Grand Seigniour married.

About this time, contrarie to the Counſell and will of all his miniſters, the Grand Seigniour married the Grand childe of a Sultana, wife to Pertau Baſſa onely for her beautie, without any pompe, which was ill interpreted in that Court; his anceſtours of late yeares not vſually taking wiues, eſpecially of a Turkiſh race, for reſpect of kindred. This and other inconſtancies, with extreame auarice, made him odious with the ſouldier; and his daily haunting the ſtreets on foot, ſometimes diſguiſed with a Page or two, prying into houſes and Tauerns like a pettie officer, encreaſed his contempt euen in the Citie.

Secret order to make war vpon the emperor.

Secret order was giuen about the ſame time to Diac-Mahomet the Baſſa of Caniſia, and to Gelut-Emirze a Tartarian, to vnite themſelues with Bethlem Gabor againſt the Emperour of Germanie: But the Baſſa of Buda did aduertiſe the Graund Seigniour, that Gabor had concluded peace with the Emperour; which newes did greatly diſpleaſe him, being ardent in the deſire of warre.

His Maieſty of great Britains embaſſador arriued at the Port.

The peace betweene the Graund Seigniour and the King of Poland, was not yet fully concluded; but Embaſſadours weekely expected at the Port from Poland and other places, to haſten a full conſummation thereof. Amongſt which, Sir Thomas Roe Knight Embaſſadour in ordinarie from his Maieſtie of Great Britaine to the Grand Seigniour, arriued there the firſt of Ianuarie, and had his firſt audience of him ſpeedily, when he made this ſpeech vnto him in Engliſh, which immediatly hereafter followeth.

Moſt high and mightie Emperour, his ſacred Maieſtie the King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, my moſt gracious Lord and Soueraigne, according to the antient league of friendſhip and amitie, of long time begun and continued betweene the moſt noble Anceſtours of your Maieſties, and in his Royall perſon confirmed by his ſundrie Embaſſadours and Letters, both to your renowned father, and your Imperiall Maieſtie; being fully determined on his part, to maintaine, and inuiolably to hold, a faire and good peace and correſpondencie with your Maieſtie: hath commanded and ſent mee with his Letters of credence and friendly Preſent, to reſide as his Embaſſadour in your Royall Court. Not doubting but your Imperiall Maieſtie will accept them, and receiue mee, his vnworthie ſeruant with your woonted honour and fauour; and that you will giue credit vnto mee in diuers matters of importance which he hath commanded me to deliuer in his name, comprehended in fiue articles written in this Memoriall: And that you will be pleaſed to do therein according to the Royall friendſhip of his Maieſtie and your princely wiſedome and Iuſtice. The particulers whereof, I deſire your Maieſtie to read and conſider at your eaſe and leiſure; and to affoord me your Royall anſwer, his Maieſtie reſting aſſured hee ſhall receiue content and ſatisfaction worthie his Royall friendſhip.

The Letter of Credence ſent by Sir Thomas Roe.

His Maieſties letter to the Grand Seignior.

Iames by the Grace of God King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, Defendour of the Chriſtian Faith, againſt all thoſe that falſly profeſſe the name of Ieſus, &c. To the moſt high and mightie Prince, Sultan Oſman Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Ottoman Kingdome and Empire of the Eaſt, ſendeth health and greeting.

We doubt not but you receiued our Letters ſent you by our ſubiect Iohn Chapman, whereby wee ſignified vnto you our royall pleaſure to recall and diſcharge our Embaſſadour Sir Iohn Ayre, from his employment and reſidencie in your Court, whom we deſired you in your princely fauour to diſmiſſe for our eſpeciall ſeruice, and to receiue the bearer of our ſaid letters as Agent, to remaine in your protection; for the better ſupport and maintenance of our ſubiects, which doe trade and abide in your Dominions, and for the aduancement and continuance of the mutuall commerce and friendſhip, which hath beene a long time contracted betweene your predeceſſours and ours, vntill the arriuall of our ſeruant Sir Thomas Roe; of whom as then we made choice to ſend vnto your Port as our Embaſſadour; as well to propound vnto you diuers things neceſſarie for the generall peace, as to reſide in your Court for our particular ſeruice. Notwithſtanding, leſt the ſaid letters ſhould not come ſafely to your royall hands, wee haue thought fit againe to make knowne our purpoſe of recalling our former Embaſſador Sir Iohn Ayre, and to deſire you to diſcharge and diſmiſſe him from your Port, and to receiue and admit in his roome our truſtie and welbeloued ſeruant Sir Thomas Roe one of the principall Gentlemen of our Court, and of our Priuie Chamber, whom wee haue now expreſſely ſent, and whome wee authoriſe vnder our great Seale of England as our Embaſſadour to reſide at your Port, and to negotiate in our name, and in the behalfe of our ſubiects abiding within your Kingdomes: of whoſe fidelitie and diſcretion as we are well aſſured, ſo wee doubt not but hee will giue you good content in his demeanor and negotiation with you. Wee haue alſo thought fit to put you in minde of thoſe common rouers vpon the ſeas, who are enemies to the Lawes of Nations, and ſpoylers of the quiet and peaceable Merchant, by whom amitie and friendſhip is maintained between Kings and Princes: That you would pleaſe to exerciſe your great and mightie power to chaſtiſe and deſtroy them, as traitors to you honour, and infringers of the ſacred and publique peace. In full aſſurance that you wil extend the ſame good reſpect vnto vs, as your Royall anceſtors haue done vnto our moſt renowned predeceſſors, wherby that antient league and commerce may be inuiolably maintained betweene both our Kingdomes, which on our part wee ſhall be verie loath to infringe or diſſolue. We doe by theſe our letters recommend vnto your princely fauour, this our ſaid truſtie ſeruant and Embaſſadour, to reſide and remaine in your Port, on our behalfe to treat with you in all affaires for the publique weale of our dominions, and for the generall peace of vs both, and our allies and friends, as alſo for the ſupport and aid of all our ſubiects, which doe liue and trade within your eſtates and countries; to whoſe good diſcretion we recommend their affaires, and by whoſe induſtrie and mediation we conceiue our people may be relieued in their iuſt and reaſonable demands, to the perfect maintenance and aſſurance of that mutuall commerce which hath ſo long time beene continued betweene our Royall progenitours. And as wee haue great cauſe to profeſſe our gratefull acknowledgement, for many fauours which our former Embaſſadours and all other our ſubiects, haue, and doe receiue from your Royall hands, ſo in our princely loue, we doe intreat you to take knowledge of, and to command redreſſe for diuers oppreſſions and wrongs done vnto ſome of our ſaid ſubiects perſons and goods, that liue vnder the aſſurance of your friendſhip with vs, which wee haue formerly ſignified to our Reſidents at your Port: but as wee verily beleeue, they haue neuer come vnto your eares, that are open to the iuſt complaints of all ſtrangers; whereof we haue now giuen charge to our ſeruant and Embaſſadour to acquaint you with more at large, vnto whom wee deſire you to giue protection and credit in whatſoeuer he ſhall moue and propound, for the eſtabliſhing, confirmation, and inlargement, in all occaſions, of thoſe liberties and priuiledges which our ſubiects haue antiently enioyed by the benignitie of your ſelfe, and of your Royall anceſtours. And in all other things and occaſions, wherein hee hath or ſhall receiue our commands, as if our ſelfe did communicate them with you, which wee doubt not ſhall redound to the great vtilitie and honour of both our Empires. And ſo wee wiſh you health and true felicitie. Dated at our Royall Citie of London, the ſixth day of September, Anno Dom. 1621, and of our Raigne of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, the nineteenth.

Articles propounded by the Embaſſadour to the Grand Seigniour.

I First, his ſacred Maieſtie of Great Britaine, according to the moſt noble and renowned league of amitie, betweene your Maieſties and your Crownes and Dominions, hath commanded me to renew the antient capitulations and priuiledges granted by your Imperiall Maieſtie and your Royall anceſtours, and therein to mooue your Maieſtie, that you will be pleaſed to enlarge and extend your fauour to our Nation that liue vnder your protection, and to giue remedie to diuers iniuries done vnto them by the Coſtomers of this Royall Port, Aleppo, Smirna, Scio, Petras, and other places, contrarie to the Iuſtice and honour of your Maieſtie: and that you will bee pleaſed to giue order for ſeuerall commands to theſe places, in all our iuſt occaſions: that both the fame of your iuſtice may be renowmed, and the friendſhip of your Maieſties confirmed, and the coreſpondence and commerce betweene your Dominions eſtabliſhed and encreaſed.

II Secondly, his Maieſtie hath commanded me to offer himſelfe as a mediatour of peace, to accommodate

A commodate the late breach with the Kingdome of Poland, the King of Poland hauing ſent his Embaſſadour expreſſe into England to deſire his aid, he hath thought it more agreeable to his honour and to the antient league of friendſhip, to vſe his credit with your Maieſtie to procure the generall quiet and peace of the Princes of Chriſtendome; deſiring your Maieſtie to conſider his intereſt in the publique cauſe, and not to deſpiſe the forces of ſo many as may partake in the quarrell: which if your Maieſtie ſhall hearken vnto, the rather for his ſake, as your royall Anceſtor hath done in the like occaſion, his Maieſtie will accept it as a reſpect of your loue, which will aſſure and encreaſe the commerce and friendſhip of your Dominions; in which his Maieſtie hath giuen me more particular and full inſtructions to treat and mediate in this buſineſſe.

III Thirdly, his Maieſtie hath commanded me to moue your Imperiall Maieſtie for the releaſe of diuers B of the Poliſh Nobilitie, now your Captiues; and for one Scottiſh Gentleman, a ſubiect of his Maieſtie my Royall Maſter.

IV Fourthly, his Maieſtie deſires, that you will take ſome order with the Pyrats of Tunis and Algier, who ſhelter themſelues vnder your Royall protection (to the great diſhonour of your Maieſtie) and doe many robberies vpon the ſubiects of Kings and Princes in amity and league with your empire, and take euen the ſhips ſent vnto your Royall Port: admoniſhing your Maieſtie to conſider, that if they be ſuffered to continue, they will occaſion the diſſolution of all commerce and trade; being common enemies to all honeſt Merchants, by whom the friendſhip of theſe Kingdomes are maintained and increaſed. And that if your Imperiall Maieſtie pleaſe not to exerciſe your Royall power and authoritie to bridle or deſtroy them; that then you will not take it in ill part, that his Maieſtie, with other C Princes his Allies, ſhall make an Armie to puniſh both them and all others that receiue and cheriſh them; which hath hitherto been forborne in reſpect onely of your Maieſtie: and that the towns where they harbour themſelues are or ought to be vnder your Imperiall command.

V Fiftly, his Maieſtie hath commanded me to require Iuſtice and reſtitution of a great ſumme of money taken from Arthur Garaway here impriſoned by force and iniurie in the time of Achmet Baſſa: whereof his Maieſties former Embaſſadours haue complained to Sultan Achmat, your Maieſties renowmed father, and to Mehemet Baſſa Vizier, to Huſſen Baſſa, to the Hoja of the King, and to the Mufti; wherein your Maieſties moſt noble father gaue command for our ſatisfaction. All the ſaid great Officers hauing heard the cauſe, vpon examination giuing their teſtimonies of the great wrong done vnto him; Mehemet Baſſa alſo writing a letter, by the order of your Maieſties Royall D Father, promiſing iuſtice and reſtitution; which his Maieſtie doth yet expect, and againe demand. And hauing ſo often written in this cauſe, his Maieſtie will not beleeue, but that in juſtice and honour this Royall Court would do right; imputing the fault to his owne Miniſters and Embaſſadors, that they neuer complained to your Imperiall Maieſtie, according to his highneſſe command. Alſo his Maieſtie hath commanded me to require and deſire your Maieſtie to giue him your Royall anſwer in all theſe particulars, by your letters in writing, as ſhall be fit for your owne honour, and conformable to the antient league of amitie and friendſhip betweene your Royall Maieſties.

His Majeſties Embaſſadour not many dayes after ſent to the Viſier, who had promiſed him an anſwer vnto theſe Articles; who returned him this that followeth.

The grand Seigniors anſwer.

E To the firſt he ſaid, That the Emperour his Maſter had giuen him order to renew the Capitulations, and to make any ſuch additions as ſhould be requiſite, agreeable to their law, and conformable to the antient League; and that therein his Majeſties Embaſſadour ſhould finde no difficultie: for they honoured his Majeſtie, and were reſolued to giue him aſſurance of their will to maintaine a true friendſhip; and therefore deſired the Embaſſadour to draw and prepare the Capitulations, and ſend them to him and the Chancellour, who would conſider them, and being ſuch as were fit to be granted, the Embaſſadour ſhould haue ſpeedie order.

To the ſecond, the Vizier anſwered with great ſubtiltie; Firſt, iuſtifying the occaſion of the warre, and imputing the fault to the Coſſacks, maintained by the Pole to rob euen at the port of Conſtantinople: therefore that the Emperour could not in honour but chaſten and deſtroy F them, hauing firſt by meſſage demanded juſtice againſt them; and now his Maſter being ingaged with great charge, and in his honour he could make no peace with them who had beguiled him: pretending that they had no other intention but the warre, becauſe hauing raiſed his campe, and diſſolued his Armie, the Polacks now ſcorned him, and kept no faith, neither ſending Embaſſadour nor meſſenger, no not any Letter ſince their returne. That therefore they could not hearken to any condition: and that his Majeſtie of Great Britaine did not value the G honour of the grand Seigniour in this motion.

To the third, the Viſier replied, That the motion for the priſoners was vnſeaſonable, becauſe in order it ſhould follow the Generall treatie, and making peace; which if finiſhed, his Maieſtie of Great Britaine ſhould finde, that for his ſake, all thoſe mentioned in the Memoriall ſhould bee free, except onely the Prince Coreskie, who had beene the cauſe of many troubles, and had made eſcape from priſon formerly.

To the fourth, the Viſier made proteſtation in the Grand Seigniours name againſt the Pyrats, offering that his Maieſties Embaſſadour ſhould haue what commands, what meſſage he would deſire in companie of any Engliſhman.

To the fifth the Viſier replied, It was an old obſolete quarrell, and that the Embaſſadour did him injurie to preſſe him, when in the time of three former Viſiers, his predeceſſors could obtaine no reliefe: therefore hee would not looke backe vpon the actions of other men, nor H rake among the bones of the dead: but he deſired the Embaſſadour ſhould reſt ſatisfied, that while He had the honour to gouerne, there ſhould no wrong be done vnto the Engliſh Nation, and that hee would heare all complaints, ſo as no man ſhould need to looke backe vpon his actions.

This perfunctorie anſwer, did not much ſatisfie his Maieſties Embaſſador, but that he deſired ſome other of effect, beeing loath to accept of generalities, and therefore required a direct reply for his own diſcharge: which was promiſed after much preſſing, by the Viſier who had firſt vndertaken the ſame.

The long ſtay of the Duke of Sbaraskie (choſen extraordinarie Embaſſadour by the King I of Poland, to conſummate the peace betweene him and the Grand Seigniour) did much trouble the Emperours Court; and eſpecially the Viſier, who procured the ceſſation of Armes, but that a letter was writ by the King of Poland, which did a little prolong their hopes. In the meane time the Emperour divulged a pretence to viſite Mecha, the tombe of Mahomet his great Prophet; contrarie to the counſell and inſtance of all his Viſiers that knew not the ſecret, and euen to the hazard of a generall reuolt; for they were jealous that vnder colour of that voyage, hee had ſome other deſigne; and it was feared, the Duke would not proceed to follow him at randome, nor treat with his Deputies left at the Port: For the Polacks ſeemed in performing and aſſuring the peace, a little too glorious of their good ſucceſſe; and K the Nobilitie not ſo obedient to the King, as that he could abſolutely command; which did both trouble their Agents at the Port, and diſcontent the Turkes: ſo that a little motion of the Coſſackes or Tartars at that time (ſpoyle being both their liuelyhoods) had kindled new fires, and had diſturbed or quite broken the peace.

In the meane ſpace, the Grand Seigniour writ his letter to his Maieſtie of Great Britaine, in anſwer to his royall letter by his Embaſſadour; wherein was contained a ſatisfactorie replie to all the particulers of thoſe fiue articles deliuered vnto him. And the Grand Seigniour made ſuch demonſtration of great care to giue his Maieſtie al content and ſatisfaction, that his Letter was preſented to the Embaſſador with ceremonies of honor, requiring that it ſhould L be ſent by an expreſſe meſſenger; and gaue command for a ſafe conduct for that purpoſe. The true tranſlated coppie whereof doth immediatly follow.

Prince Oſman euer victorious.

The Grand Seigniors letter to his Maieſtie of great Britaine.

And that diuers Noblemen of Poland, and one of your Maieſties Subiects now detained in our captiuitie, ſhould be ſet at libertie. To the Beglerbeghs of Tunis and Algier, and to all other our ſlaues in thoſe parts, we will preſently ſend our expreſſe and high commaunds, and other orders, that they ſhall neuer hereafter tranſgreſſe the tenour of our Imperiall Capitulations, nor commit any iniuſtice, nor do any violence to the D Subiects of your Maieſtie. By the grace of the great God it ſhall be reuewed and examined with all Iuſtice: in the proceſſe and iſſue whereof you ſhall be aſſured to receiue a right and fit anſwer from your Embaſſador now remaining in our Court. And in our time we ſhall neuer permit, that any the leaſt iniurie or iniuſtice ſhall be done to any. Giuing you aſſurance on our behalfe, that the foundation and nerues of peace, friendſhip, and League betweene vs, are of vs ſtraitly preſerued, continued, and encreaſed: and our amitie, correſpondence, E and loue, is euer reſpected, eſteemed, and pretious with vs. Therefore in the meane time, while our Capitulations are making perfect, and that the full concluſion may be certified vnto you; your embaſſadour hauing ſolicited vs for an anſwer to the Propoſitions made by you; by an expreſſe Meſſenger, Robert Roe, this our Imperiall letter is written and ſent vnto you. Which arriuing, we hope that as in times paſt, the antient, perfect, and acceptable courſe of friendſhip, amitie, and league, adorned with aboundant ſinceritie, reſplendant loue, and benigne correſpondencie on your part, hath beene alway obſerued and maintained; ſo it is now alſo requiſite, that you preſerue the ſame affections, with all pure, firme, and conſtant good will, grace, and goodneſſe: or rather that you aduance and encreaſe therein, as we will euer doe by all ſincere wayes of loyall friendſhip and holy peace, nouriſhing it with our perfect intention and affectionate diligence, neuer admitting any occaſion that may be thereunto F preiudiciall.

Giuen in our Imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, the firſt day of the Moneth Gemaziel Achir (or Aprill) in the yeare of the departure of our Prophet Mahomet 1031; that is, Anno Chriſti Dei pari, 1622.

The Grand Seigniour diſcontented ſince his diſgrace in Poland, as ſoone as he came to Conſtantinople, meditating reuenge vpon his ſouldiers, and alteration; and finding that his pretence for Mecha did not reliſh, gaue out that hee would paſſe into Aſia to ſuppreſſe the Emir of Sidon, who had taken armes, and was reported to rebell; but indeed hauing ſecret intelligence with Oſman and the Vizier Delauir Baſſa. But from which purpoſe being diſſuaded by the great inſtance of the Vizier, and that it would not ſo well ſerue his ſecret deſignes, hee returned to his firſt colour, that hee would viſite Mecha the tombe of his falſe Prophet.

To make this voyage the more ſecure in apparance, hee ſeemed content to accept of any treatie with the Polacks, euen to conditions both of diſaduantage and diſhonour; for his eſtates in Hungarie, hee re-inforced the frontiers with diuers troupes; and though hee were much troubled at the league betweene the Emperour of Germanie and Bethlem Gabor, yet he diſſembled it ſo, as that he would not diſpleaſe the Tranſyluanian, but rather offered new ſuccours, and forbearance of his tribute. From the incurſions of the Coſſackes hee hoped to aſſure himſelfe by the treatie of the Poles; and in occaſion of breach, hee had the Tartars ready to requite them; and for more ſecuritie, hee added to the number of his gallies appointed to keep the Black ſea. The common people and Viſiers of the Port that loued reſt, and knew not the deſigne, were much troubled and diſcontent at this iourney; and made many remonſtrances to him of the inconuenience and danger, to leaue the ſeat of his Empire to the truſt of a Deputie, in a time when Bethlem Gabor was newly reconciled to the Germane Emperour, and therefore not to be truſted; and the Polackes newly reconciled to him, and therefore to bee miſtruſted. Diuers other reaſons were made to him, many petitions deliuered from the Church-men, Lawyers, and from all Eſtates. But melancholy reuenge had wholly poſſeſſed him, ſo that by no meanes he could be perſuaded to deſiſt. The ſouldierie paſſed ſo farre as to threaten publiquely, and to proteſt they would not follow, but rather ſet vp another King in his abſence, that ſhould ſtay among them. In concluſion, carried by his owne fate to deſtruction, hauing firſt commanded away his Armado to the Leuant, and thereby diſpoſed many of his ſouldiers, vpon Wedneſday the ſeuenth of May, hee began to paſſe ouer his tents and pauilions to Aſia ſide, with great quantities of treaſure. The Ianizaries and Spahies, who had alſo ſecret intelligence, vpon the King his owne words and actions betraying ſome further proiect than a Pilgrimage (for hee made preparations to carrie away all his jewels and treaſure, euen defacing his pallace, and taking from Churches, and his Ward-robes whatſoeuer could be conuerted to Bullion) ſuddenly met at the Hippodrome in the citie, vpon a word giuen; and from thence ranne to the Seraglio in tumult, but without armes, and there according to their barbarous mutinies, cryed out for the the King; (hauing firſt taken order to ſtop the paſſage of any thing vpon the water) Who appearing to them, asked, What this inſolencie meant, and what they pretended? They then, by the mouth of a multitude (for they had no head but that of the monſter) demanded firſt, That he ſhould not proceed in his purpoſe to goe to Mecha, nor into Aſia; but that he would abide in the citie. Secondly, they required to haue deliuered to their furie, the great Viſier Delauir Baſſa, the Hoja or Confeſſor of the King, the Caſlariaga Gouernour of the women, the Teſterdar or Treaſurer, the Cadde leſchar or chiefe Iuſtice, and ſome others, as enemies to the State, and conſenting to this voyage, which they pretended would be the ruine of the Empire. The firſt, after a little diſpute, the King granted vnto them, promiſing to giue ouer his journey; but they not content, exacted it in writing. To the ſecond hee replyed, That it was diſhonour to him to haue his ſeruants ſo vſed without order of Iuſtice: but perſuaded them to haue patience, to ſtay vntill Saturday, the next Diuan or publique Councell, where they ſhould appeare, and if they were found culpable, they ſhould receiue puniſhment; not meaning to performe any of this, but to get time, and allay their preſent furie. Theſe fellows not content with this moderat anſwer, vndertooke to know that they were guiltie, and therefore that they needed no other witneſſe, tryall, nor judge, but themſelues; and with extreame clamour called to haue them rendered. But the King refuſing to giue them any other ſatiſfaction, and they vnprepared for force, returned into the citie, which now was all in feare, euerie houſe and ſhop ſhut vp, expecting a generall ſacke. But they followed the way of their owne hatred, and firſt went into the houſe of the Hoja, which they brake and pillaged: But

A not finding him, they proceeded to the great Viziers, who made ſome defence, and they (being vnarmed) beat them off; and ſo they ſeparated, being now euening, but yet kept a gard in ſome parts of the Towne.

That night the King made an attempt to ſend ouer to Aſia ſide, but was preuented; and to fortifie and defend the Seraglio, which was ſtrongly walled about, and had alway in it of houſhold ſeruants about three thouſand: but it ſeemed no man would arme himſelf in his cauſe;
for the next morning the Mutiniers aſſembled againe, and taking their armes, went firſt to the Mufti, or Archprieſt among them, and enforced him and diuers others to accompanie them to the Court, where they anew demanded theſe men, but with more inſtance and furie. In the meane time the Hoia, Cadeleſcher, and Tefterdar fled, and were not in long time diſcouered.
B The Vizier retyred to the King, and perſuaded him earneſtly to go ouer in perſon in his owne boats (which from his garden he might eaſily do) to Aſia, and there to take horſe, and he would ſecure him from all perill; but the King would not moue, bidding him ſtay confident and aſſured that he would puniſh theſe Rebels.

The Ianizaries mutiny againſt the grand ſeigniour.

The wiſe old man ſeeing this conſtancie or obſtinacie, deſired leaue to ſhift for himſelfe;
which he tooke or obtained, and ſo got away to the hermitage of a Saint renowmed amongſt them; who (like himſelfe) betrayed him, yet did him the fauour as not to deliuer him to the multitude, but perſuaded and carried him backe to the Kings houſe. At this time it was diſputed in the Seraglio about the deliuerie of thoſe Officers; the Emperour refuſing, the rebels clamouring and threatening; inſomuch as he began to feare they would breake in, and in their C rage do worſe than was yet pretended. Whereupon (whether by the Kings order, or by his owne conſent, willing to be the peace offering) the braue Vizier went out to them, and with a good aſſuredneſſe demanded what they ſought of him, and wherein he had offended. At firſt they were amaſed; but one inſolent villaine breaking the generall modeſtie, they anſwered him with their ſwords, and ſuddenly cut him in pieces.

The great Vizier ſlaine by the Ianizaries.

The Emperour ſeeing their furie ſo outragious, had now more cauſe to doubt, and retired himſelfe, then too late, when he had loſt his faithfull Counſellour; and would haue fled into Aſia, but could not, yet he conueyed himſelfe into a priuat place prepared by his Boſtangi Baſſa, or chiefe Gardiner. The Rebels continued without in their madneſſe, asking for the King, and for more ſacrifices. But the ſeruants proteſting they knew not where he was, they D ſaid they muſt haue a King, and if he would not appeare they would make another: and hauing a while attended, they reſolued to enter the Palace (but firſt tooke a generall oath not to ſacke the Imperiall Throne, which they called their Houſe and their Honour) and there ſeeking for the King, not able to finde him, they extorted by confeſſion the Caſſariaga, and ſlew him; and then they demanded for Muſtapha, vncle to Oſman, by him formerly depoſed, a man eſteemed rather holy (that is, franticke) than wiſe, and indeed fitter for a Cell than a Scepter.
The King the firſt day of this tumult had put Muſtapha into a vault with two Negro women, without bread or drinke; in which eſtate theſe new Electors found him, almoſt naked, and halfe pined. At firſt ſight he thought they had beene the meſſengers of death: but that feare paſſed ouer, and his firſt requeſt was a cup of water. Whom they tooke vp, and inſtantly proclaimed
E him their Emperour; which he was loath to accept, in a manner aſhamed to be raiſed to that dignitie. How vnſtable are the eſtates of the greateſt Princes! for hee that was but euen now in the iawes of death, naked, ſtarued, and dying for thirſt, is become a great Monarch, may drinke gold, or the innocent bloud.

The Ianizaries demand Muſtapha.

They as yet not knowing what was become of Oſman, and loth to truſt Muſtapha in the palace, carried him in triumph to the old Seraglio, and there left him; departing to the ſacke of the Viziers houſe, and ſo in the euening to their Rendeuous, where they kept both good gard and good order in the citie, from fires and other inſolencies. Sultan Oſman amaſed with theſe newes, ſo ſoone as they had left the Court, came out, and called to councell in the night Huzein Baſſa late Vizier in the Poliſh warre, and the Aga of the Ianizaries, both faithfull to him, F and demanded their aduice: firſt hauing ſent to the old Seraglio, to practiſe the women there to ſtrangle Muſtapha; but ſome of them taking his part, a new vprore began in the houſe betweene that Sex; and the ſouldiers that kept watch hearing the noyſe, entred in and reſcued him, and from thence remoued him to the chambers of the Ianizaries, where they garded him for that night in an ill lodging. All this while Oſman conſults what courſe to take. Theſe two his friends, and ſome others, tell him that the caſe was deſperat, & could not be cured but G by a deſperate remedie: and therefore they agreed, that the Aga ſhould go and perſuade, with the Mufti; and that the King in the morning ſhould ſuddenly preſent himſelfe to the ſoldiers at their owne dore, and make experience what his preſence, his ſubmiſſion, and his beneuolence promiſed, could worke, to moue them to loyaltie or compaſſion. Which counſell early in the morning they put in practiſe. The King, accompanied with the Mufti (who neuer conſented to his depoſing, though he fauoured the ſouldiers againſt the Vizier) with Huzein Baſſa, and about twelue horſemen, went directly to the Ianizaries Colledge, where Muſtapha was kept, and there in teares made them an Oration; offering great recompence, repenting of his errour, and finally inuoked them by the merits of his father and all his Anceſtours, to haue ſome pitty vpon their true Maſter. The multitude (tam prona in miſericordiam, iam quam immodica H ſæuitia fuerat; ſometimes as prone to pitty as they were before to hatred) now knew not what to do; a ſilent murmure now ranne among them, and they were halfe conuerted: but the Aga of the Ianizaries thinking to merit of the King, and beginning to plead vnſeaſonably for him, with ſome harſh words of vpbraidure (vt natura maris omni flatu venti turbida; as the nature of the ſea is to ſwell with euery blaſt of wind) anew moued their furie, ſo that they cried out Treaſon, and fell vpon him and HuZein Baſſa and cut them into pieces, euery man taking a part of their fleſh to ſatiate their reuenge. The Mufti would ſpeake, but was withdrawne by ſome, for reſpect to his place, and with difficultie was conueyed away. Now the poore Oſman ſaw his friends ſlaine, and knew not which way to conuert himſelfe, but binding vp his eyes with a napkin, expected death as the laſt of their furie. But they carried him I firſt before Muſtapha, and accuſed him as the diſturber of the peace of the Empire, and demanded ſentence againſt him (More vulgi ſuum quiſque flagitium alijs obiectans) The forſaken Prince pleaded for life, and the new king knew not how to condemne, but nodded and agreed to all that was propounded. At laſt they conſulted with themſelues, and put him vpon an horſe (an inſolent Spahi changing turbants with him) and ſent him away priſoner to the ſeuen towers, vnder good gard (in his paſſage begging a draught of water at a fountaine) and then returned to their new maſter, and placed him in the Seraglio and Imperial Throne; where hee had need to haue good broaths and nouriſhment to reſtore his decayed bodie.

Daout Baſſa ſtrangleth Sultan Oſman in priſon.

The ſouldiers now thought all was done, and (onely ſacking the houſes of Huzein Baſſa K and ſome others their conceiued enemies) returned in quiet to their ſeuerall lodgings, and had no further malice. But the new Vizier Daout Baſſa, made by Muſtapha, knew well, if Oſman liued, that this ſtorme might paſſe ouer, and he would as eaſily, and by the ſame meanes returne to his eſtate, as he fell from it (vulgus vt mos eſt cuiúſque noui motus cupidum:) Therefore he conſulted with ſome few intereſſed in Muſtapha's preferment, and thereby obnoxious to Oſman, to ſearch how many of the Royall bloud were left aliue, and reſolued if there remained two, to make an end of Oſman. Two of his brothers were found, the one about twelue, * the other about ſeuen yeares of age: and thereupon the Vizier went himſelfe to the priſon with a packe of hangmen, and gaue order to ſtrangle the vnfortunate Prince: who now hauing had no reſt in two nights, and thinking himſelfe ſecure for a ſeaſon, was newly falne aſleepe: but awaked by the comming of theſe meſſengers, asked, What newes? ſaying hee did L not like their ſudden intruſion. They at firſt ſtood amaſed, and the king made ſhew to defend himſelfe; But a ſtrong knaue ſtrook him on the head with a battle-ax, and the reſt leaping vpon him, ſtrangled him with much ado. Thus one of the greateſt Monarchs in the world was firſt affronted by mutined troups, his owne ſlaues, almoſt vnarmed, and few in number, no man taking vp a ſword to defend him: and they who began this madneſſe, not meaning to hurt him, by the increaſe of their owne furie, which had no bounds, depoſed him againſt their owne purpoſe, and at laſt expoſed his life, againſt their will, to the counſels of other men whom they equally hated. And now they mourned for their dead King as freſhly, as they raged vnreaſonably; knowing they had ſtained their houour, being the firſt of their Emperors they euer betrayed, and that they had ſet vp another that in all likelyhood they muſt change M for diſabilitie. Nunquam tulit documenta ſors maiora quam fragili loco ſtaréne ſuperbi.

This was the laſt act of the life of Sultan Oſman; but his intents and great deſignes, which drew vpon him this fatall blow, will not be vnworthy the communication: the practiſes, reaſons, ſecrets, and counſels, of all actions, being the ſoule of Hiſtorie, and res geſta but the

A bare carkaſſe: and, as many ages haue not produced ſo ſtrange an example of the incertaintie of humane greatneſſe, ſo in the diſpoſition thereof, and in the waies leading thereunto, there was ſeene euidently the wonderfull prouidence of God, in confounding the counſels of the worldly wiſe, who had layed a foundation of new greatneſſe, whereby this Prince aſpired the vniuerſall Monarchie. And laſtly, the World may ſee vpon how weake foundations this Monarchie was at firſt builded, how eaſily it was now ſhaken and corrupted; how their Kings are ſubiect to the rage of a few ſlaues, how Anarchie hath prepared it an eaſie prey to any able hand that would attempt it. From the inuaſion of Poland all theſe changes tooke their beginning.
Sultan Oſman aduanced to the Throne in his youth, full of heat and bloud, being of a great and haughtie ſpirit, verie couragious, ſtrong of bodie, and a mortall hater of Chriſtians, B enuious of the glorie of his anceſtors, and ambitious to raiſe his name aboue any of theirs, had proiected in himſelfe the conqueſt of the remaines of the bordering Europe. But to ſo great deſignes, he had one vice that reſiſted al hope of proſperity, which was, extreme auarice, vnnaturall to youth, and a ſymptome of the decrepit age of monarchs: Vbi viris luxu corrumpebantur, contra veterem diſciplinam & inſtituta maiorum apud quos virtute quàm pecunia res militaris melius ſtetit. His firſt enterpriſe was that of Poland, moued by the incurſions of the Coſſackes; which then he vndertooke of his owne head, without the counſell of any his Viziers (who in a tyrannie growne to the height by eaſe, and wealth, are euer corrupt and lazie) and againſt the liking of all the ſouldiers, who (contrarie to their inſtitution being married and fathers of families, entered into trades, receiuing nothing in warre more than in peace, C beſides danger and trauell) are not eaſily drawne from their owne chimneyes. This action he thought ſo eaſie, as he had diſpoſed of his conqueſt, and diuided the liue Lyons ſkinne.
But being met vpon the borders with a poore armie in compariſon, hee was firſt arreſted at Chotyn, a little fortreſſe, which he was faine to leaue behinde him vntaken; and then ſeeking to aduance into the plaine Countrey, by forcing the trenches of the Chancellour of Poland oppoſed againſt him, he could neuer procure his Ianizaries to fight, though ingaging his perſon once or twice beyond the regard of his qualitie, and his owne troupes readie to mutine againſt him nor to forſake him he was at laſt enforced to raiſe ſhamefully his camp, and to accept of any treatie to ſaue his outward honor. In this attempt he loſt aboue 100000 horſes for want of fodder, and eightie thouſand men for want of fighting: for they would rather die D running, or pillaging, or eating, than in the face of the enemie. For this diſgrace he conceiued ſo inward and rooted an indignation againſt the Ianizaries, and ſo iuſtly, that he often lamented himſelfe, and complayned he was no King that was ſubiect to his owne ſlaues, vpon whom hee ſpent great treaſures, and yet they would neither fight in warre, nor obey in peace, without exacting new bounties and priuiledges. Delauir Baſſa, a man of great wit and courage, lately called from the Eaſterne parts, where he had long gouerned with honor, who came in, though late, yet in a verie braue and warlike equipage, aboue all other his captaines, was ſuddenly made great Vizier, the former Huzein Baſſa being in the ſame diſgrace common with the ſouldier, though not in the ſame fault. This man was neuer bred at court, but had liued many yeares in action, and ſo had neither faction nor dependance at the Port, but E ſtood vpon himſelfe and his owne merit: and being now vnexpectedly aduanced to this high dignitie, he wrought vpon the Kings diſcontent, and nouriſhed it: and in concluſion brake with him, That it was true he was no Emperour, nor could be ſafely aliue, while the Ianizaries had the power which they lately vſurped: informing him, That they were corrupted from their antient inſtitution, and were lazie cowards, giuen ouer to eaſe and luſt: Et animi per libidines corrupti nihil honeſtum inanit. But if his Maieſtie would pull vp his ſpirits, and follow his aduice, he would prouide him a new ſouldioury about Damaſcus, Coords, of men euer bred in the frontier, with hardneſſe and warre, of great courage and experience; and that of them he ſhould erect a new Militia, that ſhould wholly depend of him, entertaining onely fortie thouſand in pay, which ſhould alway be his guard: and that in the diſtribution of euerie
F Prouince, he ſhould conſtitute that the Begler-begh in his gouernment ſhould traine ſome of the inhabitants, who in all occaſions of making a great armie, ſhould be in readineſſe, and thereby he ſhould ſpare infinite treaſures ſpent vpon theſe drones that eat vp his eſtate; and with men of new ſpirits and hopes, he ſhould be enabled to doe greater matters than any of his anceſtours: but withall he deſired the King to communicate this counſell to no man; nor

The Grand Seignior his deſigne to conquer Europe.

to truſt his life vpon anothers ſecrecie. Delauir Baſſa neuer reuealing himſelfe to any but G the king, who extreamely pleaſed with this aduice, that flattered his owne humour, conſented, and remitted all to the Viziers direction, who was a true ſouldier, and a verie wiſe man, able by his credit in Aſia, to performe all he had vndertaken: for hee was exceedingly beloued in thoſe parts, verie rich, and had kept Damaſcus, whereof he was Gouernour, for himſelfe in a late rebellion. Vpon this concluſion betweene them, it was firſt agreed, That the King ſhould pretend to goe in perſon either to viſite Mecha, or againſt the Emir de Sidon, who was mooued to take armes really to aſſiſt in the deſigne; but they vſed it to colour the departure of the Emperour: which when it was well weighed, was found, that then the armie of the Ianizaries muſt be kept together, which could not agree with their ends. Heereupon the journey of the Pilgrimage was divulged, That the King might vnder the ſhadow H of an holy deuotion goe out with a ſmall traine, and diſperſe thoſe who were ſuſpected to him. And for this, preparation was made, but ſomewhat to groſſely; by melting of all the Plate, Saddles, furniture of houſe, Lampes of Churches, and whatſoeuer could more eaſily be conueyed away in mettall, with all the jewels and treaſurie. This gaue the firſt ſuſpition, which was confirmed by diuers vnaduiſed words let fall from the King; of diſdaine againſt
the cowardiſe of the Ianizaries, and that he would ſhortly find himſelfe ſouldiers that ſhould whip them: and laſtly, diſmiſſing all his houſehold, except ſome few elect, the diſcontented ſort obſerued this and betrayed him. Delauir Baſſa kept his owne ſecret, and in the mean time prepared by his friends in Aſia ten thouſand men; about Damaſcus ten thouſand, from the Coords, beſides thoſe in readineſſe of the Emir de Sidon; and all vpon pretence of defending I the borders of Perſia, who might make ſome aduantage of the changes in thoſe parts: and gaue order, That all theſe ſhould meet the King at Damaſcus, where he would preſently cut off his guard and ſtay there, vntill he had regulated his new armie and diſcipline, and then to returne triumphant to Conſtantinople, and vtterly root out the order of Ianizaries, Spahies, and Timariots, and to exauctorate all their captaines and officers, to ſettle a new Gouernement, and to change the name of the citie. And theſe things ſucceeding, he then reſolued with his new ſouldiers to attempt the recouerie of his honor in Chriſtendome; in the meane time to hold a diſſembled friendſhip there in all parts. Certainely this was a braue and well grounded deſigne, and of great conſequence for renewing of that decayed Empire, languiſhing vnder the inſolencies of lazie ſlaues, if God had not deſtroyed it: it being verie true, That K the Turkiſh Emperour ſtands at the deuotion of his owne troupes for peace, or warre, life or death, and is in effect nothing but the Steward or Treaſurer of the Ianizaries. If this project had taken effect, what euents it might haue produced by a ciuill warre, is not eaſie to judge.
For doubtleſſe the Souldiorie would haue ſet vp another King, and maintained him as well as they could; and the Europeian part had beene in danger to haue beene torne away by the the diuiſion. Beſides, Delauir Baſſa hauing the King and the treaſurie in his poſſeſſion, and his owne credit ſo great, and his inclination velle imperare, ſo willing to beare rule, once diſcouered, it might well be thought that hee had ſome ends of his owne to ſhare a part of this mightie eſtate: if on the other ſide the Viſier had proued true and faithfull, the reformation and new erection of the diſcipline of warre, and the encreaſe of treaſure conſequent to L
the diſmiſſion of the old Militia, would haue been fearefull to all Chriſtendome; but Vbi eſt ſapiens? vbi diſquiſitor ſæculi huius? Perdam ſapientiam ſapientum, & vanam reddam intelligentiam intelligentium. It is a great queſtion whether then was the wiſer wiſh, That theſe counſels had ſucceeded, or not: for either diuiſion and ſubuerſion, or a new proſperitie and enlargement of their dominion had neceſſarily followed.

Obſeruations vpon Sultan Oſman.

Some obſeruations vpon this occaſion, will not be impertinent to thoſe that deſire to know aſwell the diſpoſition and vſe, as the things themſelues. Firſt in the purpoſe of the ſouldier, not at all to violate or hurt the King, much leſſe to depoſe and murder him; but onely to take away thoſe about him whom they though aſſiſtants in this proiect: yet the furie once on foot, they proceeded by miſſenſible ſteps, to the vttermoſt of outrage, againſt many M innocents in that buſineſſe, though otherwiſe obnoxious, and againſt the throne and life of their owne Emperour, Vbi furor ingruat, innocentes ac noxios iuxta cadere; where rage and furie hath got the vpper hand, there the innocent and nocent fare alike. Secondly in the degrees; that yet the King had not fallen thus low, if firſt he had not loſt that owe and reuerence which alway

A alway attendeth vpon Maieſty, if it be kept vp, by vnſeemly offices done by him in the ſtreets and Tauernes, apprehending many ſouldiers for petty faults, like a Conſtable, making his perſon common, cheape, and deſpiſed among them; which were wont only to be ſeene and feared, as ſomewhat aboue humane greatneſſe. And this he did alſo in hatred and diſdaine of thoſe that had in the warre forſaken him. And now in this laſt act, if his owne obſtinacy had not plunged him into deſtruction, but that he had ſoftened them by a ſeaſonable yeelding to time, he had preuailed onely by time. Thirdly in the order, that theſe Mutiniers hauing no head or direction, kept that reglement, that they tooke oath in their furie, in hot bloud, in the Kings yard, not to diſhonour, ſpoile, nor ſacke the Imperiall Throne; neither committed nor ſuffered any inſolence nor violence in the citie to the Neutrals, but rather proclaimed peace B and iuſtice. Fourthly in the conſequents, that at the third dayes end all was quiet, and all men in their trade, as if no ſuch thing had happened; onely the Ianizaries ſuffered no Diuan nor Councell vntill they had receiued a donatiue as guerdon of their iniquitie. In which alſo the infinite waſte of treaſure is worthie the conſideration, which was exceedingly exhauſted by three changes in foure yeares, and by the late warres in Perſia and Poland; for euery Ianizarie in the Citie, abſent or preſent (whoſe rolle was about fourtie thouſand) receiued twentie fiue Chequines of gold; beſides the Spahies, Iamoglans, and other Orders, at euery alteration: which amounts in all neere to two millions. And now thoſe fellowes that had taſted the ſweet of proſperous mutinies (haud ignari ſumma ſcælera incipi cum periculo peragi eum præmio) tooke ſuch a head, as could not ſafely be ſuffered on, nor ſecurely be taken off. Fiftly, of C certain preſages that foreran: for Oſman dreamed in the night, That he thought he rid a camell, and being mounted, he could not force him to go by faire means nor ſtripes: and that then hee deſcending in a rage, the bodie of the beaſt vaniſhed, and left the head in the Kings hand. Who next day troubled at this fancie, ſent to a learned man familiar with him, for the interpretation. He excuſed himſelfe, as vnfit to giue opinion in a matter of that conſequence; but perſuaded Oſman to enquire of the Mufti. He alſo craued pardon; but withall ſaid, there was none ſo fit to interpret it as Muſtapha the Kings vncle, who was eſteemed a holy man, that had viſions and Angel-like ſpeculations (in plaine tearmes, betweene a mad man and a foole.) The King repaired to Muſtapha, who briefely told him, The Camell ſignified his Empire: his riding, abuſe in gouernment: his diſſention, his diſpoſition: the vaniſhing of the Bodie, the reuolt of his D Subiects: the Head remaining in his hand, onely a bare title; and that hee ſhould ſhortly die within a few moneths, and loſe his Kingdome, but the emptie name of Emperour ſhould accompanie him to his graue.

The Engliſh Embaſſadors aduice to Delauir Baſſa.

A ſecond of leſſe conſequence in the Vizier Delauir Baſſa; from whom his Maieſties Embaſſadour hauing receiued particular friendſhip, about ſix dayes before this vprore, he went to viſit; and hauing no other buſineſſe but to perſuade him to ſtay the King from this intended pilgrimage, the Embaſſadour gaue him many reaſons in the preſent eſtate of their owne affaires; eſpecially, the Treaty of Poland yet depending. To which the Baſſa replied very grauely. Then the Embaſſadour vrged the feare of ſome tumult, collected from the licentious ſpeeches rumoured in the towne: And he was bold to deale plainly, ſincerely, and E friendly, That if any ſuch thing ſhould happen, the fault would be imputed to the Baſſa, as being of authoritie to perſuade the King; whom his qualitie and youth would excuſe, but all the fury would be diſcharged vpon the greateſt Miniſter: deſiring him to conſider the euent, at leaſt to take his affection in the beſt part.

The Baſſa's replie.

The old Reinard ſtayed a while from reply: at laſt, ſmiling to himſelfe, that he ſhould be perſuaded againſt that which was his owne counſell, he gaue a finall anſwer, That there was no remedie, he durſt not hazard himſelfe to oppoſe the Kings reſolution: but aſſured him he would ſo order the matter, as this iourney ſhould not proceed ſo farre as was expected. The Embaſſadour concluded for himſelfe, deſiring then that he would leaue him a particular recommendation to the Chimacham or Deputie as his friend. To which he ſuddenly replied, F Trouble not your ſelfe, nor feare; I will neuer remoue ſo farre but that I will leaue one of my legges in this citie to ſerue you. Which the poore man fulfilled; for being murthered within few dayes after, one of his legs whole and entire was hanged in the Hippodrome, the moſt publique place of the citie.

The reading of hiſtorie, to know what is done and paſt, hauing in it no recompence but delight, vnleſſe it looke forward to vſe and action, either to correct errours, or by that light to gather aduantage in future, it will not be an vnprofitable degreſſion to obſerue what was like to ſucceed theſe monſtrous alterations. It was feared by contemplatiue men, that the ſouldiers in Aſia, who had loſt their hope, would not ſit downe with this affront, but rather attempt ſome reuenge for the death of the King, who was their martyr: or that ſome great Baſſa, farre remoued from Court, might apprehend this occaſion, not to obey an vſurper, ſet vp by treaſon; and vnder that colour to hide their owne ambition: or laſtly, that the whole State would fall into combuſtion, and inteſtine warre. This they themſelues foreſaw, and it came to paſſe, as will appeare in the ſtorie; for within few moneths Abaſſa Baſſa of Arſorome declared himſelfe reuenger of his Princes bloud, and troubled, and almoſt hazarded the whole Empire. The Perſian apprehended the opportunitie, and recouered the Prouince and Citie of Babylon: and the ſame Souldiers that had betrayed their Prince, were neuer quiet vntill they had made ſome ſatisfaction, by reſtoring his brother and right heire: onely it pleaſed not God to open the eys of Chriſtian Princes to ſee the inconuenience of their own vnciuill quarrels, while the diſtractions of this mightie Empire did inuite to conquer it, and to diuide it as a proſtituted prey.

A practiſe to murther the brethren of Sultan Oſman.

On Saturday euening the firſt of Iune following, the Capi-aga or Maior Domo of the Seraglio, hauing receiued a ſecret order to remoue the brethren of Oſman from their lodgings, and in the night to ſtrangle them; as he was performing his command, aided with a few of his carnifices to carrie away the Princes, they cried out: the Pages running to the noiſe, and incouraged by the Caſliaraga, who had ſome ſuſpition, without further examination killed the Capiaga, now almoſt euerie Order hauing riſen againſt their owne head. That night they ſent ſecretly to the Ianizaries and Spahies, to informe them what they had done; and in the morning early hanged his bodie in the Hippodrome for a publique ſpectacle. The ſouldiers returned in furie to the Court, in fauour of the Pages, and demanded iuſtice againſt thoſe that had conſented to this wicked order, which had made an end of all the Ottoman race; onely this Muſtapha being left aliue, who was ſo holy a Saint, that he would not people the world with ſinners, nor endure any woman neere him. The innocent King proteſted hee knew nothing of this purpoſe: and if ſuch command were procured, it was gotten by ſubreption; and he was eaſily beleeued. But his mother, another Liuia, and the new Vizier, Daout Baſſa, who had her daughter to wife, were vehemently ſuſpected. It was a day of Diuan or Councell; but the ſouldiers would ſuffer none, vntill they had an account of this treaſon. The Vizier denied all; the mother was a woman, and hidden in the houſe: yet it is very likely, they both were guiltie, to vphold and ſecure their owne authoritie; it being rumoured, that the Vizier determined to place ſubditiouſly in the roome of the elder Prince, his owne ſonne, and verie like him, and ſo to gouerne Muſtapha for a time, and by his remoue to eſtabliſh himſelfe and his race for euer. But now ſomewhat muſt be done to appeaſe the people; therefore Daout Baſſa, was degraded from his office, and one Huzein Baſſa, newly arriued from the gouernment of Cairo, aduanced to his place, with promiſe of further examination. But the furie once ouer, there was no great ſearch nor diſcouerie made, for perhaps the Sultans checquines quieted the matter. The new Vizier was a man without friends, yet verie rich, of a ſtubborne and obſtinate nature, reported iuſt in his waies, but peremptorie and vnflexible (Audax ferox, ac prout animum intendit, prauus aut induſtrius eadem vi) one from whome all men might expect much good, or much ill: he begun his gouernement roughly, and vndertooke to puniſh inſolencies early, and profeſſed a reformation, or to be a ſacrifice: A man fit for thoſe times that were deſperate: for the worſt was, that he muſt at laſt endure their furie. In the meane time he procured a little awe, & reſtored the face of iuſtice: yet it was thought it could not laſt long, the Ghoſt of Oſman would not be at reſt vntill there were ſome parentalia made vnto him. The nature of the Vizier was vnſupportable; but if he preuailed, and were once ſetled, hee reſolued a new to change the King, and lay an obligation vpon the brethren of Oſman; for he did neuer thinke himſelfe ſecure vnder a man gouerned by an inſolent woman, dominandi auida, deſirous to rule. And what aſſurance could he haue in that prince, in whom there was neither iudgement nor hatred, but as it was infuſed? And though the particulars could not be foreſeene, nor where the ſore would breake out, yet the whole bodie was ſicke, their

A King being mentis inops, an Ideot; and the next in expectation a childe vnfit for action, and all the great men and ſouldiers decayed, mutined, and corrupted.

In the meane time, the Duke of Sbarasky came neere vnto the borders of the Turkiſh Empire, and ignorant of thoſe great changes which had happened, ſent a ſeruant with a letter to the dead Vizier Delauir Baſſa, with whom onely the Poles had treatie. The contents were, That the king of Poland had ſent him to conclude a peace, vpon ſuch conditions as were agreed vpon by the Vizier and the Commiſſioners of Poland, ſigned on both parts; but that it was reported vpon the death of the Grand Seigniour, that the new gouernment was varied from ſome of them; that he had no other inſtructions to treat anew; but if he would giue his word to the Engliſh Embaſſadour, that there was no alteration in the intents of peace, hee B was ready to ſet forward on his journey. This letter receiued by the new Vizier, was Greeke to him, who was lately come from Cairo, and vnderſtood no article nor piece of the buſineſſe; which was ſo ſecretly carried by Delauir Baſſa, that Sultan Oſman and he being dead, there was no man had ſo much as a copie, or knew the ſubſtance of that agreement: ſo that the Vizier giuing good words, aſhamed to confeſſe his ignorance, promiſed all things, but knew not what to write in particular anſwer, and therefore was at a ſtand. The meſſenger neuertheleſſe importuned a diſpatch, the which he had in generall termes, and ſo returned againe to the Duke his Maſter vpon the confines.

Thr Poliſh Embaſſador approcheth vpon the confines and writeth to the dead Vzier.

With this Nuntio, the Duke wrot to Sir Thomas Roe; and being verie doubtfull to entangle himſelfe in this vnſetled gouernment, deſired him both to councell him, and to tell the C Vizier, that he would not aduance vnleſſe he might receiue ſuch aſſurance of ſafety and publique faith, as that he might engage his credit to him: hoping thereby to haue both aſſiſtance and witneſſe in all his proceeding. Which gaue the Viſier occaſion to entreat the Engliſh Embaſſadour, both to promiſe for the good vſage of the Duke, and to haſten him, and alſo to enforme himſelfe by him of the ſubſtance of the treatie of Chotyn; which being by him vndertaken, it turned to the great aduantage of both, eſpecially of the Peace it ſelfe.

The ſeuenteenth of Iune in the morning the Prince Coreſkie, one of the Lords of Poland, taken priſoner in the late warre, recommended by his Maieſtie of Great Britaine, who had formerly made an eſcape from the Turkes captiuitie, was ſtrangled in the priſon, after two yeares of durance. This put all into murmure, and deepe conſideration, for what politique D end this ſhould be done, euen when they themſelues deſired a peace with the Pole, and yet did that which might vtterly breake the ſame: But it ſeemed they were at that time either carried with a brutiſh furie, or that the Prince was betrayed from home, by imitation that his remuant nature would neuer ſuffer the peace long to continue betweene the Crowne of Poland and the Grand Seigniour.

The prince Coresky ſtrangled in priſon.

The Vizier (who cauſed this Polacke Prince to be ſtrangled) vpon ſome ſpleene towards the Aga or chiefe Captaine of the Ianizaries, took this occaſion to caſt the fault on him, and to caſſiere him; & ſent him to the Iſlands to be ſtrangled; & gaue order to murder ſome other Baſſaes & Officers, and that way being made to depoſe the Emperor Muſtapha, to ſet vp Morat the childe, and brother of Oſman, many being of his partie. Wherupon the ſoldiers, roſe all in arms E at the Seraglio, taking the alarme at the medling with the Aga, reſcued their captaine, and the reſt, and demanded the head of the Vizier: wheruponhe fled, and order was giuen to kil him where he could firſt be found. The ſouldiers alſo required the letter of Morat, Aga Cuſtomer, and diuers others; but for feare of other complices, they durſt ſearch no further into the conſpiracie; onely the Viziers houſe was ſacked, and infinite treaſure taken, ſo that the ſouldier was quieted for a day or two by making a new Vizier, Muſtapha Baſſa; who was of a ſoft nature, and ſcarce durſt doe juſtice for feare of offending any man. Now a new faction was made betweene Muſtapha and Morat; and it was expected hourely when there ſhould bee ſome great ſlaughter or maſſacre in the Citie; for of neceſſitie one ſide muſt fall.

The Vizier attempteth to ſet vp Morat the brother of Oſman, and to depoſe Muſtapha.

F There was then no ſecuritie for any man; when the King and Viziers, and all officers held their liues and dignities at the courteſie of the mutined ſouldier, who had taſted the ſweet of rebellion, and caſt off all awe and reuerence, and could not eaſily be reduced to order, without much bloud and hazard of the whole. Therefore the wiſer men retired from office and imployment, and the inſufficient did cauſe their owne daily change and ruine. The ſouldier adhered to the King of their owne creation, and hee was in effect their creature, for they did wholely gouerne him. But the Lawyers and Church-men made ſecret conuentions, and ſtill practiſed ſome great alteration; and feared not to ſay openly, that the foundation of their State was diſſolued, the King vnlawfull, and all that had adhered vnto him lapſed into hereſie, hauing diſpiſed the inſtitutions of Mahomet: They wrought by wiſe counſels, and held a large correſpondencie with thoſe of their owne coat, and ſpread their confederacie to all parts of the Empire to procure a faction, and kindle a greater fire than that of the ſouldiers: for at Bagdat the captaine of the Ianizaries roſe and ſlew the Baſſa, burnt the Mufti and all his kinne, and gaue his daughter in marriage to one Aſlan Begh, a pretender to the antient inheritance of a bordering prouince, to cautionize that part. All Aſia was in doubt whom to obey; and Cairo was eaten vp with oppreſſion; and that which was moſt dangerous, they had no ſence of the ſickneſſe in the Court, to cure it, nor any of them ſo wiſe as to diſſemble it.

The prince of Tranſyluania's Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

The two and twentieth of Auguſt, the extraordinarie Embaſſador of Bethlem Gabor prince of Tranſyluania arriued at Conſtantinople; who amongſt other Inſtructions had order to excuſe his Maſter, and to declare the reaſons why he had made peace with the Emperour without the knowledge of the Port: which were, That the warre had continued three yeares in the kingdome of Hungarie, and had ſo conſumed and deſolated the countrey, that it was impoſſible for him to ſtay longer in the field, and to maintaine an armie, for the great famine and ſcarcitie of all things which the Souldierie ſuffered, and could from no place be ſupplied: ſo that if he had not accepted of peace offered, he had been enforced to quit the countrey of neceſſitie, and by his ſeeming flight haue left the enemie victor. Therefore he was conſtrained to winne time, and to returne into Tranſyluania, to refreſh his men of warre, and to re-inforce them; as alſo his owne preſſing affaires calling him backe, his brother whom hee had left Gouernour in his abſence, hauing aduiſed him, That the King of Poland, by the inſtigation of the Emperor, by intelligence with ſome of the principall Lords, did practiſe a reuolt, and promiſed aid to make a new Prince that ſhould wholly depend vpon the Empire and Poland. Laſtly, ſeeing the Grand Seigniour had ſuddenly concluded a peace with the Poles, he feared he ſhould be left alone to the burthen of the warre, in which the King of Poland, being at eaſe, might aſſiſt the Emperour, which he was not able to ſuſtaine. Therefore hee was content to take the opportunitie to accept of that, at the inſtance of the Emperour, which hee ſhould haue been forced to do by neceſſity.

Yet afterward, although he made this Apologie for his Maſter, for concluding a peace, he aſſured the Port, that his Maſter meant not long to keepe the ſame: informing them, that the Emperour had made a League (being at that time quiet in Germanie) to inuade the Ottoman Empire: perſuading the Port to grant a Commiſſion with ful power and authoritie to him and the Baſſa of Buda (who had been twentie yeares in that charge, and knew all the borders) if they ſaw it fit, to preuent the Enemie, and to inuade the Empire or the kingdome of Poland. This demand was made by Gabor to inſinuate with the State of Turkie, and to get a power dormant in his hands, to aduance into Hungarie if he ſaw aduantage, or to oblige the Emperour; and to aſſure his peace, by hauing meanes not to care if it were broken. But the Grand Seigniour finding himſelfe, by reaſon of ciuile diſtractions at home, vnfit for a warre abroad, and that they ſaw Bethlem Gabor had no other thing in recommendation than his owne deſignes and fortune, his Embaſſadours Propoſitions began to be altogether ſleighted and neglected.

The Poland Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

The Duke of Sbarasky, who came to conclude the peace betweene his Maſter the King of Poland, and the Grand Seigniour, after long ſtay vpon the confines, did at length arriue at the Port; but they made him ſtay fiue weekes before he could haue audience, forcing him to giue a Preſent, contrary to his inſtructions. Notwithſtanding he could not get them to enter into a Treatie, finding nothing but falſehood and vncertaintie among them, no promiſe nor faith kept, no priſoners deliuered, nor indeed any thing at all performed: for now that they had him within their liberties, they hoped to worke their owne ends, and to wearie him out, who had twelue hundred of his ordinarie traine. They threatened to keepe him, and to denounce a warre againſt his Maſter: yet by the mediation of the Engliſh Embaſſadour, the Miniſters of the Port and he were pieced again, and the peace concluded, as ſhall be hereafter ſet downe at large.

After

A After many difficulties to obtaine admiſſion to the preſence of the Grand Seigniour, cauſed by the frowardneſſe of the old Eunuch Georgi Mehemet Baſſa, then great Vizier; who diſcouering that the Duke would complaine againſt Tomſha Vayuod of Valachia, and his Creature, endeauoured by all fraud, cunning, threatening, and faſtidious delayes, to diuert him from that purpoſe; being loath that the actions of him whom he had foſtered and maintained in many tyrannies, eſpecially in the occaſion of the laſt warre, ſhould be examined or layed open to Iuſtice. But when he ſaw that nothing could preuaile, but that he muſt hazard a direct breach by the diſcontent of the Duke; and that the people began to murmure, and the Engliſh Embaſſadour to protect him, he was admitted, and nobly receiued, according to the pompous cuſtome of that Court; and with his Letter of Credence he ſpake theſe following B words.

The Oration of the Duke of Sbarasky to the Graund Seigniour.

SIGISMVND, by the grace of God King of Poland, Sueden, Gothia, Vandalia, great Duke of Lituania, and of many other Prouinces Prince and Lord: To your moſt renouned Maieſtie, moſt mightie Emperour of Aſia and Europe, and King of many Kingdomes and Prouinces, euer moſt happie, wiſheth health; and by me his great Embaſſadour ſalutes you with all conuenient reuerence and
C honor; deſiring to your Maieſtie from the moſt high God, the fulneſſe of all proſperitie, happineſſe, long life, triumph aboue your Anceſtors, Princes worthie of all memorie.

His high Maieſtie of Poland, conſidering the depth and height of the decrees of the great God, meruailing with all the world, and praiſing his high name; doth comfort and ioy himſelf, being more than certaine, that, that eternall power which hath preſerued your Maieſtie from all euill deſtinies of men, and from the bowels of the earth, and hath placed you in this ſhining Throne, hath not done it but for the publique good: and like a wiſe Gardiner, who hath weeded out all venomous and noyſome plants, that he hath placed your Maieſtie in their roome, as a noble and ſweet ſmelling flower, full of vertue, clemencie, and peace, deſired of all the world. His Maieſtie my Lord and Soue-
D raigne hath alwayes wiſhed, that not onely the actions of later yeares, but of many ages paſt, might haue been forgotten; and that that friendſhip and peace begun with the renowned Ottoman Kings two hundred and more yeares ſince, might haue beene without interruption continued. But ſeeing that the great God hath been pleaſed to chaſtiſe the people of both parts, by the meanes of wicked men, that muſt be accepted for good which commeth from his diuine will: and therefore blotting out of mind whatſoeuer is paſt, doth now return to deſire the continuance of the firſt antient Peace, and doth offer himſelfe to your high Maieſtie to keepe it inuiolable, as it was maintained in the time of Sultan Amurath of happie memorie. In witneſſe of which his ſinceritie, he hath not apprehended the opportunitie of the breach begun by the Perſian, the expiration of the truce with the Emperour of Germanie, nor the many reuolts and troubles in Aſia, nor hearkened to the inſtigation of many Christi-
E an Princes, his friends and Allies, nor to the Tartar diſcontented; but rather hauing refuſed all other wayes, hath with the bloud of his owne ſubiects, and the charge of his purſe, regained from the Rebell Valachia, Moldauia, and a part of Tranſyluania, and rendered thoſe Prouinces into the hands of your Maieſties father, and ſuffered no man at any time to diſturbe on that ſide the friends of your empire; giuing intelligence like a good friend and a neighbour to your Anceſtours, of all your enemies deſignes and machinations, and in as much as was poſſible endeauonred to preſerue a good peace and friendſhip; which he offereth to your moſt ſerene Maieſtie, contenting himſelfe with the Capitulations treated at Chotyn, and thoſe of your moſt happie father and brother: praying your Maieſtie that they may be confirmed and maintained. And not doubting but your Maieſtie will reſtraine the Tartars, as he will do the Coſſackes; and that you will ſuffer no occaſion of kindling new fires, he beſeech-
F eth your Maieſtie to do what iuſtice you thinke meet vpon Cantemir aud Tomſha, who contrarie to the agreements and publique faith, haue made ſpoyle and new incurſions into Poland, euen ſince my departure from thence; and with many deceits and falſe aduices haue deſired to diſturbe the happie beginnings of accommodation. And ſeeing that by the antient capitulations made with the moſt warlike Sultan Solyman, and his ſucceſſours, the father and brother of your Maieſtie; the Princes of Moldania, dauia, the Baſſaes of Siliſtria, and the Beghes of Ackirman ought to keepe the paſſages of the Riuers to reſtraine the Tartars; and that thoſe now in poſſeſſion of thoſe Gouernments are alreadie knowne, and growne old in their rapine and ſpoile, the King my Lord deſireth your renowned Maieſtie, that they may be diſmiſſed, and their Prouinces giuen to ſome others more enclined to peace. For Cantemir, it is a true rule obſerued, That one Tartar can hardly gouerne another, where both liue vpon ſpoyle: and how eaſily vpon any occaſion new troubles are apprehended by thoſe who are antient enemies, I leaue to your Highneſſe wiſedome; in which his Maieſtie is ſo aſſured, that he doubteth not, that for the publique good, and for the complaints, and teares of both ſubiects, you will alſo vouchſafe to accept the requeſt of your friend, and a King your neighbour. And if all the world, and the people thereof reioyce, and praiſe God of the friendſhip and peace betweene your Maieſtie and the King my Maſter begun and concluded he hopeth that the poore and miſerable priſoner ſhall participate of your clemency, that they may ioyne in the generall care to pray to the eternall God for increaſe of your greatneſſe. The King my Maſter doth therefore deſire your Maieſtie to grant liberty to thoſe who are in your captiuitie, as he bindeth himſelfe to ſet free all ſuch of your Maieſties ſubiects, as are now his priſoners; and I doe promiſe on the behalfe of my Maſter, that he ſhall bee a friend to your friends, and an enemie to your enemies. In concluſion, he deſireth all happineſſe and proſperitie to your Maieſtie from a cleere heart; in ſigne and teſtimonie whereof, and of the friendſhip begun on his part, hee honoureth you with a Preſent, which you may be pleaſed to receiue with your accuſtomed benignitie; and ſhutting your eares to ſuch enformers, enemies of peace, as are found at your Part, that you will eſteeme him for a friend, and neighbour of the moſt royall and antient kings of your moſt princely Family.

The ſouldiers continued ſtill in their mutinous diſpoſition, euen in Conſtantinople the head citie of the Turkiſh Empire, and grew to that height of inſolencie, that going in troupes to the Court, they demanded all offices of gaine; to be Stewards to the reuenues of the Churches, which are great; to take the Farmes of cuſtomes; and there committed many other outrages which were vnſufferable. The Viſiers durſt denie them nothing; they drunke wine in the ſtreets without prohibition, contrarie to their law; and ſtood in companies in the open day exacting money of all Chriſtians to pay for their wine; and being denied it, ſtabbed and murthered without any puniſhment: and when complaint was made to the Vizier or Magiſtrat they anſwered, None durſt meddle with them, who had murthered their owne King; and the Baſſaes themſelues deſired the Complainants patience, and that they would beare a part with the generall ſufferance.

About the ſame time, the Ianizaries in the gallies which rid before Smirna, commanded by the captaine Halil Baſſa, aſſaulted againſt his will the houſes of all the Chriſtian Conſuls there. The Engliſh with all thoſe of the Nation, were forced to runne naked from their lodgings, and to ſwimme to the Admirals galley to ſaue their liues: they ranſacked the lower parts of the houſe, and carried away to the value of two thouſand dollers; the French ſuſtained more loſſe; and the Venetians at leaſt ten thouſand, and one of the ſubiects of that State cut in pieces. The Generall had much adoe to appeaſe them by threats or perſuaſions, or to ſaue the liues of all; inſomuch as they miſcalled and threatened him, becauſe he would not conſent to their madneſſe. In concluſion, he was faine preſently to put to ſea, or elſe they had finiſhed the Trade at that place.

In Aſia there was then three open rebellions; one at Babylon, another at Arzerum vpon the borders of Perſia neere Tauris, and the third in Meſopotamia. The Viziers at the Port diſſembled all this, and durſt take no knowledge thereof, nor ſo much as to ſend a command thither, for feare of blowing the fire which would haue put all into combuſtion: whereupon they held a ſecret counſell and conſented to remooue themſelues, to proue if they could recouer the deſperate eſtate of that Empire, and tooke reſolution to make Halil Baſſa (the beſt ſouldier and moſt beloued) great Vizier; and in his roome Daout Baſſa captaine of the Sea; and the preſent Vizier, Chimachan or Lieutenant at the Port; and in the Spring following, they reſolued to ſend the Vizier into Aſia, with all the force they could make: to which end they ſent into Greece to warne all the ſouldierie to bee readie at Adrianople, not daring to make a rendeſuous at the Port, for feare of new trouble; and ſo to paſſe the Helleſpont, wide of the city, to appeaſe (if they could) thoſe reuolts, and by that way to draw the mutinies from the

A the Court into action, and to reduce them vnto obedience. And notwithſtanding that there was no other ſymptome or prediction but ſuch as threatened the ruine of that Empire, yet were they neuer prouder nor more ſeeming not to diſtruſt themſelues, their onely ſecuritie being, That they had no enemie but themſelues.

The treaſurie was farre exhauſted, the reuenue abated by the oppreſſion of euery Baſſa in his gouernment: the ſouldier increaſed both in pay and number, and ſo impatient of delay, that at euerie quarter (beſides borrowing and taking vp of the farmes of the cuſtomes beforehand) there were ſo many intollerable exactions to raiſe monies, that the apparance of domeſticke quiet could not long endure between two extreames; for means could not be found, and the Ianizaries would not be retrenched nor deferred; and this was their generall eſtate at B that time.

While the Poliſh Embaſſadour was treating the peace at the Port, whereof there was no great doubt, becauſe neither ſide was fit for warre, there arriued an Embaſſadour from the gteat Duke of Muſcouia, which gaue ſome interruption therein, preſſing the Grand Seignior to continue the warre for ſeuen yeares againſt Poland, according to the promiſe of Sultan Oſman; offering that his Maſter ſhould enter into Poland with an armie, and that they would diuide the country between them: but his propoſition was rejected, becauſe they had had ſufficient triall of his Maſters cunning proceedings in the laſt war. For the Muſcouite hauing made peace with Poland (before the inuaſion of Oſman) for fourteene yeares, and being inuited by him to breake it and to inuade that countrey, vpon promiſe that he would continue the C warre for ſeuen yeares, and make no agreement without their comprehenſion: firſt anſwered, That he could not breake the peace; thinking that the other was but a flaſh of a yong Prince: but ſo ſoone as he ſaw the Turks in the field and borders of Poland, then he began to hope he might make aduantage; and therefore promiſed Sultan Oſman on the conditions mentioned, to enter into the quarrell. And to that end diſpeeded an Embaſſadour to Poland with inſtructions to demand three things. Firſt, that the Prince of Poland ſhould renounce the title of Elect Duke of Muſcouia. The ſecond, That the Poles ſhould reſtore a territorie in the border of Lituania, taken in the late warres. Laſtly, that the peace ſhould be perpetuall; threatening that if they refuſed thoſe conditions, he would enter into the countrey with an armie, and get what he could. This Embaſſadour being arriued in the confines, heard newes that the D Poles had repulſed the Turke at Chotyn, that he was retyred, and a peace treated: whereupon he feigned himſelfe ſicke, and ſent backe a Poſt with this aduice and his old inſtructions, deſiring in this alteration ſome new order from home. The Gouernour of the towne where he lay, ſuſpecting ſomewhat, intercepted the meſſenger and his packet and ſent it preſently to the King. The man returned to his Maſter the Embaſſadour, as robbed, and was againe diſpeeded the ſecond time, and ſent backe with another ſtile, to wit with letters of congratulation, joy, and offers of all helpe and continuance of the Peace: with theſe the Embaſſadour went forward to the Court; and hauing audience, the King anſwered him, That if his meſſage were ſincere, it had been very acceptable; but he knew it to be a ſugred treaſon, and no faith intended from the Muſcouite, and therefore commanded him to depart.

E The Embaſſadour proteſted, vowed, and vſed all means to aſſure the integritie of his meſſage; vntill he was confronted by the Chancellour, with his owne letter and his Maſters Inſtructions. Hereupon was this other diſpatched to the Port to hinder the peace, and to offer all their helpe to continue an inuaſion. In the meane time the Muſcouite neglected no means to ſecure himſelfe, and by renewing two Embaſſadours, obtained a peace with Poland, which was then againe confirmed. To which the Poles were the willinger to agree, not knowing what effect the negotiations of the Duke of Sbaraſky might produce at the Port. And now the Muſcouite was forced to diſſemble againe with the Turke, and make his preparation to depart.

The great Viziar practiſeth to put Daout Baſſa to death.

The great Vizier Georgi enuying the authoritie of Daout Baſſa the beloued ſonne of F the Queene mother and brother in law to the Emperor Muſtapha (which had formerly beene depoſed) who had beene both the inſtrument and the counſellour to murther Sultan Oſman, ſcorning that he ſhould vnderhand gouerne in his raigne, eſpecially becauſe he countenanced in oppoſition the Duke of Sbaraſkies buſineſſe, he therefore practiſed to put him to death: but not daring to doe it by his owne authoritie, and in vaine to procure it from the court, hee ſtirred vp the Spahies to demand iuſtice of him for the death of the laſt King. This looked further than the firſt aſſent; for the ſubtill Vizier, who was faithfull to his true Lord, and knowing the rage of an vnguided multitude, aimed at a by-reuenge vpon others, whom hee hoped would be inuolued and accuſed of the Order: and the ſouldier ſoone raiſed and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded him. Daout fled; but now that the buſineſſe was on foot, if he were not found the Vizier himſelfe was in danger: but the poore man was taken and brought to the Diuan, and there being called to publique iuſtice, he muſt excuſe himſelfe vpon ſome greater perſon: wherein the Emperour and his mother ranne a new hazard, which was the ſecret end. Therefore both of them forſooke him and left him to the law; and without any triall he was brought before the ſouldiers, ſtripped, his turbant taken off, and on his knees readie to receiue the ſtroke of death: But ſuddenly the Ianizaries came to his reſcue, and carried him away to their chambers. The Spahies who began this action, tooke it in ill part, and followed with great outcries, That they would haue him die; the others demanded that he might be heard in publique Iuſtice. Thus thoſe two mutined Factions were readie to come to blowes. Daout Baſſa now in ſome hope of life, bribed the Ianizaries, and that day diſtributed fourty thouſand chequines of gold, & they promiſed to protect him. Who did not now thinke but he was taken away for ſafetie? But the Spahies followed their firſt reſolution, and to appeaſe the feare of that diſſenſion, it was agreed he ſhould die. They that meant to ſaue him, could not, but preſerued him for a greater example of iuſtice. They would not now let him loſe his head in the Court, for that death was too honourable for him that had murthered his Prince. Then the Ianizaries put him ſecretly into the ſame Coach wherein he had ſent Sultan Oſman to execution: twice in the way being drie with ſorrow, he dranke at the ſame fountaines where his late Maſter begged drinke, and ſo was conueyed into the ſame chamber where he had murthered him. The Executioners beginning to tie him, himſelfe ſhewed the verie corner where he had committed that foule fact, and deſired that there hee might (if poſſible) expiate it: and ſo he was at laſt miſerably ſtrangled. Thus he had his reward, and God was iuſt alſo euen for the wicked.

About the twentieth of Februarie, the peace (after many rubbes) betweene the grand Seigniour and the King of Poland, by the mediation of the Engliſh Embaſſadour (who was choſen by the Grand Seignior as Arbitrer of all differences) after many meetings with Diac Mahomet Baſſa Commiſſioner for the Treaty, was concluded; the Duke hauing firſt been forced to ſend this following Remonſtrance for his expedition, which much moued the Vizier, and quickened the concluſion.

The Duke of Sbarasky his Remonſtrance to the great Vizier.

Your Excellencie may be pleaſed to remember the happy and honourable Treaty made before Chotyn: In which a peace was concluded betweene the Ottoman Empire and the kingdome of Poland, ſigned by Commiſsioners on both parts: wherein (with reference to other antient Treaties) it was agreed, That a great Embaſſadour ſhould come to the Imperiall Port, as well to confirme and ſweare the Peace, as to ſet in order ſome other incident circumſtances, as then not fully taken into conſideration. Since which, the King and Republique of Poland hauing elected me for that imployment, his Maieſtie and my ſelfe haue receiued many Letters from Delauir, Daout, Huzein, and Muſtapha, Baſſa's, all great Viziers; not only promiſing a ſpeedy end & diſpatch of the concluſion of peace, which on both parts is ſo much deſired, but alſo the releaſe of our Captiues, and all other reſpects of loue and friendſhip, according to the antient honour of the Imperiall Port: deſiring me vpon that aſſurance to proceed with alacritie and expedition. And further, it hauing pleaſed his Maieſtie of great Britaine (a friend to both) to mediate in this pious office, by his Embaſſadour Reſident, and ſent to that end; who hath giuen me by his Letters great encouragement and hopes of a reall and true proceeding in this buſineſſe, agreeable to diuers promiſes made vnto him, which he accordingly hath enformed his owne Maſter; I was very glad of this honourable function, and hoped to haue found as ready performance as is by his Maieſtie and all the world expected.

To this end I am come to the Port, with full power and inſtructions from his Maieſtie and the Republique of Poland, to conclude and finiſh a full and perpetuall Peace, with all ſinceritie and heartineſſe, A neſſe, and in his Maieſties name to ſweare the ſame; offering to be friend to the friends, and enemie to the enemies of this Imperiall Port reciprocally, and to be readie to treat and accommodate all or any other circumſtances incident to a buſineſſe of ſo great conſequence.

Since my arriuall, notwithſtanding that I haue produced both the mentioned treaty at Chotyn and letters, how little I haue aduanced in the main affaires, and the doubtfull conſequences of a long protraction. I deſire you to conſider, hauing as yet proceeded no further in ſubſtance, than the deliuerie of my letters and Preſents; and to that end that there may neuer be imputed to the King and Republique of Poland any ſlackneſſe in preſent, or any breach in future, out of a ſincere and good deſire to eſtabliſh this treatie ſure and firme, and to open a cleere and true heart, I am enforced to make this true declaration: and deſire your Excellencie to weigh maturely the motiues following:

B I doe not repine at mine own ſtay at this Imperiall port, where I receiue all honour; I do not doubt of the ſincere and faithfull meaning of the Emperour to conclude the peace; but the deferring hereof may, againſt our wills, breed three inconueniences.

Firſt, your Excellencie doth know, that the Coſſackes are a people not eaſily to be reſtrained, if they be once at libertie, and that they liue vpon their armes. They haue readie eight hundred boats to make an inuaſion into the Blacke Sea. In the Winter they cannot moue; they attend onely the aduice of the concluſion of peace: therefore now is the ſeaſon to finiſh and publiſh it; for if by long delaies it ſhall be deferred vnto the Spring, and that iealouſie or their owne deſire ſet them free, your Excellencie doth know in wiſedome how difficult it is, to reduce into order a people of that condition, which for our parts we are now able and readie to preuent; the State hauing ordained to ſatisfie them, and to buy their boats vpon the firſt intimation of a concluſion.

C Secondly, it is the order of our nation euerie Spring to call a Parliament for the reglement of all publique affaires; of which aſſemblie I am a member: if I ſhall be ſtaied heere, and not able to render a reaſon thereof, it will breed great ſuſpition and diſturbance in the generall reſolution; you may conſider that in all parts, there are ſome vnaduiſed men, friends of ſedition and warre, and many that make aduantage of others troubles, who may doe ill offices, ſuch as the innocent may bee ſorrie for but cannot helpe.

Thirdly, the eyes af all Princes are ſet vpon the honour and faith kept on both parts, in this treaty, and accordingly will gouerne their owne occaſions.

D For theſe reaſons I doe in his Maieſties name deſire your excellencie to giue me a diſpatch, ſuch as may bring ioy and content to all, by auoiding the miſeries of warre; and in ſuch time, that the ſnows and diſcommodities of Winter ſhut me not vp; but that I may return as well to ſatisfie his maieſty and the Republique in our generall aſſembly, as to retaine thoſe, who may be cauſe of much trouble, without our conſents.

There is no difficultie that I vnderſtand; I am content to accept the antient end honourable treaties made with the famous Emperor Solyman and his ſucceſſours, and now laſtly at Chotyn: if there be any other difference, I haue power and am readie to accommodate it.

My deſire then onely is, That a preſent end and concluſiou be made of a peace, firme, and perpetuall: and that the Emperour will be pleaſed according to many promiſes, to deliuer and ſet free the captiues taken in the laſt warres; as I doe in his Maieſties name giue my word that all others taken E on our parts, ſhall haue libertie and paſport to returne. And if there haue been any difficultie made by occaſion of my preſſure for the reiection of Tomſha, and Cante-Emir-Emirze, I doe make this true proſtatetion, That as it is the requeſt of his Maieſty my king in friendſhip, ſo there is no other end nor cauſe of that deſire, but only to remoue all ccaſion of offence and breach with this Imperial Port, which thoſe ill neighbors are euer readie to miniſter: But if that be any great inconuenience to this Imperiall Port, I only then ſeeke, that better order may be taken with them for the future, that they may liue quietly with out offence of the publique peace.

I deſire your Excellencie to weigh and conſider theſe my reaſons ond proteſtations, which proceed onely from a good and ſincere heart, to promoue and maintaine an inuiolable and good friendſhip with this Imperiall Port. F

Within two daies after, the Duke of Sbaraskie tooke his leaue of the Emperour, to the great ioy of himſelfe and his traine, who thereby ſaw themſelues deliuered out of captiuitie. The three great and noble priſoners were ſet free, and did make a publique acknowledgement ſtirred vp the Spahies to demand iuſtice of him for the death of the laſt King. This looked further than the firſt aſſent; for the ſubtill Vizier, who was faithfull to his true Lord, and knowing the rage of an vnguided multitude, aimed at a by-reuenge vpon others, whom hee hoped would be inuolued and accuſed of the Order: and the ſouldier ſoone raiſed and mutined in the Seraglio, they demanded him. Daout fled; but now that the buſineſſe was on foot, if he were not found the Vizier himſelfe was in danger: but the poore man was taken and brought to the Diuan, and there being called to publique iuſtice, he muſt excuſe himſelfe vpon ſome greater perſon: wherein the Emperour and his mother ranne a new hazard, which was the ſecret end. Articles contracted betweene the Grand Seigniour and the King of Poland.

His Maieſtie of Poland hauing ſent into our happy Port his well deſeruing and famous great Embaſſadour the moſt illuſtrious Duke of Sbarasky, to offer vs ſincere peace, loyall friendſhip, and good correſpondence, and to ſeeke that the antient Peace and friendſhip ſhould be of vs anew confirmed, and the old Capitulations renewed, and that for the H time to come that there might be eſtabliſhed an eternall peace and friendſhip: His kingly inſtance hath beene moſt pleaſing to vs, and the peace and friendſhip of vs accepted: and we haue ordained, That all the antient treaties ſhall be renewed, and at the preſent haue giuen this our Capitulation with the following Articles.

I. FIrſt, That neuer vpon our part, nor of any of our Viziers, Beglerbeghs, Beghs, Cadees, Officers, nor Souldiors, any harme ſhall be done to the Prouinces, Cities, Caſtles, townes, villages, and other places pertaining to the King and State of Poland. And likewiſe vp- I on the part of his Maieſtie of Poland, that by his Princes, Miniſters, or Coſſacke, nor any other his ſubiects, there ſhall be no wrong done in any part of our empire, city, caſtle, towne, or village, but that both parties ſhall alwayes remaine friends to friends, and enemies to enemies.

II. And ſeeing that the Tartars of Dobrirza, Biaolograd, Keil, Ozu, and Siliſtra, and the people of Moldauia, do enter, inuade, and damnifie the State of Poland: We command, that for the time to come, our Beglerbeghs of Siliſtra, and all other Beglerbeghs of Bender, ſhall take care to keepe all thoſe paſſages and riuers, to the end that hereafter the ſaid Nations K ſhall haue no paſſage by thoſe wayes to damnifie the ſtate of Poland: and whenſoeuer it ſhall be knowne that the ſaid miniſters haue vſed negligence in keeping thoſe paſſages, according to the treatie with Sultan Solyman, of happy memorie, that ſuch miniſters be degraded and ſeuerely puniſhed.

III. The Vayuod of Moldauia likewiſe ſhall neuer grant any paſſage to the ſaid Nations: and whenſoeuer it ſhall be knowne that the ſaid Vayuod hath tranſgreſſed in this our will, hee ſhall be degraded and ſeuerely puniſhed.

IV. And whenſoeuer the ſaid Tartars and others, contrarie to this our will, ſhall make any L inuaſion or ſpoyle in the ſtate of Poland, all our miniſters and gouernors ſhall apprehend and ſeuerely puniſh them: and as it is ſet downe in the Agreements with Sultan Solyman, all the ſlaues and priſoners which ſhall by ſuch malefactors be brought into our dominions, ſhall be ſet at libertie, and their goods reſtored to them againe, and the malefactors puniſhed for hauing tranſgreſſed our Imperiall Capitulations.

V. And if any of our ſubiects ſhall buy any perſon or Poliſh goods, vniuſtly taken by ſuch malefactors, and it ſhall be made knowne vnto vs by the King of Poland; the buyers for hauing bought vnlawfull goods, their eſtate ſhall be confiſcate, and they themſelues ſeuerely M puniſhed.

VI. The Prince Chrim Tartar ſhall be obedient to vs, and all the Tartarian Nation vnder his command. Kalgha Sultan, and other Emirs and Princes of his bloud, from henceforth ſhall neuer enter into, nor inuade any part of the ſtate of Poland, nor euer do any damage, A mage, either by the way of Moldauia, the open field or deſart, nor ſhal euer enter into or inuade any part or iuriſdiction of the ſame. And at all times that his Maieſtie of Poland ſhall notice, That the ſaid Prince or others aboue mentioned haue broken this our will and capitulations, and entered and damnified his State; for their diſobedience, the ſaid Prince giue as well as the others, ſhall be by vs puniſhed and chaſtiſed; and we command that neuer any one, in any part of our Dominion, ſhall ſel either people or goods robbed from the State of Poland; and finding that there be any one that hath dared to buy men, or goods, robbed from them, ſuch ſhall be immediately puniſhed with confiſcation. And as before mentioned, the Beglerbeghs of Siliſtria, with all diligence ſhall keepe the ſtraights of Oſue and B neuer ſuffer the ſaid people to paſſe; and if it ſhall bee knowne they haue tranſgreſſed they ſhall be puniſhed with loſſe of their charge and office.

VII. And whenſoeuer the ſaid Prince Crim Tartar, or his Kalka, Emirze, or others ſhall by our order be called and commanded in their proper perſons, to goe to any part of the war in our ſeruice, if by chance they ſhould paſſe by the confines of Poland, as it is ſet downe in the capitulations of my father of happie memorie, They ſhall enter into any village, Borough, Caſtle, or Citie of Polonia, or doe any kinde of dammage to the people thereof; and finding that they haue giuen any moleſtation or hurt, they ſhall bee corrected, as is aforeſaid.

VIII. C And in conformitie of my fathers ſaid capitulation, euerie time that his Maieſtie of Poland ſhall inuite and call the ſaid Prince Crim Tartar in his occaſion of warre whiles hee giueth him his annuall ſtipend, the ſaid Prince with all his forces and armie, ſhall go, help, and aſſiſt his maieſtie in euery ſuch occaſion, and ſhew all friendſhip and ſinceritie: to which effect we haue giuen order, that our Imperiall letters be written to the ſaid Prince, in this particular, who ſhall obſerue all according to our will and pleaſure.

IX. And for the better eſtabliſhing of this our peace and amitie according to the antient capitulations and obſeruance, his maieſtie of Poland promiſeth to ſend his great Embaſſador to the ſaid Prince of Tartars; and (beginning from this preſent, the 24 of the D moneth of Iune) to pay yearely to the ſaid Prince his accuſtomed ſtipend in this forme following. Euerie yeare his maieſtie ſhall ſend the ſaid ſtipend into the Caſtle of Chotyn in Moldauia, and the Vayuod thereof ſhall certifie the ſaid Prince Crim, who ſhall preſently ſend his Embaſſadour to receiue the ſame, by the hands of the Vayuod. The which Prince ſhall alwaies obſerue this forme, and ſhall bee alwaies obedient to this our Imperiall Will.

X. And in caſe that his Maieſtie of Poland ſhould faile any yeare to ſend the ſaid ſtipend, the Prince Tartar ſhall not ſuddenly riſe with his armie and inuade Poland; but, according E to the agreements of Sultan Solyman, continuing ſtill in his obedience, he ſhall certifie vs, and we will procure and recouer his right.

XI. His Maieſtie of Poland doth promiſe that from henceforward, the Coſſackes ſhall not enter nor come into any part of our empire by the riuers of Oſue or any other, nor make any ſpoile therein: and if the ſaid Coſſackes doe enter into any part of our Dominions and doe any hurt, we certifying his Maieſtie by our Imperiall letters, hee promiſeth to correct them ſeuerely, and to put to death the malefactors for breaking the capitulations, and violating the peace and amitie.

XII. F And all our ſubiects which ſhall be made ſlaues, and impriſoned by the ſaid Coſſackes, ſhall be immediatly ſet at libertie; and the miniſters of his Maieſtie ſhall alwaies be diligent to puniſh the tranſgreſſours, and wholly reſtore thoſe perſons and goods, which they ſhall haue taken from our ſaid ſubiects, and that neuer any ſubiect of the King of Poland ſhall buy any ſtollen goods: and if any haue preſumed and bought, that he be ſeuerely puniſhed: and in generall all that which we haue promiſed concerning the Tartars and Moldauians, ſo his Maieſtie alſo doth promiſe to vs for the Coſſacks and other his ſubiects.

XIII. After the concluſion of this Peace, if vpon the confines or open fields, fiſhers or hunters on either part meeting together, ſhall happen to fall out or be at difference by their owne occaſion, it ſhall be no diſturbance to this our peace and amitie.

XIIII. Alwayes according to the antient agreements, the princes or Vayuods of Moldauia ſhall ſhew to his Maieſtie of Poland all due reuerence and reſpect, good amitie and neighbourhood: and ſeeing that the ſaid Vayuods haue euer been as it were inſtruments of preſeruation, or of the breach of the Peace; therefore we command, that for the time to come, neither the ſaid Vayuods, nor other of our Beglerbeghs or miniſters, ſhall build in thoſe Confines any new Caſtle, Fort, or bridge; and that in thoſe Caſtles or Forts of thoſe frontiers which are alreadie built, there ſhall neuer any other garriſons be kept but Moldauians: and according to the antient Capitulations, the Tartars ſhall not inhabit, dwell, or till within thoſe confines, of both nations.

XV. And to the end this peace and amitie may be alwayes kept betweene vs, we ſweare by the name of God, and aſſure by this our Imperiall Article, that all the Embaſſadours, great or inferiour, which ſhall be ſent from vs to his Maieſtie, or thoſe great or leſſe which ſhall bee ſent from his Maieſtie to vs, ſhall alwaies be ſafe and ſecure, as well in their comming, as their returne; and that there ſhall neuer be need of any other paſport, but that they ſhall be of vs by all wayes honored and well receiued.

XVI. Concerning merchants, paſſengers, and other Polacke negotiators, they ſhall alwayes come ſafely and ſecurely by ſea and land, into all the parts of our Empire; and for cuſtomes, tolles, and other duties of their merchandiſe, and in caſe of debt, credit, ſuretiſhip, and ſuch other like accidents concerning the courſe of Juſtice and Law, we command that it ſhall be alwayes obſerued according to the agreements with our father, of happy memorie, Sultan Achmat. Which Articles we at this preſent accept and confirme, ratifie, and command that they be of all our ſubiects for euer punctually obeyed and obſerued.

XVII. Furthermore we promiſe, and in the name of God ſweare, to obſerue and maintaine for euer all thoſe couenants and Articles agreed vpon and written in our Capitulations, by our great grandfather, grandfather, and father, and neuer to diſanull any of them.

XVIII. And whereas to ſhew greater deſire of ſinceritie concerning this Peace, his Maieſtie of Poland hath ſought of vs by his ſaid great Embaſſadour, that the ſubiects of Poland may ſafely and ſecurely come by the riuer of Turla with diuers merchandiſe, and ſell, buy, and traffique in Ackirman, which traffique being vſed will be of great benefit to both Eſtates; We ordaine and command from henceforward, that the ſaid Nation may come and negotiate ſafely and ſecurely in the ſaid Ackirman. And to the end that this buſineſſe be eſtabliſhed and concluded in a good manner, we will giue order to our Embaſſadour, whom we intend to ſend ſhortly to his Maieſtie for the ratification thereof.

XIX. Which preſent Articles, Capitulations, Peace, Amitie, League, and Correſpondence, by the grace of God we promiſe vndoubtedly to maintaine ſo long as we liue in this world: and do hereby conclude betweene vs and our poſteritie, and the Kings and State of Polonia, an euerlaſting Peace; Sealing it and confirming it with theſe words, Friends to Friends, and Enemies to Enemies.

Notwithſtanding all this, after the Duke was departed one dayes journy, where he ſtayed

A to receiue the treatie ſigned,they altered ſome of the articles to their own aduantage,without his knowledge. Which when he heard,he complained anew by his letters to the Port of the abuſe offered vnto him,and made haſte rather to eſcape than returne. But the Coſſackes at the ſame time being ſtirring about the Blacke ſea, the Vizier and State (hauing nothing more in care than to ſhut vp that backe port, whereby they ſuffered much loſſe and diſhonour, and could not reuenge it vpon a fugitiue people; which diuided their nauall armie,being forced to ſend a portion of gallies to defend the trade,the beſt part of reliefe of the citie of Conſtantinople comming from thoſe coaſts) reſolued to giue content to the Poles,and to aſſure the Peace; that they might with more ſecuritie attend their affaires in Aſia and Hungarie; which action was fauoured vehemently by the preſent Vizier. To which end, he ſent anſwer into B Poland,with promiſes of faith,and reparation for the iniuries committed by the Tartars; laying the fault of miſwriting the treatie vpon the Chancellour, which though they amended not,yet they did explain and interpret: and for better eſtabliſhment and ſecuritie on their behalfes of the peace,they reſolued to depoſe Iehan-Begh Prince of Tartaria,and ſent Mechmet Gheray his couſin german and firſt of the bloud,late priſoner in the Rhodes,to take poſſeſſion of his dominion; who vndertooke to quiet and reſtraine that people: which he cauſed to be ſignified to Poland,that the King might ſee,theſe alterations were onely for the full ſecurity of the peace on their ſide,that the Pole might take the like courſe with the Coſſackes,who were not as yet reclaimed.

Some of the capitulations of peace altered by the Turks.

The ſouldiers continued ſtill in their height of furie and madneſſe, and thoſe that were to C goe vpon the gallies for the defence of the blacke ſea, and other deſignes, being ready to depart, robbed, ſlew, brake houſes in the face of the Magiſtrate in the open day: What was it not lawfull for them to doe, that had ſlaine their King,and made and deſtroied the great Miniſters at their will and pleaſure,as their Stewards and ſeruants: and God did ſo blinde them, that they ſhould not ſee, that they digged vp their owne roots, and were made by God the blind inſtruments of their owne ruine. The mint alſo was remoued into the Seraglio, where was brought forth all the ſaddles,bridles,ſtirrops, that had any gold or ſiluer vpon them, with all old plate,to make money to patch vp a quiet, and to ſatisfie and content the ſouldiers,and all little enough for the preſent, to ſaue the citie from a totall ſacke.

The Embaſſadours of the Prince of Tranſyluania, hauing changed their ſtile of excuſing a D firme peace with the Emperour by the change of the Vizier,and finding the opportunitie of a friend now in place to aid their Prince,they negotiated new matter,aſſuring the Port, that by the troubles of Germanie, a faire occaſion was giuen to recouer Hungarie, and to ſet the Crowne vpon their Maſters head; and that therefore if the Grand Seignior would be pleaſed to grant vnto their Prince the aid of the Græcian armie,that he would make another attempt to weaken the greateſt enemie of that Empire; which they eaſily obtaining (the ignorance and auarice of the Turke opening a way to credulitie which was the conſtant aduantage of Gabor, who could concord both their vnderſtandings and forces to his own ends) being in al fully ſatisfyed, they departed the twentieth of Aprill. Which reſolution of the Port was much wondred at by all wiſe men, who knew how vnfit the Turke was at that preſent for E a warre. The Prince was then at Caſſouia, expecting the iſſue of his Embaſſage,and in hope of Turkiſh aid; which being granted and gathered vpon his frontier, and ioyned at laſt with his owne forces, his whole armie was not very great, nor had he any cannon to march withall to beſiege any place: his chiefeſt truſt conſiſting in his intelligence in Hungarie,where hee expected a generall reuolt, and that all the garriſons would open to him,or at leaſt ſome diuerſitie in Sileſia(which he was promiſed) facilitate his wars; and he was not in deſpaire,that vpon the firſt appearance of an armie, Morauia, by the fauour of the Countie of Tourne and his friends,would follow the ſame example; and this was the deſigne which his Embaſſadors had ſo long ſolicited at the Port, and diſſembled at their firſt comming. Now there was nothing expected but a warre: but not long after, there arriued a new Embaſſadour from the F Prince, without any mention of the affaires of thoſe parts; which made all men inquiſitiue, thinking hee was either come to haſten the ſuccours, or to change ſomething in the manner and other circumſtances depending thereon: but it was found that the States of Tranſyluania had aſſembled at Alba-Iulia, and were verie loath to entertaine a warre, or to breake with the Emperour; and therefore diſpeeded two Commiſſioners towards him, who were well receiued and treated at Vienna: and from the Emperour was ſent to Tranſyluania the Biſhop G of Nitria. Whereupon a new peace was treated, and this Embaſſadour ſent to procure the recall of the former commands, giuen to the Baſſaes to moue with their armies. Whereby it was ſuſpected he neuer had any purpoſe to make a warre, but onely to ballance by the continuance thereof his feares and laſt agreements with the Emperour.

The Baſſa of Arzirum in rebellion.

All men prophecied (by reaſon of daily diſorders) the fall of the Ottoman Empire. But now the Baſſa of Arzirum who was ioyned with diuers others, and had made a great armie, was in his march towards Angria, the direct way to Conſtantinople (Babylon yet reſting in rebellion) with a pretence of reformation; who tooke nothing by force, but the treaſure of the Empire. He held a generall Counſell in his campe, and ſent to the Port to require the preſence of the Mufti, Cadees, Baſſaes, and antient Beghs, to take knowledge and to puniſh the traitors H that murthered the late King, and to ſettle a new one lawfully, that ſhould be able to gouerne; to reduce the mutined citie-ſouldier to obedience and diſcipline, and to place about the Emperour ſome great Vizier, choſen by the State, able to direct and apply remedies to the diſeaſes then growne to a Chryſis: complaining, that euery three or foure moneths, by the change of the Vizier, the prouinces were deſtroyed (for they placed and diſplaced the gouernors according to their own factions) and ſo contrarie orders were ſent abroad dayly, inſomuch as no man knew who was King or Vizier, nor whom they ſhould obey. Theſe were his pretences, and if the preſent State would not conſent to this aſſembly, he then reſolued to come to the Port, and ſettle all things at his pleaſure by the ſword. The great Officers in poſſeſſion of the Emperor and gouernment, loath to be called to an account by the ſouldier, tooke a worſe I reſolution, To make a war; and made choice of Cigala Baſſa for General: which he refuſed vpon the ſame pretence, that in his abſence alterations would be ſo frequent; and that he ſhould not pleaſe, or at leaſt vncertainly, and according to interpretation. Therefore he would haue an abſolute Dictatorſhip for the time, equall to that of a great Vizier, or elſe he would not ſtir. This was granted him, and mony giuen out, and order to paſſe the water ſpeedily; enrolling for his armie fifteene thouſand Ianizaries and thirty thouſand Spahies. But thoſe did demur, and alledged it was a war againſt their owne brethren, and ſought any excuſes rather than to come to blowes. But the ſecret was, it was then Ramazan, or their holy Lent, at the end of which they were to receiue their pay; and therefore they would not moue, but pretended religion. Next day after their feaſt, when they ſhould march, they ſhewed themſelues careleſſe K (hauing firſt held many conſultations) and would not march at all, vnleſſe the Emperour or great Vizier would go in perſon. So euery day brought forth new ſubiect of trouble, and the Empire to a great deale of hazard and danger.

MORAT, AVT AMVRATHES IV. ACHMETI FILIVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR VNDECIMVS. Anno Domini, 1623.
Ætatis ſuæ xv.
Sculp.

Morat in tender age the Throne aſcends,
for wanton luſt more apt, than princely ends:
Sporting he lies in a luxurious bed,
whileſt Bagdat is by Perſia conquered;
A greater loſſe than this, who can deuine
vnleſſe to loſe the ſeat of Conſtantine.
His other Acts, and how he ſtill proceeds ſhall here enſue in ſtorie of his deeds.

THE RAIGNE OF MORAT, OR AMVRATH, THE FOVRTH OF THAT NAME, ELEVENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES; HE THAT NOW SVAYETH THAT MIGHTIE MONARCHIE.

Sultan Muſtapha depoſed, & Sultan Morat placed in his Throne.

VPon the laſt day of Auguſt, Sultan Muſtapha, brother of Achmat, C who had beene twice Emperour, was depoſed; and Sultan Morat, ſonne to Achmat, and brother to Oſman murthered, the yere before placed in the Throne. But it will not be vntimely nor vnprofitable, to diſcourſe of the cauſes and reaſons of thoſe great mutations, which are the intrinſique part and ſoule of Action.

That State for fifteene moneths after the death of Oſman, was a ſtage of varietie, the Souldierie vſurping all gouernment, placing and diſplacing as the winde of fauour or diſfauour moued them. In that time there were three Emperours, ſeuen great Viziers, two Captaine Baſſa's, fiue Aga's of the Ianizaries, three Treaſurers, ſix Baſſa's of Cairo, and in proportion as many changes of Gouernors in all the Prouinces; D euery new Vizier making vſe of his time, diſplacing thoſe in poſſeſſion, and ſelling their fauour to others: ſo as the whole empire was in a manner fined foure or fiue times; ſuch was the eating for a welcome of euery Baſſa to their gouernment. Huzein Baſſa the laſt Vizier of them (a tyrant hated of all men) conſumed the publique treaſure ſo faſt, and exacted money from priuat men ſo violently, to maintaine his faction with the Ianizaries, that euen the Receiuers were affraid, and weary, and the wiſeſt of them foreſaw their owne ruine in the generall conſumption: when there was any murmure againſt him, he preſently ſilenced it either by gifts or bloud. As ſoone as hee had diſpatched away the Generall Cigala Baſſa with the armie for the ſuppreſſion of the great rebellion in Aſia (which vpon the depoſition of Georgi, and the making of him Vizier, was E content to march: which he did rather to diſburthen himſelfe of feares, by ſending out of the way the Spahies, who were his oppoſites, than for any loue to the State: which Armie, what inſolencies they committed for thirtie dayes before their paſſing the water, euen in the face of Iuſtice, was as incredible as impoſſible to relate) he ſent priuatly to ſtrangle Halil Baſſa, Georgi, and Muſtapha, late Viziers; hoping thereby he had remoued all concurrents. Whether this gaue the occaſion, or that his ſinne was ripe for reuenge, the Spahies ſuddenly gathered head, and the old Wolfe fled to his truſtie gard the Ianizaries. The citie was almoſt diuided; but the Spahies ſent their reſolution plainly, being the weaker in number, That they deſired not to come to blowes with their Brethren; but if the Ianizaries would protect him, that they ſhould keep him, Conſtantinople, & Greece: but they themſelues would depart and F diſpoſe of Aſia. Which was a bold profeſſion, but eaſie, the forces of the Rebels being of their ſocietie. The wiſeſt foreſaw the perill, and they all agreed to change him; and ſo the Seale was giuen to Aly Baſſa, a man reputed honeſt, but melancholie and vntried for ſo great a charge. Euery one ſaw thoſe outward wheeles of motion, but the ſpring within that moued them was not ſo ſoon diſcouered: The armie mentioned for Aſia, arriuing at Nicomedia, fiue dayes iourney from Conſtantinople, ſhewed little obedience; many diſbanded, and the reſt G hauing no deſire to fight with thoſe of the ſame profeſſion both in Religion and in humour.

The newes came dayly to the Port, of the taking of Forts by Abaſſa Baſſa the head of the rebels, & of other defections and combuſtions in thoſe parts; and that that quarrel was taken vp againſt the Ianizaries and the preſent gouernment, of whom he ſlew all that fell in his power, as guiltie of the bloud of Oſman. This ſuddenly wakened and ripened the proiect of thoſe who had plotted ſecretly this alteration. Hereupon the new Vizier Aly, with the counſell of the Mufti and ſome Captaines of the ſouldiers of both Orders, layed their foundation:
They ſhewed the imminent perill and difficultie to reſiſt or preuent it by armes: the Ianizaries ſaw that they alone muſt (as the marke of enuy) beare the whole burthen; and therefore all reſolued, that the eaſieſt and ſafeſt way to appeaſe their troubles, was to reſtore the H true heire, the preſent Emperour; hoping that thoſe who pretended their riſing for the loue of his brother, and in reuenge of his cauſe, would obey that Prince and quiet themſelues. Vpon this reſolution they aſſembled at the Seraglio without any tumult, and deſired to haue Sultan Muſtapha come forth and ſpeake to the ſouldiers, and to anſwer to ſome queſtions: which he refuſing (as truly vnable) they tooke out Sultan Morat and declared him King, with vniuerſall ioy and acclamation: inſomuch as the Ianizaries (but the day before his oppoſites) being ſhewed the want of treaſure and the neceſſitie of the State, were content to remit their donatiue and encreaſe of pay, vſuall at euery change: a wonder that was not like to laſt long, for many of them did afterwards repent, and demanded it freſhly.

The new Emperour the next day made his ſolemne entry into the city, a youth of fourteene I yeares of age, fat, and of a liuely countenance, and good ſtature, a Prince of too faire hopes for ſuch a people; whoſe actions afterward (though vnder gouernment) ſhewed that he would ſoone know himſelfe, and proue of a ſtirring nature. At the returne of the gallies from the Blacke ſea, who brought ſome Coſſackes priſoners aliue, and ſome heads of the dead, he would ſee them all brought before him, a cuſtome vnuſual. This deſire, and ſome anſwers he gaue, made all men iudge he would be actiue. All ſeemed then ſerene and quiet, and neuer appeared ſo great a change, euen in affections. The moſt diſordered did then aſſume a face of obedience (which was once thought to be baniſhed that citie) and choſe rather ſubmiſſion to Lawes, than threatened deſtruction. The calme was as violent as the ſtorme: The firſt actions ſhewed peace, but ſo, as to prepare for neceſſitie of war. They ſought out, and K dayly found the treaſure, plate, and iewels giuen and conueyed away by Huzcin Baſſa, which returned apace, and many voluntarily rendred them. The laſt Aga of the Ianizaries, who was but three moneths before Caia or Lieutenant (afterward Baſſa of Cairo) did for his part receiue, and reſtore, eight hundred thouſand dollars, to buy his place and peace: ſo that euery day made new diſcoueries; onely he that had been the authour of all this was fled away, and could then by no means be found: whoſe apprehenſion would haue aſſured many, and haue brought backe a great treaſure.

Aſia in that ſearch for money, and new ſettlement of affaires, was almoſt quite forgotten;
ſo that the armie was ſtayed from proceeding; for it was beleeued, Abaſſa Baſſa depended L vpon the new Emperour for his ſubmiſſion. But they had aduanced too far to truſt to any ſafe retreat, euen although they were the indirect occaſion of the raiſing of the new Emperor. Yet the way was not warrantable in the rule of Monarchie, nor perhaps ſincere in the intent; for kings ſeldom pardon thoſe that are able to be traitors, & haue ſhewed but a wil to reuolt; and that power is neuer ſecure which is too much. Sometimes they make vſe of traitors as a ſafegard for the preſent, and for the future a ſubiect of their reuenge. And this Maxime Haly Baſſa in the former great Aſian defection approued with the price of his life, being taken into the fauour of Sultan Achmat in all priuacie, made Baſſa of Buda, and within foure moneths ſtrangled, vnder colour of putting on a Veſt of honour. Therefore it was doubted, that they who had diſcouered ſo high thoughts, and exaſperated the Ianizaries, would not ſo eaſily M depoſe armes, by which onely they might be ſafe; and it was then feared they had intelligence with Perſia. There reſted one great difficultie, to introduce that awe of maieſty which had been trampled vnder foot; and it was a great one, when a people, like the ſea, had made a breach into ancient reuerence, and proſpered; the taſte of wickedneſſe was not ſo eaſily loſt.
It was imagined that theſe changes would worke great effects vpon the bordering parts of Chriſten-

A Chriſtendome intereſſed,for they intended peace vniuerſally,to recouer mony and a habit of obedience,and ciuil gouernment. To which purpoſe a letter was written to the Baſſa of Buda, to leaue it to his diſcretion in the mouing of armes againſt the Emperor(being lately excited thereto by the prince of Tranſyluania)as a man experienced on the Border to do what ſhould moſt conduce to the ſafetie and profit of the State : for|as they durſt not abſolutely prohibit them,& recal the former licence,fot feare of diſpleaſing Gabor & the Baſſa,who were vnited; ſo they would inſinuate their deſires & fears,by way of counſell,now only tending to peace.

In the midſt of this appearing calme,the Ianizaries,ſome repenting (as was ſaid before)and ſome denying their conſent to remit their donatiue and increaſe of pay, did anew ſharpely demand it,with threats of innouation: ſo as they were forced to content them;& euery order of B men and officers,that were not of the ſword,were compelled to contribute to it. The Vizier ſent ſolemnly to the 4 reſident Embaſſadors,to borrow 30000 checquines,as the friends and allies of the Port,to whom in confidence they durſt open their ſecrets. Many old officers,experienced,miſliked this betraying their own wants,as diſhonorable, and vnlike to take effect: which indeed it did not;for mony was ſo abaſed,& trades ſo poore,as the ſtranger had no full purſe. The new emperor to ſerue this turn,gaue out 400000 drams of gold,being his beſt veſſell,to make coine,which was ſtamped baſe, to meet with the inſolencie of the ſoldier, who would take no ſiluer as falſe mony,except in this ſearch the State and citie appeared to be at ſome quietneſſe;only the Baſſa of Cairo(Buſtangi Baſſa to Oſman, newly made Baſſa of Buda) ambitiouſly ſeeking the dignitie of grand Vizier by the gift of 100000 checquines,his offer C was ſeemingly accepted,part of the mony paid,& he ſent for priuatly into the Seraglio,as to receiue the ſeale. But the Emperors beſt Counſel within, ſaw how dangerous it was to giue way to ſuch innouations(beſides a priuat grudge,this man being the inſtrument to ſtrangle the queen-mothers eldeſt ſon,when Sultan Oſman went to the Poliſh war) where in ſtead of aduancement a hangman took off his head,& his houſe & goods(being very rich)ſeiſed vpon.

The vizier ſent to the foure Chriſtian Embaſſadours reſident at the Port,to borrow 30000 Checquines.

Cantemir-Mirze Baſſa of Siliſtria,was all this time in diſobedience;whom the late Vizier attempted to diſplace,& gaue order to the Chrim Tartar to remoue him by force : But it was thought fit,not to thruſt him further out,& to make him a dangerous enemy: wherfore a confirmation of his gouernment was ſent him,a ſword & a Veſt in all honor ; the Poles diſliking therof,he being their mortal enemy,& remoued at their inſtance in their late treatie of peace.

D At the change of the Emperor, all men hoped for peace with Abaſſa Baſſa, the great rebel of Aſia: but he ſhewed he had further intents than to ſet vp the brethren of Oſman;when pretending obedience,he ſuddenly aſſaulted,& took the caſtle of Tocat,which is in the Mint of Aſia,7 Beglerbegs and 16 Sanzacks being ioined with him : all that part of Aſia obeyed him ; for he oppreſſed none,only executing his wrath on the Ianizaries. This aduice being brought by a captain of that Order,made much rumor at the Port ; the ſouldiers raiſing a tumult in the ſeraglio,demanded to be led out to the fight,& to haue thoſe of Aſia declared rebels: a councel to this end was held, where they receiued ſo cold an anſwer, that they grew into ſome rage;accuſing two Baſſa's by name,Halil & Georgi,to haue correſpondence with them;& ſeeming to doubt that the whole ſtate did conniue with this action,to proſecute the firſt deſigne E of Oſman, To root out that corrupted Order which did diſorder all gouernment : inſomuch as they openly profeſſed,If we be true Muſſulmen & the Emperors ſlaues,let vs go out & fight with his enemies & ours;if not,and that you maintain them againſt vs,we are reſolued to die together,and not to be waſted by peeces. There was much likelyhood of this,but that Abaſſa Baſſa had proceeded too far: therfore to ſatisfie the ſoldier,the Banner was ſet out at the gate of the court,and that of the Aga of the Ianizaries at their gate,& war proclaimed, That all the force of the Empire ſhould be ready to march within foure days. When they ſaw this reſolution in the great ones(whether diſſembled,or in good earneſt)that day,being the 18 of October,1623,the Ianizaries and Spahies held a counſel, and changed their mindes ; alleadging,that winter approF ching,and no prouiſion made, that they would not moue. The Viziers were glad,reſpecting their own eaſe;and ſo all Aſia was left to the courteſie of the Rebel and Winter,to giue other friends leiſure to declare;of which the Perſian was moſt doubted. In the meane time Abaſſa Baſſa aduanced and tooke the citie of Angria,which was ſurrendered vnto him as ſoone as he came before it,but the caſtle held againſt him;and it was reported,he wept at the gates therof, publiſhing the cauſe of his taking vp arms,which he ſaid was only in reuenge of the bloud of Abaſſa Baſſa aſſaulted and tooke the caſtle of Tocat.

Oſman; deſiring ſuch as fauoured him, to come on his ſide (diuiding the people) the reſt to depart in peace, euerie man to his own houſe. He did no harm, nor took the value of a pennie: his army was very great, and euery Ianizarie that he could catch, he ſacrificed to the ghoſt of the dead Emperor. Men report, he was firſt aduertiſed by a dream to reuenge: after that, that Oſman appeared vnto him, and laſtly Mahomet. He called himſelfe the poore Mechmet deputed to reform the world, from the great God. The Aſtrologers publikely augured his proſperity; and euery mans diſcourſe was ful of fabulous feares & propheſies. It was ſaid he would come to the Port, and demand audience by Iuſtice, and haue the cauſe betwixt him and the murtherers of their Prince tried by law; and that if he were condemned as a Rebel, he would lay down his head; if they, he would execute the reuenge. And it was generally thought out of the coldnes both of the Emperor & all the Viziers, that he was ſecretly maintained by them, and came to fulfill the deſigne of Oſman, to wreſt the gouernment from the mutined ſouldier, and to root out their Order. For al the Lawyers and churchmen ſmiled, and rather reioyced than feared. The Ianizaries openly murmured that they were betraied, and accuſed many, yet they eſcaped, and now few ſpoke againſt him as againſt a Rebel. Yet the firſt of Nouember, whether for colour or earneſt, the great Viziers tents were paſſed ouer the water in haſt, with thoſe of the Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the force which could be then made at the Port, to winter on the other ſide in Bruſcia, to amuſe the rebels & ſtay them til the ſpring: perhaps being willing the blow ſhould be taken on the other ſide, to ſaue the citie from a generall ſacke.

Nouemb. 15. The grand ſeignior ſendeth Abaſſa Baſſa a veſt, a ſword, and a letter.

It was afterwards conſidered, that to preuaile againſt Abaſſa Baſſa with armes, was a doubtfull matter, and therefore the Sultan ſent vnto him a Capigi Baſſa, with a Veſt, Sword, and a Letter; giuing him thankes for the loue ſhewed to his brother, and his bloud; but that now the reuenge belonged to himſelfe, of which he would take care; and therefore deſired him, if he were a true ſubiect, to returne to his gouernment of Arzirum, and to diſſolue his armie, and there to reſt vntil further occaſion of ſeruice. Vpon this order from the Emperor, he excuſed himſelfe, That the incommoditie of Winter would not ſuffer him to retire, but promiſed to liue in peace vntill the Spring, and then he would returne in obedience to his gouernment.

The Emir of Sidon takes the citie and caſtle of Damaſcus.

In the interim, the Emir of Sidon poſſeſſed himſelfe of the citie and caſtle of Damaſcus, with ſome other places and forts, as it were in an inſtant, threatening Hieruſalem; hauing demanded ſupplies, or at leaſt neutralitie from the Baſſa of Aleppo. This defection was of greateſt conſequence; becauſe he was a Prince of deſcent, and a pretender in right to thoſe countries; who had foure or fiue good ports to let in Chriſtian ſuccours, with whom it was thought he had intelligence, hauing in the time of Achmat retyred to Florence and Rome; and that he was in ſome meaſure able to ſubſiſt of himſelfe, hauing thirtie thouſand ſouldiers in his armie, and a good foundation and eſtate of his owne to maintaine them: And yet his actions were onely lamented at the Port, and no order taken to ſtop or reduce him, excepting ſome letters and promiſes, the ordinarie remedie that was then applied to thoſe manifold troubles. For that State was now in a kind of Lethurgie, hauing no ſence nor wil to make ſhew to feele the inward diſeaſes conſuming it; either becauſe they were vnable for want of money (the treaſure being much exhauſted) or that they were in miſtruſt of their owne ſoldiers, euery day apter to mutine than to fight; or that the neighbourhood of Abaſſa Baſſa did amuſe and confound them: and ſo, many circumſtances croſſed one another as the ſymptomes of confuſion, all things being equally feared, and nothing thorowly vndertaken: yet a little more ſenſible they were of Abaſſa, the enemie that was neereſt, whoſe followers tooke a paſſage and bridge about foure dayes iourney from Conſtantinople, as if he meant either to poſſeſſe himſelfe thereof for his owne meanes to aduance with his armie; or to keepe it that none ſuddenly from the other ſide might aſſaile him: but howſoeuer, it manifeſted that he was not yet quiet, nor reſolued to obey as he had promiſed. This new attempt of his was very hotly taken at the Port, and many Counſels held: but (as all things do there) the furie once paſt, the warmth cooled by degrees in 3 or 4 days; ſo that only a few more Ianizaries were ſent away to make garriſon, & to defend the paſſages; with whom were employed the Falſe French Regiment * and their Colonell, all the force they could then well ſpare. No Spahies entred into that quarrell, as if theſe were purpoſely expoſed to be cut in pieces; which many beleeued, by the faintnes and diſunited manner of their proceedings; or elſe that they went out of themſelues, knowing the danger to be moſt imminent vpon them, and that the Emperour and his

Bechir-Subbaſſi ſends his ſon to Sha-Abbas the King of Perſia for ſuccours.

Bechir-Subbaſſi, who had reuolted in Babylon, and held that caſtle againſt the Emperour all the laſt Summer, hauing beene ſtreightly beſieged by Haſis Achmat Baſſa, and in danger to be forced, ſent his ſonne to Sha-Abas the King of Perſia, for ſuccours: whereupon hee obtained ſome Perſian horſe; vpon the diſcouerie of which, the Baſſa, fearing he ſhould be compelled to raiſe his ſiege, betooke himſelfe to diſſimulation, as if he had ſuch authoritie from the Grand Seigniour; he made a compoſition, and not onely pardoned Bechir, and all offences paſt, but conferred the gouernment of that citie and prouince vpon him as Baſſa, and ſo retyred his Armie. Yet although Bechir-Subbaſſi was content to free himſelfe from the preſent neceſſity by treaty, yet really he held the place of the Perſian, and to his vſe; whoſe Agent at B the Port demanded both that and Ahiska, as the antient patrimonie of his Anceſtors.

The Prince of Tranſyluania ſummoneth the towne of Tyrnauia.

Bethlem Gabor hauing with great expedition marched ouer Hungarie, and reduced moſt part thereof to his obedience, except the townes of Presburgh, Rab, Romaſa, and ſome few other forts, his armie conſiſting of thirty three thouſand Tranſyluanians and Hungarians, and almoſt as many Turks and Tartars voluntarily following for bootie; met with no ſhew of reſiſtance vntill he approched Tyrnauia, within foure dayes march of the borders of Auſtria: whither ſending before ſome regiments of his horſe, to the number of foure thouſand, to ſummon the towne, they diſcouered ſome Imperiall troupes ſent to make garriſon therein, being two thouſand three hundred foot, and two hundred horſe, and arriued within halfe an Engliſh mile; betweene whom and the citie they thruſt themſelues. Theſe troupes perceiuing they C were ſuddenly preuented, and not knowing how farre the Princes whole armie was behinde, tooke downe a ſmall brooke to a village, and fortified themſelues in a Church and Church-yard walled. The Commander of the Hungars diſpatched away a Currier to Bethlem Gabor, with aduiſe that he ſhould ſend him ſome foot with expedition, relating the manner how hee had encloſed this garriſon. In the meane time he ſummoned the Imperialiſts, and told them that he had taken poſſeſſion of Tyrnauia for his Maſter; and at the ſame time ſummoned the towne, and told them, That their ſuccors ſent had yeelded vnto him, keeping all intelligence from one another, and both from attempting any thing. The next day, the Prince with his Vantguard arriued in ſight, and then this Collonell ſent ſome troupes to make guard before one of the Ports very neere the wall. Thoſe Germanes ſhut vp in the Church-yard, ſeeing D the enemies horſe vnder the command of the towne, and no ſhot made at them, beleeued that it was true that the place was rendered: ſo before the foot came vp to force them, they yeelded themſelues, and tooke pay of the Prince, all except ſix and thirty of the principall that had licence to depart. Thoſe being then woon, the citiſens the next day opened their gates, and receiued Bethlem Gabor for their Lord, and thus theſe were gained without any ſtroke. From thence he marched directly towards Morauia, and ſent before him a daies iourney eight thouſand horſe to diſcouer and ſpoile. The Emperour finding theſe beginnings vrgent, ordered the brother of the Prince of Licheſtein to draw downe his garriſons from Bohemia and Morauia to the frontire, and ſent the Marqueſſe of Montenegro, with Colalto, Don Balthesar de Marades, the Count Sticke-Walſtein, Tiffenbacke, Count Torquato kinſman to the Pope, Sampach, E and all his principall Captaines to meet them, and to forme an armie for defence. There was gathered together fifteene thouſand beſides the baggage; who being lodged at the foot of an hill in the borders of Morauia, and many of their ſouldiers ſtragling to gather grapes, were by the auantcurriers of Bethlem Gabor diſcouered, and preſently beſet, who tooke and ſlew ſeuen hundred. Some eſcaped and gaue the alarme, or elſe the whole Imperiall campe had beene ſurpriſed without ſentinell or guard, they hauing proued as ſeruiceable as the geeſe in the Capitoll. The Hungars hauing gotten the top of the hill, and ſeeing the Bohemian and German armie ſo neere in the bottome, and in ſome confuſion, reſolued to make triall how they were prouided, and made ſhew of a charge; but finding them in better order to receiue them, they retired; one captaine onely aduenturing too neere, was taken priſoner and carried to the F Imperiall quarter; who being examined, told them, That the Prince with a mightie army, would the next night be in ſight, and therefore he aduiſed them to prepare for their ſafetie; for that he came with reſolution to fight, and ouermatching them with number, there was no poſſibilitie of other than death or captiuitie. The Imperials rather ſcorned, than beleeued theſe threatnings: but the captaine aſſuring them it was no time to ieſt with his own life and theirs, they remoued the next morning,and marched towards a towne called Ghoding vpon the riuer of G Moran that diuides Hungarie from Morania, about which was a ſmall trench,and within it a caſtle of ſome defence. The horſe of Bethlem Gabor ſeeing them mooue towards that place, preſſed in a gallop before them,and ſet all the houſes on fire, which burned a day and a night, vntill the whole was conſumed. In the mean time Bethlem Gabor arriued with his armie; and the Imperialiſts ſtood in battalion to expect their fortune: but the fire being ended,gaue them leaue to enter among the ruines and aſhes, and to make the beſt of neceſſitie, where they fortified themſelues,hauing no ſtore of prouiſion. In this eſtate being cloſed about thirteen daies, it was diſcouered by a priſoner, that they were in great want,and that the ſouldiers began to mutine; demanding of their captaines either to lead them out to fight,and die like men, or to make ſuch a partie for them,as their preſent condition would admit. Don Balthaſar Generall H of the horſe, in the name of all the Commanders, gathered the armie together, and acknowledging to them, firſt the great vertue they had ſhewed to abide at once the aſſaults of perill and famine,for their honour; and proteſting that their caſe and their Generals,was all one for matter of allowance, intreated them to ſtrengthen themſelues with hope and conſtancie, and required of them an vniuerſall promiſe, that they would abide with patience,vntill the end of October then at hand: if in that time, neither God nor the Emperour ſent them ſuccours, he would make ſome compoſition for them; not doubting to finde Bethlem Gabor a Chriſtian and a ſouldier, though an enemie; and to this propoſition they all gaue their words and faith.

The reaſon of this ſhort obtained time, proceeded not from any thought of ſupplie from the Emperour, but from an opinion and cuſtome,that the Turkes would breake vp their campe I vpon Saint Demetrius day the ſix and twentieth of the month of October; neuer vſing to ſtay longer in the field for the incommodities of Winter; and that now they ſerued in the nature of voluntaries,and had gotten their prey, it was likely nothing could hold them from riſing:
but if that hope failed them, they then reſolued to giue the ſoldiers leaue to make quarter for themſelues;the Generals and commanders purpoſing to retire into the caſtle with ſome competent numbers,which they doubted not to keepe vntill ſupplies or weather ſhould force the enemie to diſlodge.The Prince of Tranſyluania knowing likewiſe that at that time he ſhould haue trouble enough to ſtay his ſuccours, and if they ſtaied,he feared they would proue ill Winter gueſts, and diſcredit him with his Hungars,whom they indifferently ſpoiled, tooke counſell either to force the enemie by that day,or to winne them by policie; but the later K was the ſafer way: for it ſeemed he had no deſire to put ſo many perſons of qualitie into the power of the Turkes, whoſe priſoners by agreement they muſt remaine; and hauing alſo intelligence, vpon what hopes the Imperialiſts held our, he counterwrought with the Turkes, to giue him a promiſe to abide with him fifteene daies after Saint Demetrius; in which time hee pretended to deliuer the fort and all into their hands; conjecturing as it ſeemed, that before that day the Germanes would make ſome ouerture, out of which hee might worke his owne aduantage, and obtaine his owne ends, and they would admire and feare his power and credit in the Turkiſh armie: for doubtleſſe he might haue forced them if he had pleaſed,but then hee had made his eſtate deſperate of any reconciliation with the Emperour,and muſt reſolue to continue the warre; vncertaine of the conſtancie of the Turkes, aſſured, they beeing L once retired,would verie late draw againe into the field; and perhaps he doubted the various ſucceſſe of warre, and of the ſetling of the State of the Grand Seigniour in Aſia, where all things were in diſtemper; and was ſomewhat carefull of his reputation in Chriſtendome, which he knew was farre aduentured in this action: for which aboue twentie thouſand poore ſoules loſt their libertie,and indangered their faith. Therfore he made vſe of his time and his wit,and the Imperials finding themſelues deceiued in the hope of breaking vp of the campe, now no longer able to ſuſtaine their wants,ſent commiſſioners to him in the Emperors name, to treat ſome agreement. He ſeeing his fifteene dayes weare out a pace, and the Turkes beginning to diſlodge,accepted the offer;and that very day,to giue ſatisfaction to the Port diſpeeded one of his chamber in poſt to make known vnto the Vizier(a man not vneaſie to abuſe) M that he had done his vtmoſt, to detaine the Turkes to Winter in Hungarie; but being not able longer to hold them together, he was forced to come to a treatie: for to venture to aſſault the trenches,was full of perill; to riſe without ſome concluſion,were to quit the place,to honour the enemie, and to weaken his owne reputation: to continue the ſiege after the depar-

A ture of his ſuccours, would hazard his owne armie into mutinie: therefore he was reſolued to make a truce for eight moneths; that ſeeing the Grand Seigniour had conſented to receiue the Emperours Embaſſadour, time might be allowed for treatie and finall concluſion. He gaue him inſtruction to ſay, That as then he had not fully agreed, but that it was reſolued on to be done, onely with a formall reſeruation of the approuement of the Viziers, without which it ſhould be held as not don: That he ſhould require the finall reſolution of the Port, whether the Grand Seigniour would continue conſtant, and maintaine him in the warre, or not: if they reſolued vpon warre, then to demand prouiſion of munition, money, ſouldiers, and all other neceſſaries in ſeaſon, and in a meaſure, in thoſe times impoſſible: If they deſired peace, that they ſhould giue a draught of what conditions they affected. But withall, an abſolute power B to himſelfe to mitigate them, and to make ſuch other at his diſcretion, as the neceſſitie of the affaires and time required for the profit of his Empire. The Prince at the firſt arriuall of the Commiſſioners at his quarter, diſcouered ſome jealouſie and diſcontent in ſome of his followers, Bohemians, and Germanes: whereupon he called before him moſt of his Commanders, and deſired them not to miſtruſt him; he ſhewed ſome reaſons why he might be inforced to make a truce; but proteſted he would neuer depoſe Armes, nor conclude a finall peace with the Emperor, except he would alſo diſarm, and leaue thoſe Prouinces and the Empire in quiet. For though it were a hard choice for him to be bitten by a Wolfe, or by a dog (which were his owne words) yet ſeeing he could better truſt the one, than the other, he would make vſe of one to curbe the other. This gaue not full ſatisfaction; but the words of a Prince muſt
C be currant payment, becauſe they beare his ſtampe; for his meaning, or what he treated, hee truſted none withall but his owne breſt. The meſſenger hee ſent vnto the Port, played his part ſo well and ſecretly, as he gaue ſatisfaction to that State, readie enough to beleeue well, and procured a ratification of the truce ſuppoſed then to be made; and for inſtructions in the intended treatie, he propounded in his Maſters name, three articles, and one commiſſion. Firſt, That the Emperor ſhould diſclaim all right and title to Hungarie, and ſhould leaue the people free, and the Prince of Tranſyluania to gouerne them. Secondly, That the Princes, and all the Prouinces that had ſent their embaſſadors and Preſents to the Port, and had made league with him, and had taken the Imperiall protection, ſhould bee reſtored to their priſtine libertie and eſtates. Thirdly, That the Emperour ſhould pay a tribute of fortie thouſand dollars for Auſtria, D pretended to be granted in the daies of Sultan Solyman. But the Commiſſion was the key of the worke, whereby the Prince, with the counſell of the Baſſa of Buda, obtained full power at his owne diſcretion, if he found peace conuenient, to make and conclude it; this laſt being,
(as was ſuppoſed) the end and ſcope of Bethlem Gabors deſires; the other propoſitions onely a garniſhing, to make the Turkes beleeue that he was carefull of their ſeruice; and the Emperour, that he was verie powerfull, and much eſteemed at the Port. Which all men imagined would produce an end of thoſe wars: For the Prince of Tranſyluania confeſſed, that he drew not in the Turkes for any need he had of their ſuccours, nor for any benefit intended to them, but to make a glorious ſhew to the Emperour, of his credit with the Grand Seigniour, thereby to facilitate his ends.

A truce betweene the Emperour and the Prince of Tranſiluania

E After ſome time ſpent in treatie with the Commiſſioners of the army, a truce was taken betweene the Prince of Tranſyluania and the Marqueſſe De Monte Negro, Generall for his Imperiall Maieſtie, before the town of Ghoding on the frontier of Morauia, where the Germans were beſieged; and letters preſently written thereof by the Prince to the great Vizier, which were dated the tenth of Nouember. The mediatour betweene them was the Palatine Staniſlaus Turzow an Hungarian. The articles of greateſt importance, or that were then publiſhed to the world, were foure:

The articles of the truce.

I. That on both parts Armes ſhould be depoſed for ten moneths (ending the ſixth of September F 1624) and all other acts of hoſtilitie giuen ouer. That there ſhould of neither ſide any attempt be made, nor by force nor fraud to take any Caſtles, Forts, Cities, or places of defence during this time; and that both Germanes, Hungars, and Turkes, ſhould be alike comprehended.

II. That if the Emperour were deſirous to treat and conclude a finall peace with the Grand

Seigniour, he ſhould vſe Bethlem Gabor as the mediatour, and doe nothing therein without his priuitie.

III. That all the places and fortes, taken in by the Prince of Tranſyluania in his late expedition, ſhould reſt quiet in his poſſeſſion vntill the time expired: And that all Cities and caſtles now in the poſſeſſion of either, ſhould ſo remaine without any alteration.

IIII. That all paſſages ſhould be open for free trade, and ſecure entercourſe of marchants, and all other the ſubiects and friends of either ſide.

This done, the Prince of Tranſyluania made a ſhew of redeeming all the poore captiues, taken by the Turks at his own charge, with ſome help from the Imperials, vpon whom he laid H the blame, as hauing failed to meet him vpon a paſſage of water, where he entertained the Turkiſh army: but they not comming, hee pretended the Turkes roſe in the night, and carried them all away to the number of twentie thouſand.

The Hungars ſet vpon the Turkes in their retreat.

The Prince warned the Turkes to keepe in order, and not to ſtraggle in their retrait, nor to commit any inſolencie and ſpoile, the countrey being all in armes and alreadie enraged: but they followed not his councell, which cauſed ſome two thouſand Hungarian horſe to ſet vpon them as they were diuided, and ſlew fiue or ſix hundred of them, and recouered ſome priſoners, whereupon the Turks vnited and returned, and killed as many of the Hungars, tooke one man of quallitie, and many other ſlaues.

The King of Perſia inuades the Prouince of Babylon.

I Vpon aduice from Haſis Baſſa General of the Prouince of Babylon, That the King of Perſia with a powerfull armie, had entered thoſe quarters, and that both the citie and that countrey would be loſt, if aides did not arriue verie ſpeedily; and the Rebels in Aſia continuing their inſolencie, a warre was ſuddenly proclaimed at the Port, in ſuch termes as neuer had beene heard of in former times; to ſay, That whoſoeuer tooke pay of the Grand Seigniour in any kinde as a ſouldier, if hee came not to the Rendeuous appointed with his armes, ſhould bee confiſcated, eſteemed as a Rebell, and his wife and children ſold for ſlaues. This was ſent into Greece, Natolia, Trabizond, and all the vtmoſt confines of the Turkiſh Empire. Hereupon the Grand Seigniour and the wiſeſt of the Baſſaes, inclined to buy Abaſſa Baſſa, and to ſend him a generall pardon and grant of all his demands, vpon condition, that he would preſently march and turne his army againſt the common enemie; K fearing either the doubtfulneſſe of a battell with deſperate men, or to force him to retire and joyne with the Perſian, where he might be well receiued. And as the preſent condition of the State then ſtood, the councell was good; but the Ianizaries would not conſent nor hearken to any reconcilement with their profeſſed enemie; but required to be led out againſt Abaſſa Baſſa firſt, and ſo to proceed in the warre: and becauſe their owne Aga (brother in law to the Empetour) did not concurre with them in opinion, they mutined againſt him, who wiſely gaue way to the ſtorme, and ſurrendered his charge; to which a Page of the Court was preſently aduanced. Thus, while it was vnreſolued how to proceed againſt the Perſian and Abaſſa Baſſa ioyntly, who continued to ſpoile and put to ranſom all Aſia the leſſe, and could not be reconciled for the Ianizaries, nor ſafely attempted for the Spahies (betweenwhich two Orders) there was as yet bad intelligence L and emulation: the King of Perſia conquered the prouince and Citie of Babylon, put to flight Haſis Achmet Baſſa the Generall of that defenſiue warre, and tooke priſoner Chur Haſſen Baſſa a renowned old Souldier, cut in pieces all that oppoſed him, poſſeſſed himſelfe of * Moſul, and Leska on the Perſian Sea, and diuiding his armie, ſent part towards Van and Diarbeck, and the other towards Mecha, as if he had hope and deſigne to ſhare all the Eaſterne part of the Turkiſh Empire.

Touching the affaires of Tunes and Algier.

His Maieſtie the King of Great Britaine, hauing by his firſt letters in 1621, complained to the Grand Seigniour, and commanded his Embaſſadour to ſeeke redreſſe againſt the Piracies and inſolencies of the inhabitants of Algier and Tunes, who in the two former yeares, had taken M aboue a hundred ſhips and veſſels of all ſorts, and had made ſlaues of aboue twelue hundred of his Maieſties ſubiects: and had then vpon their wharfs, a thouſand pieces of yron ordnance, beſides thoſe in their ſhipping, taken from the Engliſh and Dutch: The Embaſſadour preſſing to obtain juſtice againſt them, or that they might be abandoned and left to the

A Iuſtice of his Maieſtie, without offence of the Port; the great Vizier offered to giue what Commands ſhould be required. But He knowing how weake effect thoſe Letters of courſe had produced in other occaſions, and how little obedience and reſpect thoſe common theeues did beare vnto the Port (the Baſſa's themſelues conniuing, and nouriſhing thereby their own gain) eſpecially conſidering, that what face ſoeuer, and ſeeming diſlike was ſhewed & pretended, yet inwardly the Turks did take pleaſure and glory, that the Chriſtian was robbed weakened and ſpoyled, vnder the ſhadow of peace; did vtterly refuſe to accept of ſuch feigned remedies, but inſiſted vpon two points, whereby only there might be ſome hope of redreſſe in that affaire:

Firſt, That the Grand Seigniour would ſend an expreſſe Chiaus to Algier and Tunes, to B call to the Port ſome of the principall inhabitants and aduenturers, of all the Orders of thoſe cities, ſuch as ſent and armed out the ſhips of courſe; that being conuented face to face, and accuſed and conuinced of matter of the fact, the State might be truly informed of the conſequence of their outragious theeuerie, and prouide ſuch remedie as ſhould be requiſite and ſufficient in the future, to ſecure the commerce and free nauigation in thoſe ſeas.

Secondly, That the Baſſa's who were ſent from the Port rather for cuſtome and pretence of dominion, than for any great fruit or hope of obedience (yet becauſe they returned at the end of their gouernment, they might be reſponſible for matters concerning themſelues) might receiue ſtrict and abſolute order, not to take any tenths of the prizes, becauſe being diſintereſſed, and ſharing no profit, there might be more hope, by their authoritie, of execu- C tion of the Grand Seigniours pleaſure in reſtraint of their robberies.

Theſe Propoſitions found at firſt much oppoſition; but the Embaſſador refuſing all other ordinarie and vneffectiue means, required either this forme of proceeding; or, that the grand Seignior would declare them out of his protection, and ſtanding neutrall leaue them to their owne defence: proteſting, That this courſe was taken for good reſpect to the Port; yet if really ſome order were not eſtabliſhed, that there was no remedie but to redreſſe theſe iniuries by the ſword, and to puniſh thoſe Barbarians as Inimici humani generis, publike enemies of mankind. Deſiring the Viziers to take it to ſerious conſideration, that ſeeing amitie and correſpondence betweene the Kingdome of England and the Turkiſh Empire, did principally and almoſt integrally depend vpon commerce and traffique, the whole foundation was ſhaken D and made vſeleſſe to both, by the interruption of thoſe theeues. Theſe reaſons concurring with the diſtemper of thoſe times, and their owne feares, ſo farre preuailed, that by a generall conſultation it was concluded, to ſatisfie the Embaſſadour in his owne wayes: and accordingly a meſſenger was diſpatched from the Port to call to Iuſtice ſome of all the Orders, to anſwer as Deputies for the Cities, before the Vizier and Diuan, in ſuch accuſations as ſhould be obiected againſt them.

This negotiation was begun and finiſhed, as much as concerned the authoritie of the Grand Seigniour, in the yeare 1622; but being not perfected and tranſacted vntill the next, and that time full of various mutations, we haue thought fit to continue the thred of the former E hiſtorie, and not to mingle and confound it with relations of ſeuerall and vnlike ſubiects and natures: and though this part be found a little out of his owne time, yet both will be the cleerer by the diſſeueration.

The Baſſa and inhabitants of Algier hauing receiued letters by Mehemet Aga, both reprehending them for inſolencies committed vpon the Engliſh nation, and commanding them to keepe the peace of the Empire, and to bring with him ſome of the principall of that gouernment; did elect foure and twentie Commiſſioners (amongſt whom, the Mufti was both the head and aduocate) and gaue them inſtructions and order to recriminate and accuſe the Engliſh of many depredations and iniuries: hoping thereby, either to extenuate their owne offence, or by pretending iuſt cauſe, to leaue themſelues at libertie to continue their piracies. And F the Baſſa and Citie of Tunes hauing receiued by the ſaid Meſſenger reprehenſions and commands to the like effect, they reſolued in their paſſage to Conſtantinople to conſult with their fellowes of Tunes, who ioyned to them two of their Councell, and gaue them inſtructions to be aſſiſtant: but with this caution, that they ſhould not declare themſelues openly, but to obſerue the proceedings of thoſe of Algier, and to conforme with them, that if they were enforced to make peace, they ſhould concurre and be comprehended; but if it were poſſible for both to eſcape, that they ſhould leaue the breach open, and themſelues at liberty. G

They arriued together at Conſtantinople in the moneth of Nouember, in that yeare in the raigne of Muſtapha, and made their firſt addreſſes priuatly to the Engliſh Embaſſadour; ſubtilly pretending to end all differences ſecretly with him, becauſe they were vnwilling to anſwer and diſcouer to Iuſtice what infinite ſpoiles they had gotten; and that if they could accommodate with him, and treat without the authoritie of the Port, they reſolued to promiſe any thing, which they meant not to obſerue, and ſo eſcaping for the preſent, they hoped to do more miſchiefe, by the aduantage of the ſecuritie of the Engliſh, and their owne breach of faith. But the Embaſſadour refuſed to treat with them, as being ſubiects, and not ſui iuris, and to giue them any hearing, but in the preſence and by the mediation of the great Vizier. H Whereupon they applied themſelues and returned to their reſolution of complaint: And the Embaſſadour proſecuting their accuſation, after many meetings and diſputes, by the interpoſition of Halil Baſſa there was an Amneſtia accepted on both parts, and a peace concluded on the Articles and conditions enſuing. Which were ratified by the proper ſignature of the grand Seignior Muſtapha, and reconfirmed by Sultan Morat, proclaimed in Tunes and Algier, and recommended by ſeuerall letters from the Vizier and Captaine Baſſa, to the Baſſa's, Caddees, * and Councell of both Cities.

* Iudges.

Imperiall Commands ſent by the Grand Seigniour to the Baſſa's of Tunes and Algier, Caddees, Aga of the Ianizaries, Dyes, Captaines, Antients, and other Gouernors.

I

OVr high and Imperiall Firm° being come vnto you; Know, That from the time of our great Grandfather, Grandfather, and Father of happy memorie, the Kings of England haue alwayes been firme and conſtant with all ſinceritie, in friendſhip, league, and correſpondencie with the Imperiall Port, our glorious Progenitors, and with our Maieſtie. And in conformitie of the Imperiall Capitulations, league, and Peace heretofore agreed on betweene both parties, and alwayes vntill now obſerued of Vs; K Foraſmuch as the Engliſh Nation, their Merchants and ſubiects, with their merchandiſe, ſhips, and goods, are free to come and go, traffique and negotiate ſafe and ſecure in all the parts of our Empire; it hauing neuer beene our Imperiall will and permiſſion, that by any of our ſubiects or ſlaues they ſhould at any time be troubled, ſpoyled, or damnified. Which Nation while (vnder the ſhadow of our iuſtice and protection) they paſſe through the ſeas with their ſhips and goods for traffique and negotiation, diuers of you my ſlaues of Algier and Tunes, without conſideration or reſpect of the friendſhip, peace, and league betweene vs and the ſaid King, whereſoeuer you meet with the ſhips of the ſaid Nation, either at ſea, or in any port or hauen, you take the ſaid ſhips, ſpoyling them of their goods and merchandiſes, making ſlaues and killing the men which you find in their ſhips, a thing not onely vniuſt, but alſo contrarie to our Imperiall Capitulations. Wherefore, L that for the time to come the ſaid nation ſhould not be ſo vniuſtly ſpoyled and indamaged, there haue been ſent to you diuers times our Imperiall and expreſſe commands: But you ſhewing your ſelues arrogant and diſobedient (as we vnderſtand) do ſtill continue to rob and ſpoile the ſaid Engliſh, contrarie to our ſaid Capitulations, intention and will. The concourſe of Merchants and traffique being the nutriment and ſplendor of Kingdomes; you ſhall vnderſtand, that it is by no meanes our Imperiall will, that the ſaid Nation, now in league and friendſhip with vs, be any more in like ſort, contrarie to our capitulation, will, and promiſe, ſpoyled and moleſted. Which iniuries and other wrongs done vnto them, being a great diſhonour to our State and Imperiall Maieſtie, all you haue not only deſeruedly fallen into our diſpleaſure, but alſo are worthy of all diſgrace, ſhame, and puniſhment. And to the end hereafter all things may be performed by you according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, M and that all ſuch as haue committed ſuch inſolencies and ſpoyles, be apprehended and worthily puniſhed, we haue at this preſent vnder our Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded, and haue ſent you this our Imperiall Commandement by this bringer our ſeruant Mehemet Aga, who as ſoone as he ſhall be there arriued, we command you that you call together all, great and ſmall, noble and meane, which dwell in the ſaid place of Tunes, and publiquely in the preſence of them all, with a loud

A voice you ſhall reade this our Imperiall commandement. And after that, with the aſſiſtance and aid of this our Meſſenger, you haue deliuered into the hands of the Engliſh men, there appointed for the ſame, without further excuſe and delay, all ſuch Engliſhmen, their goods and merchandiſes and ſhips, which haue been taken, contrarie to our Imperiall capitulations, from the ſaid Nation;
all thoſe tranſgreſſors and malefactors, whoſoeuer they be, who haue committed theſe outrages, and cauſed ſuch diſturbance to the peace, league, and friendſhip, you ſhall without any fauour chaſtiſe and puniſh according to their deſerts. And afterward ye ſhall haue care, that the Nation, Merchants and ſubiects of England be not ſo vniuſtly ſpoyled, hurt, or moleſted, contrary to our Imperiall promiſe and will. Therefore you ſhall publiquely proteſt and declare vnto all, That hereafter no man do trouble or moleſt them, but rather meeting them in any place whatſoeuer by ſea or land, to helpe and B ſuccour them, obſeruing the termes of true peace and friendſhip, according to the tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations; and that euery one take heed and beware, that he doe, or permit nothing to be done contrarie to our will, peace, and Imperiall Capitulation. And eſpecially you ſhall looke and procure all things to be obſerued, conformable to this our Imperiall will. And if, according to the antient cuſtome, the King of England will eſtabliſh there any Conſul, we command, that the ſaid Conſul, as alſo the Merchants and other ſubiects, be accepted, aſſiſted, and protected at all times, according to the intention of our Imperiall Capitulation. And all of you, with all your care, endeauour, and diligence, ſhall alwaies prouide that the ſaid Nation may paſſe free and ſecure vnder our Imperiall protection and ſhadow, and traffique and negotiate, buy and ſell through all the parts of our dominions, to their content and full ſatisfaction. And if after the date of this our Imperiall Commandement, C we ſhall vnderſtand that the ſaid Nation be againe robbed and ſpoyled by you; be you hereof
aſſured, that our true ſlaues and ſubiects are thoſe which do obey our Lawes and commands, and obſerue our will, as alſo it is written in our Alcoran, Obey God, the Prophet, and your ſoueraigne Lord: But thoſe that do not obey nor obſerue our Lawes and commandements, are not our ſlaues nor ſubiects, but rather by their diſobedience do fall into our diſpleaſure, diſgrace, and malediction.
For which, our Imperiall commands ſhall be ſent throughout all the parts of our Empire, eſpecially to Tunes and Algier, and to all the Ports of Natolia and Grecia, and to what places ſoeuer elſe they ſhall come, to be alwayes driuen from thence, abandoned, and puniſhed, and by all our Officers and gouernors perſecuted. Therefore take you heed, that you ſay not hereafter you were not warned hereof before hand, but giue notice publiquely vnto all men, of the effect of this our command, D and look that you cauſe euery man to be obedient thereunto. By which doing, you ſhall be bleſſed of God, and obtaine our fauour: for if the ſaid Engliſh nation be againe troubled and moleſted, and the king of England do ſend any forces againſt thoſe tranſgreſſors, to chaſtiſe and puniſh them, do you conſider, that it ſhall diſpleaſe vs, that ye are the cauſe to diſturbe the peace and friendſhip betweene vs.
Therefore take heed and beware of all ſuch actions as may any way tend to the diſturbance and violating of our ſaid peace and friendſhip. And it being our chiefeſt deſire, that this buſineſſe be duly fulfilled and effected when this our Imperiall commandement ſhall come vnto you, and that you haue performed our will therein, and ſhall haue deliuered into the hands of the Engliſhmen, all ſuch men, ſhips, and goods as haue been taken from them, you ſhall aduiſe vs particularly and punctually thereof, and in what maner you haue ſatiſfied and contented them, and ſend the ſame to our Imperial Port.
E And all this let be knowne vnto you, giuing alwayes credit and obedience to our Imperiall Firmo.

The great Viziers Letters to the Baſſa's of Algier and Tunes.

TO the high and honourable Baſſa: To whoſe noble preſence ſendeth infinite ſalutations tending vnto all loue: And to the honoured among the Iudges, and Fountaine of wiſedome and eloquence, the Caddee of Algier, whoſe wiſedome be encreaſed: and to the renowned among the great and honourable men, the Aga of the Ianizaries of Algier, whoſe dignitie be augmented; and to G

the famous amongſt their equals the Dye and Captains of ſquadrons and companies, and other chieftaines and antients, whoſe dignitie be aduanced.

AFter our louing ſalutations ſent vnto you, our aduice is this: Whereas of a long time the Kings of England, with all ſinceritie and good correſpondencie, haue alwaies beene true, firme, and conſtant friends to this Imperiall Port and our Emperour, Soueraigne of the whole earth, whoſe Empire the mercifull God protect vntill the day of Iudgement; and according to the ſaid friendſhip, league, and Imperiall capitulations agreed on betweene both parties, It was alwaies the minde and intention of our Emperor, That the Nation, Marchants, and ſubiects of England, might with their ſhips and merchandiſes, goe and come, negotiate and traffique, ſafe and ſecure through all the parts of our H Empire, and that they ſhould by no man be troubled, moleſted, or hindered. Notwithſtanding, diuers of the ſlaues of Algier, without reſpect or regard of the ſaid friendſhip and amitie, and contrarie to the Capitulations, minde and will of our Emperour; whereſoeuer either at ſea, or in any Port they meet with any the ſaid Engliſh ſhips, they rob and ſpoile them, and take away their goods, and the men they kill and make ſlaues: which wrongs and grieuous offences, that they might be remedied and amended, diuers times many expreſſe orders, proteſts, and other commands haue beene ſent to you. But becauſe the ſaid ſlaues of Algier could not be quieted, but rather do continue to commit the ſame inſolencies (whereof his Maieſtie hath beene againe amply enformed) to wit of their diſobedience againſt the will of his Imperiall Maieſtie, and of the loſſes and wrongs continually done to the ſaid Nation; he hath now vnder his Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded and ſent you his Imperiall commandement, I to the end the ſaid malefactors may be apprehended and duly puniſhed: for which end we haue alſo thought it neceſſarie to ſend you this our preſent letter, which when you ſhall receiue, it behoueth eſpecially that you vſe all your diligence and care, about this particular buſineſſe: and cauſe that in the publique aſſemblie and preſence of all, great and ſmall, noble and meane, ſouldiers, Gouernours and others, the ſaid Imperiall command bee read; and that all ſuch perſons as haue committed ſuch diſobedience and ſpoiles, be apprehended, and with the aſſiſtance and aid of the bringer hereof, and the ſaid commandements, let all ſuch ſhips, goods, and men, be taken and recouered from them, which they haue taken from the Engliſh, and all entirely without any contradiction bee deliuered and giuen into the hands of the Engliſhmen there appointed to receiue the ſame; puniſhing ſeuerely all ſuch whoſoeuer they be, which haue committed ſuch ſpoiles and robberies, as diſturbers of the peace & amitie; K and yet ſhall cauſe, that in time to come no hurt or violence be done to the ſaid Engliſh Nation, their goods, ſhips, or men, by any perſon whatſoeuer. And if (according to the Imperiall Capitulation and antient cuſtome) the King of England will eſtabliſh there any Conſull, you ſhall receiue him with all courteſie, and protect him in all occaſions. And to conclude, you ſhall be carefull to fulfill and obſerue all ſuch orders as are written in the Imperiall commandement, foraſmuch as the will of the Emperour is, That the ſaid Nation may be in peace and quiet eſtate. And if after the date hereof we ſhall heare, that the ſaid Nation be againe ſo damnified and ſpoiled, your diſobedience thereby will euidently appeare, and that all is done with your knowledge and approbation. Wherefore know yee for certaine, that our Emperour will inflict the ſame puniſhment vpon you, which is due to ſuch offendors. L
Therefore with all your diligence and care you ſhall prouide, that none be permitted at any time to commit the like ſpoiles, nor to fauour any ſuch whomſoeuer: but you ſhall alwaies obſerue and fulfill the will and command of his Maieſtie, and not ſuffer any fact to be done by any man, preiudiciall thereunto.

A Letter from the Captaine Baſſa to Iſuph Dye, in Tunes.

M

TO the eſteemed among his equals Iſuph Baſſa, whoſe dignitie be euer augmented. After our reſpectiue ſalutations, we let you know, That whereas for many yeares paſt, vntill this preſent, the Kings of England haue euer beene ſincere friends to this Imperiall Port, diuers of the ſouldiers and other officers of Tunes and Algier, without regard and reſpect to the peace and Imperiall Capitulations, meeting either at Sea or in any harbor the Engliſh ſhips, they do take and ſpoile them and iniuſtly

A iuſtly rob them of all their lading and facultie, impriſoning and killing the ſubiects and people of the ſaid King of England. Wherefore to the end that hereafter, contrarie to the antient League, Peace, and Imperiall Capitulations, the ſaid Engliſh may no more be moleſted and ſpoyled, and that ſuch tranſgreſſors of the Imperiall will, command, and Capitulation, may by all means be found and duely puniſhed: by this preſent bearer here is ſent an expreſſe Imperiall command; in conformitie whereof this our letter is written particularly to you. Which arriuing, it is conuenient, and it behooueth you, that you eſpecially vſe all your diligence and care, that from henceforth the ſaid Engliſh nation may no more, contrarie to the will, minde, and Imperiall Capitulations, bee ſo vniuſtly damnified; but that you liue with them in all good peace and friendſhip; and that all ſuch which ſhall tranſgreſſe, and commit any act contrarie to the Imperiall will and capitulations, may be puniſhed
B by Iuſtice, the which with all your power and diligence you ſhall attend to fulfill and obſerue.

A Letter from the Captaine Baſſa, to the Baſſa Caddee, and other the Officers of Algier.

TO the great and illuſtrous Baſſa, and to the fountaine of wiſedome, my Lord the Caddee; and to the great and courteous Lord the Ianizari-Aga of Algier in Affrica, whoſe degrees be alwaies C augmented; and to the eſteemed among their equalls, the worthy Dyes and Captaines of the footmen, Leaders of Companies and ſquadrons, and other gouernors; and to all Commanders of ſhips, and other the Antients of the Countrey, whoſe dignitie be alwaies encreaſed. To whoſe preſence hauing ſent infinite ſalutation, our louing and faithfull aduice is this; Whereas from antient times vntill this day, the Kings of England haue euer remained firme and perfect friends with the Imperiall and high Port, and the will of his Maieſtie hath euer beene, that according to the peace, league, friendſhip, and capitulations long ſince contracted on both parts, the ſubiects of England might at all times ſafely and ſecurely go traffique and negotiate in all parts of the Imperiall dominion; and that no iniurie or moleſtation ſhould be done vnto them by any perſon whatſoeuer. In conformitie whereof, while the ſaid Nation vnder the ſhadow of the Imperiall protection doe paſſe in the ſeas in D their affaires of merchandiſe and buſineſſe, diuers of the ſouldiors and other Officers of Algier, without reſpect or conſideration that the ſaid Nation are in league and peace with our Emperor, meeting them in the ſea, or in harbour, they do take the ſaid ſhips, and doe carrie away their goods and merchandiſe, impriſoning or killing the men found therein. And whereas in times paſt, that the Imperiall Capitulations might haue bin obeyed and obſerued, and the ſaid Nation no more in ſuch manner iniuried and damnified, there haue been diuers expreſſe Imperiall commands ſent vnto you. But now of new, his Maieſtie hauing beene fully informed of your diſobedience continued againſt his Imperiall will, and of the iniuries and outrages committed vpon the ſaid Nation; and conſidering, that commerce and traffike of Merchants are both the nutriment and ſplendor of kingdomes, and that a nation now in league and peace with the Imperiall Maieſtie, ſhould be ſo vniuſtly, contrarie to the E Imperiall Capitulations, wronged and moleſted, to the great indignitie of the Empire, and diſhonour to the fame of his Maieſtie. To the end that from henceforth the antient league and peace may be truly obſerued, and the Imperiall Capitulations duely obeyed, and that all ſuch tranſgreſſors and malefactors may be ſpeedily taken and ſeuerely puniſhed, his Maieſtie hath now vnder his Imperiall hand affirmed and commanded, with which we alſo ſend you our preſent letter: Which arriuing, we do hope that all you will be obedient, and euer obſerue the tenour of the ſaid Imperiall Commands:
and that all ſuch that ſhall hereafter tranſgreſſe the will, command, and Imperiall Capitulations of his Maieſtie, and ſhall commit any act contrary thereto, be duely puniſhed according to Iuſtice. And that you will take care to liue quietly and in peace, and with all your diligence that you follow and obey the will of his Maieſtie.

The Capitulations or agreement of the Peace made with Tunes and Algier.

Let infinite laud and praiſe be alway giuen to the moſt omnipotent God, who of his great mercie and grace hath bleſſed this world with peace and tranquilitie, for the ſafetie and repoſe of his people: In conformitie to whoſe diuine will and pleaſure, the moſt inuincible and mighty Emperour hath alway entertained peace and amitie with all thoſe who haue deſired his friendſhip, that both rich and poore, and all ſorts of people might lie at their eaſe and content, to giue thankes, and ſerue the diuine Maieſtie. Which moſt bleſſed peace and correſpondence hath euer beene obſerued by all the Ottoman Emperours. Therefore whereas heretofore in the happy time, of famous memorie, of Sultan Morat Han now tranſlated into Paradiſe (vpon whoſe ſoule let the diuine mercies be multiplied) the kings of England, according to that truth and integritie infuſed into them, hauing alwaies made demonſtration of their loue and ſinceritie to this happy Port, then on both ſides there was concluded and eſtabliſhed a true peace and amitie, ana from that time to this preſent haue maintained their Embaſſadours here: And whereas there was then granted and giuen to the Engliſh nation an Imperiall Capitulation and priuiledge (To ſay) That the ſubiects and merchants of England, with their ſhips and faculties might freely and ſecurely nauigate in our ſeas, and traffique and negotiate at their owne pleaſure and content, in any part of the Imperiall dominion: Notwithſtanding, ſome yeares paſt there haue happened ſome diſcontents and quarrels betweene the ſaid Engliſh nation and the Souldierie of Tunes and Algier; and thereupon haue ſucceeded diuers acts of hoſtilitie, and mutuall damages, contrarie to the honour of the ſaid Imperiall Capitulation: for which cauſe, the mightie and famous Prince, among the Princes of the faith of Jeſus, obeyed of the greateſt followers of the Meſſiah, onely Gouernor of the important affaires of the Nazaren nation, Soueraigne of the limits of honour and power, Lord of greatneſſe and authoritie, the benigne and ſincere friend, the glorious IAMES King of England, to whoſe affaires we wiſh all proſperitie, and whoſe laſt dayes may be filled with honour and felicitie, hath ſent to this happy and high Port his elect, eſteemed, and prudent Embaſſadour Sir Thomas Roe, Knight, with his Royall Letters; complaining vehemently againſt the ſaid Souldierie of Algier and Tunes. The ſubſtance of which letters being ſignified to the Imperiall maieſtie our Emperor, he with his own proper hand and Imperial ſeale hath expreſſly commanded, and giuen his Imperiall order, that the people of Algier and Tunes for the future ſhould alway be obedient and obſeruant, according to the Imperiall Capitulations, and ſhould neuer commit nor make ſhew of any act contrarie thereunto. Which Imperiall command and Edict wee hauing ſent to thoſe cities by one Mutafaraca of the high court, and our eſteemed Capigi Baſſa Mahomet Aga; who ariuing there, and cauſing the Imperiall commands to be read with a loud voyce, in publique Conncell, and in preſence of the Beglerbegh and the whole Souldierie of the countries, euery one of them with all readineſſe and ſubmiſſion did ſhew themſelues obedient to the ſaid Orders and Edicts of his Imperiall Maieſtie. But withall replied, That while we did remaine conſtant and firme in the peace with the Engliſh nation, ſome of their ſhips, contrary to the capitulation, league, and friendſhip long ſince contracted on both parts, haue done diuers damages and iniuries vnto vs. And whereas from vs there ſhould neuer any action proceed contrary to the ſaid Imperiall Capitulations, the

ſaid

A ſaid Engliſh Nation oftentimes made warre vpon vs; for which cauſe we haue alſo beene inforced to reuenge our ſelues: but now our deſire is, That his Imperiall Maieſtie may bee truely informed of our State and cauſe in this buſineſſe, and accordingly let his Maieſtie diſpoſe and order vs at his owne will and pleaſure: for we will alwaies remaine, and be obſeruant and obedient. To which purpoſe they haue iointly and with one conſent, choſen the wiſe and honorable Lord, reuerend among the prudent, the prouinciall Mufti called Seich Seidi, and the honourable and diſcreet, the Mufti of the Citie, Seich Salmi, and the two Caddees, Iudges of the Prouinces, two that haue been Gouernors, two Colonels of the army, B two Captaines of foot, aſſiſted with other Antients both Burgeſſes and ſouldiers, whom they haue with one conſent created and eſtabliſhed as their Generall Procurators and Commiſſioners; and in companie of the ſaid Mahomet Aga, ſent to this happie Port: who beeing here arriued, and made knowne their petition to his Imperiall Maieſtie, hee and his abſolute miniſter the grand Vizier, haue expreſſely commanded vs, That we ſhould call before vs the Engliſh Embaſſadour and the ſaid Commiſſioners, and with all ſinceritie and iuſtice that we ſhould heare their differences, and make a finall and good concluſion between them; to wipe out all diſtaſte and rancor, and for the time to come, to conuert, and in place thereof C to plant a firme and holy peace and amitie. In obedience to which order, we haue ſent for the Engliſh Embaſſadour and the ſaid Deputies; betweene both whom, after long and litigious diſcourſes, we, according to the expreſſe command of his Imperiall Maieſtie, haue declared and commanded in the name of his Imperiall Maieſtie, to the ſaid Commiſſioners of Algier and Tunes, That for the times to come they ought to obey and obſerue the tenour of the Imperiall capitulations, and in this particular to conforme themſelues to this Imperiall order and ſubſequent Articles: viz,

I. That for euer hereafter, the hoſtilitie and enmitie betweene them and the Engliſh ſhould be annulled and blotted out of memorie, and conuerted into a good peace and commerce. And D after the date of this preſent writing, That the Engliſh ſhips ſmall and great, merchants, and all other ſubiects of England, freely and ſecurely, at their owne will and content, ſhall and may paſſe in the ſeas and come not onely to this our capitall Citie, but alſo ſafely goe to any part of our dominion, without any oppoſition or hinderance, according to the antient vſage, and Imperiall capitulations granted in behalfe of both parties.

II. And that his Maieſtie the King of England, hereupon may giue order through all the cities and ports of his kingdomes, to publiſh, That from henceforth euerie traueller or paſſenger ſhall ſecurely goe in his buſineſſe peaceably: and that they ſhall receiue neither in their E wayes outward or returning, any moleſtation, trouble, or impediment; but that the ſubiects on both parts, ſhal alway obſerue, and be obedient, conformable to the tenor of the Imperiall capitulations made from the beginning of the peace, vnto this day; and that for the time to come, there may in Algier be eſtabliſhed an Engliſh Conſul, prouided he be a man of qualitie and credit: to which Conſull and his merchants, & to all his Nation and their goods, neither from thoſe of Algier, nor from any other ſubiects of the Imperiall Port, ſhall be offered or ſuffered to be done, any wrong or iniuſtice whatſoeuer; but arriuing at the Port, the Officers of Algier (as it behoooueth all ſtrangers ſhould bee protected and cheriſhed) ſhall F receiue them with all manner of courteſie and honour. And for the time to come, in caſe any of the Engliſh Nation ſhould commit any act contrarie to the peace, amitie, and Imperiall capitulations, for ſuch offence the publike peace ſhall not be broken, but the Officers of Algier ſhall certifie the ſame to the Conſull, who (if it lie in his power) ſhall puniſh any ſuch offendour; if not, he ſhall then certifie the cauſe to his Maieſtie of England, or elſe to his G Embaſſadour reſident in our happie Port, to the end, that the diſturbers of the publike peace, may be duely puniſhed. In conformitie whereof, if for the time to come any of the inhabitants of Algier and Tunes, ſhall haue committed any action contrarie to the Imperiall capitulations, by continuing to trouble or quarrell with the ſaid Engliſh Nation, the ſaid Conſull ſhall make certificate and complaint to the Beglerbegh and Commanders of the armie, who ſhall alwayes ſeuerely puniſh all ſuch malefactors, to the end that thoſe of Algier may be carefull, neuer to do any act preiudiciall to this Peace and amitie.

III. All thoſe Engliſh ſlaues which ſhall be found now in Algier ſhall be ſet free, who with a note or liſt of their names ſhall be deliuered to the ſaid Conſul at his arriuall; in exchange H whereof there ſhall be another liſt giuen vnto the ſaid Conſul, of the names of diuers Muſſulmen taken not long ſince by their Engliſh ſhips and made ſlaues: which liſt the ſaid Conſul ſhall ſend to his Maieſtie of England to procure their libertie; and in this particular, of either ſide there ſhall be vſed no fraud or deceit.

IIII. For the time to come, all the Merchants and other Engliſh which ſhall arriue at Algier or Tunes, ſhall be receiued, cheriſhed, and protected from all wrong and iniury; and as in all other parts of the Empire they doe ſafely and ſecurely traffique and trade, ſo alſo they ſhall peaceably, quietly, and ſafely go, come, and negotiate in theſe cities, without any moleſtation, I and alway they ſhall liue according to the antient Capitulations.

V. That the ſhips of Algier and Tunes, ſmall and great, meeting with any Engliſh ſhips vpon
the ſea, or in any port, or ſeale, or otherwhere, ſhall alway ſalute one another; and the Engliſh ſhewing their Colours, that they are Engliſh and friends, there ſhall be no diſturbance or quarrell betweene them, but all mutuall courteſie ſhall be ſhewed; and they ſhall do one to the other all ſuch offices of friendſhip as may encreaſe and fortifie this good amity and correſpondence: and there ſhall neuer be done any wrong or outrage one to the other;
prouided that the Engliſh Shippes ſhall not take part nor aſſiſt the enemies of the Imperial K Port, nor tranſport in their veſſels the armes or faculties of our foes, nor protect nor defend them. And if it ſhall happen after this concluſion, that it ſhall be found that any Engliſh Ship ſhall ſo carry or protect the goods of our enemies, they ſhall ſtand to their perill, and receiue puniſhment; and yet this our accord Pand eace ſhall remaine ſafe and vnbroken vntill the day of Iudgement: And that alway on both parts, with all care and reſpect the antient and Imperiall Capitulations and commaunds ſhall be preſerued and obeyed.

Which Commiſſioners, (to ſay) the two Mufties, Caddees, and other aboue mentioned, L in our preſence made anſwer, That, We all in the name and behalfe of our city of Algier, and as the generall Procurators thereof, are content, and do accept of this accord and agreement, and wee doe all ſweare and promiſe to obſerue the ſame;
and that for the time to come, on our parts, nor on the behalfe of our ſucceſſors and poſteritie, there ſhall neuer any act be committed nor ſuffered in preiudice or diſturbance of this Peace and agreement. All which foreſaid Commiſſioners hauing before vs confeſſed, promiſed, and ſworne; the ſaid Engliſh Embaſſador did alſo ſay, I in the name of my Lord and King, and as his full Procurator, do accept and re- M ceiue theſe Conditions; and do promiſe, That the Subiects of his Maieſtie my Lord and Maſter, ſhall alway maintaine with the Subiects of his Imperiall Maieſtie,

A ſtie, peace, acording to the antient Capitulations; and that neuer on our parts ſhall be done any act of wrong, iniurie, or hoſtilitie: and at all times, when of either ſide there ſhal ariſe any controuerſie, or be done any iniuſtice, that this peace ſhall not therefore be broken, but that the malefactours ſhall be ſought out and duely puniſhed.

Which declaration made on both parts, it was by vs regiſtred and publiſhed, and this our preſent aſſurance and writing B giuen the firſt of the moneth Gemaziel, in the yeare of Mahomet, 1032, being the middle of March, 1622.

The Captaine Baſſaes Letter to his Maieſtie of Great Britaine, concerning the Peace with Tunes and Algier.

TO the mightie and renowned Prince, chiefe among the Maieſties of the Princes of the Faith C of Ieſus: obeyed of the greateſt Potentates, followers of Meſſiah; onely Director of the important affaires of the Nazeren Nation: Lord of the limits of Honour and Power; Protector of greatneſſe and authoritie; ſincere friend to our moſt high and dreadfull Emperour: The moſt glorious IAMES, King of England, whoſe euerie affaires God accompliſh with all felicitie; to whoſe laſt dayes we propheſie happineſſe and proſperitie, that the Diuine fauour may be propitious in all his wayes. To whoſe Royall preſence when with due reſpect and honor, Our humble ſalutations and wiſhes of pure health, and this our Letter full of ſincere loue, ſhall be preſented to the benigne and magnificent mind of your moſt excellent Maieſtie with al reuerence we giue you to vnderſtand:

THat on your Royall Letter not long ſince arriuing at this happie Port, the ſincere and D friendly tenour whereof was to this purpoſe, That your Maieſtie had now for many yeres maintained peace and friendſhip with the Ottoman Empire, and from the daies of Sultan Morat Han, of famous memorie, with whom the league and correſpondence between your kingdomes was firſt mutually contracted, vntill this time on your Maieſties part there hath beene no defailance, nor act committed in prejudice or diſturbance of the ſaid friendſhip. Notwithſtanding for ſome yeares paſt, that many your Maieſties ſubiects haue receiued great dammages and ſpoiles by the inhabitants of Tunes and Algier, the ſlaues of the Imperiall Maieſtie of my Emperour. Your Maieſtie therefore deſiring, that conformably to the league and amitie, the ſaid Imperiall Maieſtie ſhould puniſh thoſe people, and for the time to come prohibit ſuch courſes: your Maieſtie further ſignifying your conſtant reſolution to continue in peace E and correſpondence with his Imperiall Maieſtie my Maſter. His Imperiall Maieſtie with his owne proper hand and Seale, did inſtantly ordaine and command, That thoſe of Tunes and Algier ſhould anſwer; and for the future, ſhould deſiſt from all the like depredations, contrarie to the peace and friendly Capitulations: which ſaid order and Imperiall command; was with all expedition diſpeeded, with diuers other our vehement letters, by one of our Capigi Baſſaes, named Mahomet Aga; who arriuing at thoſe Ports, the officers, ſouldiers, and other Muſſulmen of both cities being aſſembled, and the ſaid Imperial Orders & Commands publiquely read, with one conſent they anſwered, It is verie true, wee are ſlaues and faithfull ſubiects of the Emperour, and alwaies with our heads bowed to the ground, obedient to his lawes and commandements, and from vs ſhall neuer proceed any act contrarie to the will of his Imperiall Maieſtie. F And although the originall cauſe of theſe differences, and diſturbance of the antient peace, both begun from the Engliſh and they, and not we, made the firſt breaches: notwithſtanding we will goe to the feet of our Emperour, and informe him of our owne ſtate and cauſe, and then let his Imperiall Maieſtie doe what he ſhall pleaſe; for we will euer be obedient and obſeruant to his Imperial will and command. To which purpoſe they haue amongſt themſelues, choſen certaine Commiſſioners and Procurators whoſe names are theſe. The elect and wiſe Lord the ſole Mufti of G that Kingdome, called the Lord Seich Seidi, and the Lord Seich Salmi Mufti of the citie, and the two Iudges of the countrey, two that haue beene Gouernours of the citie, two Colonels of the armie, two Captaines of foot, and two of the Antients of their Diuan, or Councel-hall, with ſome other aſſiſtants, perſons diſcreet and worthie of ſuch imploiment, whom they haue ſent with their petition to this Imperiall Port; whoſe arriuall being made knowne vnto his Imperiall Maieſtie, with the differences and contracts, which for ſome few yeres haue hapned between the ſubiects of your Maieſtie & them. His Imperiall Maieſtie my Lord, did inſtantly & expreſſely command, That for the time to come between thoſe of Tunes & Algier and the Engliſh Nation, there ſhould not be nor remaine, any further quarrell or diſpute, nor word or act iniurious, one to the other; but that according to the antient peace and friendſhip long ſince contracted on both parts, all tearmes of friendſhip ſhould be eſtabliſhed and obſerued H betweene them: giuing expreſſe commiſſion by mee his abſolute miniſter the grand Vizier, That the reaſons and pretences on both parts ſhould bee heard before vs, and there decided and concluded, and their differences conuented into a good and holy peace and amitie. In obedience to which order, wee hauing called before vs all the ſaid Procurators of Algier in preſence of the famous, & prudent, the illuſtrious Embaſſador Sir Thomas Roe, reſident in this happie Port, of whom hauing demanded for what cauſe they had done ſpoiles and wrongs to the Engliſh Nation; they gaue anſwer, That antiently betweene the Engliſh and vs, there was held a ſtrict peace, friendſhip, and commerce; and that our ſhips and theirs meeting in the ſeas, did ſhew one to the other kindneſſe and amitie; and that neither from their parts nor I ours, was any offence, ſo that this loue among vs did daily encreaſe and augment; That the Engliſh Nation did maintaine a Conſul in Algier, a man of qualitie and credit: and whileſt we day and night did ſtudie to aduance the ſaid friendſhip between vs, an Engliſh ſhip in the Port of Alexandria, did take in diuers our Pilgrimes, and other our Muſſelmen paſſengers, with promiſe to tranſport them to Algier, of whome ſome they after ſet on ſhoare vpon a deſart Iſland, where they periſhed with cold and hunger; and the reſt being the greater part, they carried and ſold to Malta; which pilgrimes Mahometanes being borne in Algier, their parents and kindred made often and earneſt exclamations in our publique Councell. After this, another Engliſh ſhip being come to our Port of Algier, and anchored certaine daies, according to cuſtome, the Engliſh Conſull going aboord with one of our captaines of foot to make ſearch, K they threw ouer and drowned our officer, the Conſull making eſcape with the ſhip, who preſently departing for another of our Ports called Bigia, our people there eſteeming and truſting the Engliſh, as our friends, vnder colour thereof, hauing enticed aboord the Captaine of the caſtle and two of his ſonnes with diuers other Muſſelmen, they carried them away by force, and ſold them in the State of the Duke of Florence: another of their ſhips being arriued at Algier, hauing taken in diuers Muſſelmen paſſengers to tranſport them to Tituan, they carried them and ſold them in Spaine. Since, the ſaid Engliſh being vnited with the King of Spain our capitall enemie, with their ſhips haue often made warre vpon vs, and ſhot with their ordinance into the caſtle of Algier, and attempted to burne our fleet in our Port (though therein failing) which alliance with our enemies and act of hoſtility, hath made a iuſt breach of peace L and friendſhip betweene vs: now there being in being a league and Capitulation between the Maieſtie of England and our Emperor, by what reaſon ſhould the ſaid Nation load their ſhips with the goods, faculties, and perſons of our enemies the Spaniards, colouring them as their owne, and tranſporting them often into the Imperiall Dominions, and meeting with our ſhips they hide and denie ſuch goods and men, protecting, aſſiſting, and aiding againſt vs thoſe our mortall foes, affronting and outraging vs many and many waies: for which cauſe we alſo haue beene inforced to reuenge our ſelues, and theſe differences betweene vs haue ſucceeded. But if the Engliſh Nation had remained conſtant with vs in peace and commerce, according to the Capitulations betweene ours and their Lord, certainely we had neuer done, or ſuffered to be done any act or violence contrarie to the league and peace; as alſo for the time to come, there M ſhall no diſobedience ſtaine vs againſt the commands and pleaſure of our Lord and Emperor.

The Embaſſadour of your Maieſtie hauing heard this complaint, replied, That neuer on the behalfe or with the conſent of the King my Maſter, can there bee prooued any act contrarie or preiudiciall to the antient Peace and League, betweene his Maieſtie and this Port, much leſſe can

A can be ſaid, that any Engliſhman or ſubiect of my king, as in obedience, hath done any of theſe things, wherewith you calumniate vs: But if any fugitiue Rebell or Pirat, vnder the Colours and name of an Engliſhman, whom you haue nouriſhed and receiued into your Port, haue committed any ſuch facts, we cannot preuent it, you haue beene in the faults. And doubtleſſe the King my Maſter, if vpon any complaint he had knowne who were the offendors, and that they had returned into England, he would haue ſeuerely puniſhed ſuch faith-breakers, as in his iuſtice he hath often done to pyrats.
But you and all your Citie of Algier, how often, and how infinite damages, ſpoyles, and iniuries haue you vniuſtly done and vſed towards the ſubiects of the King my maſter? which you can neither deny nor defend. Which your Embaſſador hauing with many reaſons anſwered them, and particularly ſhewed the great iniuries done by them; we conſidering, that if wee ſhould
B ſuffer both parts to reply to euery particular, it would draw the buſineſſe to length of diſpute, and perhaps ſtirre vp ſo much eagerneſſe, as it would be more difficult to accommodate and appeaſe the ſharpeneſſe and differences between them; we did thus interpoſe, What is done, is done: Now the command and expreſſe will of our Emperour to you of Algier, is, and in the name of our Emperour I commaund you, That there be no more remembrance of the enmitie paſt, but that between you and the Engliſh nation peace and friendſhip may be renewed and eſtabliſhed, conformable to the antient league and amitie continued to this day betweene our Emperour and his Maieſtie of England, and that in the time to come you ſhew your ſelues obedient and obſeruant thereunto. Which reſolution being publiſhed, they anſwered, That they were readie to obey, and to conforme themſelues to the will and command
C of their Lord. And ſo we haue from this time forward re-integrated and eſtabliſhed a Peace and League with the Engliſh nation, and do promiſe to maintain and obſerue it friendly on theſe following Conditions: That we do promiſe to ſet free all the Engliſh ſlaues which ſhall be found in our territorie of Algier; ſo that the Engliſh wil procure the libertie of thoſe Muſſulmen ſlaues taken by their ſhips: and that a man diſcreet, wiſe, and of good qualitie, may be ſent to reſide Conſull in our city, to whom wee promiſe all faire reception, honour, and courteſie; and that in any occaſion, from the part of the Engliſh any indignity or inſolencie ſhall be offered, that the ſaid Conſul ſhall reſiſt and hinder it, to auoid ſcandall, and ſhall aduiſe his Maieſtie of England, or his Embaſſadour reſiding in the Imperiall Port, and procure by all iuſt meanes, that ſuch malefactors ſhall be duely puniſhed. And if in any occaſion, D on our parts any offence or act of inſolence ſhall be committed, the ſaid Conſul ſhall make it knowne, and demand Iuſtice; we do promiſe ſeuerely to puniſh ſuch tranſgreſſors and delinquents; and for euer we will obſerue with all dutie, according to the command of our Emperour, this peace and amitie. To which Conſul and Nation there ſhall neuer be done any outrage or wrong, but rather with all courteſie and honour (as it becomes vs that all ſtrangers ſhould be protected) they ſhall be receiued, cheriſhed, and eſteemed, and there ſhall neuer to them, nor to any of their goods and faculties, by any way, by any violence, iniuſtice or iniurie offered. And that our ſhips encountring with any of theirs in the ſea, they ſhall ſalute the one the other, and ſhall ſhew all manner of courteſie and loue; and the Engliſh ſhewing their Colors that they are Engliſh, they ſhall do one to the other all friendly and acceptable E offices. And we do promiſe on our behalfes, that there ſhall neuer be done any act contrarie and preiudicial to this Peace and Faith giuen. Further, we on our owne part, and in the name of all the Souldierie and other Muſſulmen of Algier (whom God proſper) and in our owne name, as their principall Commiſſioners, do ſweare and promiſe, and do accept of theſe Articles, agreements, and contracts of friendſhip, and that our poſteritie ſhall alſo accept thereof, and that vntill the day of generall Iudgement it ſhall be thus faithfully obſerued:
That both the people and ſubiects on both ſides ſhall be free and ſecure one with the other; and that the Engliſh Merchants and their Ships, at their owne pleaſure may trauell in all parts; and as they ſafely and ſecurely go and come into euerie port or dominion of the Muſſulman Empire, ſo they ſhall now in all friendſhip come hither, and friendly and peaceably F be welcome. This their promiſe and proteſtation wee haue cauſed to be written and publiſhed. Which your Maieſties Embaſſadour accepting, and reſting therewith contented, did promiſe in your Maieſties name for the time to come, That your ſubiects ſhould obſerue the peace, and conforme themſelues to the antient Imperiall Capitulations, Articles, and termes of Amitie, maintained till this day betweene your Maieſtie and our Emperour. Who hath of vs deſired that the ſaid articles ſhould bee regiſtred, and that wee ſhould aduiſe the whole proceedings to your Maieſtie. For which cauſe we haue written this our moſt reſpectfull G letter, to giue you knowledge that this buſineſſe (by the fauour of the propitious God) is concluded with all circumſtances, ſuch as were requiſite to the antient friendſhip and faith, continued betweene your Maieſtie and our Emperour. Therefore being confident in your ſinceritie, we hope and pray your Maieſtie to be contented with the concluſion, and that by your Order you will cauſe it to be publiſhed throughout all your cities, ports, and harbours, and to euerie one of your Kingdome; that after the date of this our letter it may be knowne to all men, that this peace is renewed and ratified in behalfe of thoſe of Algier & Tunes in the ſame forme, as with all other the ſubiects and ſlaues of our Emperour; to ſay, That from henceforth there ſhall neuer be offered to the Merchants or ſubiects of your Maieſtie, either by that people or by any other Muſſelman any the leaſt trouble or iniurie: and our hope is ſuch, H that this concluſion and confirmation of peace, ſhall continue and abide firme for many and many yeares without any breach. In correſpondence whereof, there is giuen order and expreſſe Imperiall command, That all our ſubiects ſhall for euer hereafter reſpect and honor the friendſhip and amitie betweene your Maieſtie and our Emperour. And thus much wee haue thought good to ſignifie to your Maieſty: To whom from the omnipotent God, we do augure and wiſh all true felicitie, both preſent and future, both in this and the other World.

The leaſt and humble ſeruant,
Generall of the Sea, Halil.

The Captaine Baſſaes Letter to the Baſſa Aga of the Ianizaries, Collonels, Captaines, and others of Tunes, concerning the Peace.

TO the illuſtrious, and magnificent the Lord Baſſa, and to the eſteemed among his equals K
the Ianizar-Aga of Tunes, and to all the illuſtrious Collonels of the Armie, Captains of Squadrons, and Antients of the Militia, and to all the ſouldiers of Tunes, our beloued ſonnes;
To whoſe preſence hauing ſent infinite and ſincere ſalutations, our faithfull aduice is this:
Not long ſince his Maieſtie the King of England, our moſt honoured friend, hauing on purpoſe ſent his Embaſſadour with his Royall Letter to the moſt potent Emperour, giuing notice thereby of his conſtancie paſt, and firme reſolution in time to come, to maintain the peace and league with this Imperiall Port, did therewithall complaine, That for ſome yeares ſince, betweene the ſouldierie of Tunes and Algier and the ſubiects and Merchants of England, there haue happened many loſſes and diſcontents, requiring therefore that his Maieſtie, our L Emperour, ſhould giue remedie to ſuch inconueniences. His Imperiall Maieſtie inſtantly with his owne gracious Affirmo did commaund and order, and gaue diuers his Imperiall commands, which were ſent vnto you by our Capigi Baſſa, Mehemet Aga; which being publiquely read, you all vnitely gaue anſwer, That you were readie and diſpoſed to obey and obſerue the will and command of our Lord, and that you would neuer hereafter vſe, or ſhew any enmitie, or make any quarrell with the ſaid Engliſh Nation; yet notwithſtanding, ſince, you haue ſent two of your citie in companie with thoſe ſent from Algier with order to attend our aduiſe and reſolution. For which your promptneſſe and obedience ſhewed, we pray Almightie M God alwaies to keepe you in his protection, and to giue you honour and victorie; and his Imperiall Maieſtie doth bleſſe you, as we alſo doe ſend you our benediction. Therefore now my beloued ſonnes, know yee, That this buſineſſe by the order of his Maieſtie was

by

A by vs treated and concluded; and the abſolute will and command of our Emperour, is, That as well you of Tunes, as thoſe of Algier, all whoſoeuer for the time to come ſhall liue in quiet with the Engliſh Nation, and ſhall keepe with them a ſincere peace and amitie, and their ſhips either comming to any Port of our Dominion, or going to any other Port, their merchants, faculties, and goods, ſhall paſſe quietly without any moleſtation, dammage, or iniurie done by you; and that you for euer keepe with them a true peace and correſpondencie, it being a matter ſo cleere, that your are many waies obliged to obey the will and order of your Lord, eſpecially ſeeing it is not onely the will and pleaſure of his Maieſtie, but of the whole B Empire, Gouernors and Miniſters with vs. It therefore behooueth you hereafter to liue in peace and friendſhip with the ſaid Engliſh Nation, as you haue done in times paſt, and ſo to proceed in all occaſions with them, that neither from you nor them there may be giuen any the leaſt cauſe of diſtaſte. But rather that you vſe all courteſie towards them, and to all their ſhips which ſhall come vnto the Ottoman Empire. Further, what Engliſh Slaues ſoeuer are found in your Iuriſdiction, you ſhall giue them libertie, and deale with them in ſuch manner in all things, as there may be no more occaſion to write you new Commands. Moreouer, we vnderſtand, that ſince the receit of the mentioned Imperiall Letters and C Commands, and after you had promiſed obedience, and made an Order, That from that time you would not do any act contrary thereunto; notwithſtanding, our Captain Sampſon, not far from Modon meeting with an Engliſh ſhip, did take and make her prize: But our Capigi Baſſa Mahomet Aga returning that way, cauſed him to reſtore the ſaid ſhip: but the ſaid Sampſon tooke ſeuen or eight Engliſh men, and carried them away, with promiſe to ſet them free at Tunes. Which action after the peace was concluded (or whether afore or after) at the arriuall of this our letter, you ſhall reſtore to libertie all the ſaid Engliſh men. And further know yee, that I haue written my Letter to his Maieſtie the King of England, aduiſing him of the Accord, Articles, and concluſion of amitie made and confirmed by D vs, and haue giuen his Maieſtie our aſſurance for you, of a ſincere peace and friendſhip. Therefore, my Sonnes, take heed to the obſeruation of this Concluſion and Accord made, that it may abide conſtant and inuiolate. And ſo wee reſt praying.

The Captaine Baſſa's Letter to the Dye of Tunes, in behalfe of the Peace, &c.

To the Magnificent, famous, renowned, and eſteemed Iſuph Dye, whoſe honour the Lord encreaſe. Hauing ſent you infinite ſalutations, you ſhall know, That by the fauour of God wee are in health, and that we hope not to be forgotten in your prayers. Not long ſince wee hauing ſent vnto you our beloued Mahomet Aga our Capigi Baſſa, with diuers Imperiall and expreſſe Commands, in the which it was ordered, That for the time to come you ſhould remaine and liue with the F Engliſh Nation in peace and amitie; it hath beene made knowne vnto vs, that you haue obeyed and accepted the ſaid Imperiall commands, and haue concluded, eſtabliſhed, and confirmed a Peace and League with the ſaid Nation: for which your readineſſe and affection, and loyall proceeding demonſtrated in this affaire, and in all other occaſions, the Lord the Embaſſadour of England, reſident in this happie Port, hath oftentimes before vs declared the great ſatiſfaction and content receiued from you in that your ſincere dealing : and it being that now lately we haue confirmed and ratified the ſaid G Peace and amitie, and raſed out all the paſt differences and contracts betweene vs and the ſaid Engliſh nation; we haue thought fit to write you this our preſent letter : And our truſt is in you, that for the time to come you will take order, that this our Concluſion and accord ſhall be duely maintained and obſerued, and that from you and none of yours ſhall euer be done any wrong or violence whatſoeuer vnto the ſaid Engliſh Nation, their Merchants, ſhips, or faculties, but that for euer you will reſt and keepe with them a good and fitme peace and friendſhip; and to this end we doe eſpecially recommend to your care, That to the Engliſh there may neuer be done iniurie nor iniuſtie. Wee haue beene further aduiſed that ſince the arriuall of the ſaid Imperiall commands, you hauing concluded and promiſed peace, one Captaine Sampſon neere Modon, hath taken an Engliſh ſhip and carried away ſome of the Engliſh priſoners. Therefore we aduiſe you, that without delay or any excuſe, you H cauſe them to be ſet at libertie, and that for the time to come, you take care, to honor protect and defend the ſaid Nation in your liberties : Not other occurring, we reſt,

The Captaine Baſſaes Letter to the Baſſa of Algier, to the Ianizar-Aga, and the chieſe of the Armie. I

To the magnificent and illuſtrious Lord the Baſſa, to whoſe noble preſence infinite ſalutations, and to the renowned and famous among his equals the Ianizar-Aga of Algier, to the Collonels of foot, Captaines of ſquadrons, and Antients of the Armie; and in generall to all the well deſeruing our companions, and other ſouldiers, whoſe proſperitie we wiſh. After our ſalutations we giue you to vnderſtand, That whereas the King of England, hath of long time beene a ſincere obſeruer of the peace and amitie with this Imperiall Port, and that of late yeres betweene the ſouldierie of Algier and Tunes and his ſubiects, there haue happened many deſſentions, troubles, and loſſes, his Maieſtie of England hath ſent his Embaſſadour with his Royall Letter to this Imperiall Port, complaining of K the depredations, iniuries, and ſpoyles, done to his people by you the ſouldiers of Algier; and hath deſired that his highnes our Emperor, ſhould command, that you ſhould deſiſt to commit the like outrages, that the peace might be renued and confirmeda on both parts: In conformitie wherof, his Imperial Maieſtie our Lord, with his owne Royall Signature hath giuen diuers Imperiall commands, which not long ſince were ſent vnto you by the eſteemed Capigi Baſſi Mahomet Aga, which order being read in the publique councell, and the will and pleaſure of our emperor fully conceiued, you haue ſeemed to ſhew all obedience and reuerence to the Imperiall commands, but withall haue anſwered, That we hauing receiued and ſuffered many and great loſſes and wrongs from the Engliſh Nation, doe deſire to informe his Imperiall Maieſtie of euery particular, which being heard in all dutie we will conforme L our ſelues to his good pleaſure and command. For which end, you haue among your ſelues elected the wiſe and eſteemed lord the prouincial Mufti named Seich Seidi, and the prudent the Mufti of your Citie, Seich Salim, and the two Caddees Iudges of the Court; and two lately Gouernours among you; two Collonels of foot, two Captaines of ſquadrons, and two, of the Antients of your armie, aſſiſted with other perſons graue and diſcreet; whom together with the ſaid Mahomet you haue ſent to this high Port, whoſe arriuall being made knowne vnto his Maieſtie our Emperour, and relation made how by the aſſiſtance of God, after a combate of three daies, you haue taken from the enemies of our Law, a ſhip of ſeuen deckes, in greatneſſe like vnto a mountaine; in which veſſell you haue found two Gentlemen, young and worthie to ſerue in this Imperiall Court, whom you haue preſented hither : and that day and night with all your induſtrie you doe indeauour the honour and exaltation M of the Imperiall Maieſtie; the ſaid Muſſulmen your brethren by you deputed, haue beene receiued with honour to haue touched with their eyes the euer victorious ſtirrop of his Imperiall Maieſtie: in regard whereof, his Highneſſe (whom God alwaies proſper) hath ſent you his benediction, and wee alſo doe pray, that in this and in the next World, you be full of honour, and that our Prophet may grant you glorie, and victorie ouer all the enemies of our faith; and be aſſured, That in the light and darkneſſe

A darkeneſſe, we will not ceaſe to beſeech the diuine Maieſtie, to exalt the glory of our Muſſulman law, and to giue it triumph and encreaſe. Which ceremonies paſſed, the differences alſo betweene you and the Engliſh Nation, haue been certified to his Imperiall Maieſtie; who, together with his abſolute Miniſter, the grand Vizier, haue commanded vs, and ordained that this cauſe ſhould before vs be diſcuſſed, and by vs compounded and decided. To which end we haue deſired the preſence of the Embaſſador of England, reſident in this happy Port, and called before vs the aboue mentioned Mufties, and the others your Procurators: of whom we hauing firſt demanded (his Maieſtie of England being in peace and amitie with this happy Port) what hath beene the cauſe of ſo many iniuries and wrongs done from you; they anſwered, That, Whereas for ſome yeares ſince wee haue liued in good friendſhip with the Engliſh nation, and their Merchants did come and traffique freely B in our Ports, and from vs they neuer receiued the leaſt wrong, an Engliſh Ship in Alexandria did take in diuers Muſſulmen Pilgrims, deceiuing them with faire promiſes to tranſport them to Algier; of whom ſome they landed vpon a deſart Iſland, where they periſhed with cold and hunger, and the reſt they carried and ſold in Malta, and in other places. After this, another of their Ships riding in the Port at Algier, and we ſending aboord one of the Captaines of our Bands, in companie of the Engliſh Conſul, to make ſearch according to vſance, they threw the officer ouer boord (the Conſul making eſcape:) and ſetting ſaile for another of our Ports called Bigia, did take priſoner the Captaine of the caſtle, two of his ſonnes, and diuers other Muſſulmen, and made them ſlaues, and after ſold them to the Spaniards or Florentines. Since againe a third Engliſh Ship anchoring in our Port, tooke aboord diuers our paſſengers C to tranſport them to Tituan, whom they betrayed and ſold in our enemies countries. In ſum, we perceiuing the Engliſh had broken the peace with vs many wayes, and that dayly we ſuffered many loſſes and iniuries by them, and that they apprehended all opportunitie to do damage to the Muſſulman Empire, declaring themſelues our foes, and hauing recalled their commerce and Conſul from vs, we were enforced to maintaine the honour of the Muſſulman law, and to reuenge our ſelues. Hauing heard this their anſwer, we then demanded of the Embaſſador, My Lord, ſeeing his Maieſtie of England hath euer been a friend of this Empire, how comes it to paſſe that the Engliſh ſubiects haue done ſo many ſpoyles and wrongs to the inhabitants of Algier, the ſlaues of our Emperour. Who replied; Our intent and purpoſe with the Imperiall Port hath neuer been otherwiſe than peace and commerce; but the great iniuries, rob- D beries, and murthers committed by you of Algier, vpon the ſubiects, merchants, and fiſhermen of the King my maſter, are both innumerable and inſupportable: How many and many of our ſhips haue you vniuſtly betrayed? how many of our nation haue you vpon aduantage killed and inchained? For theſe calumnies which you haue mentioned, That we by deceit haue taken your Pilgrims and ſold them; you ſhall know, that all thoſe that take the Engliſh Colours are not Engliſh men, but mingled of all nations; nor were they ſubiects of my king, but theeues and villaines, fugitiue people, nouriſhed vp by you, which vnder the Croſſe of England, for credit perhaps, haue done ſuch iniuries, certainely without the conſent and knowledge of vs: and if they had returned, and had beene accuſed, the iuſtice of his Maieſtie would haue ſeuerely puniſhed them. Mention not therefore Pirats, but name mee E one man a Merchant, or ſubiect dwelling in his Maieſties obedience, that hath done you any wrong. But you your ſelues with your owne ſhips now riding in your Port, what thefts and ſpoyles haue you not committed vpon our barques, goods, and men, whereſoeuer you haue met them? How can you anſwer this? Your Commiſſioners replied; Your ſhips and veſſels dayly lade the goods and faculties of the Spaniards, enemies of vs and our Law; protecting and defending both them and their lading from vs: which is ſufficient cauſe for vs to make prize of thoſe that aſſiſt our aduerſaries. But we ſeeing this diſcourſe to grow into heate and length, did interpoſe; The will and abſolute command of our Emperour is, That whatſoeuer is paſt ſhall be forgotten, and that peace and friendſhip ſhall be renewed and eſtabliſhed. And ſo we giue you to vnderſtand by this our preſent letter, That we haue concluded the Peace and F amitie in this forme: To ſay, That from henceforward, conformable to the times paſt, the friendſhip and commerce betweene the Engliſh nation and you of Algier and Tunes ſhall be renewed, and that neuer from you of thoſe ports, ſhall be done any violence or wrong to the Engliſh nation: And as at this preſent the Engliſh, their Merchants, and others, do ſafely aud ſecurely go and come through all the parts of this Muſſulman Empire, in like manner they ſhall come and go into all the territorie of Algier and Tunes, without any moleſtation, oppreſſion, or violence whatſoeuer : And that for the time to come, the Engliſh Nation may ſend a Conſul to Algier, a perſon diſcreet, prudent, and of G eſteeme, whom you ſhall receiue with all courteſie ; and that happening any action contrary or preiudiciall to this Peace, you ſhall aduiſe the ſaid Conſul, who ſhall doe his endeauour to preuent all offence, or at leaſt ſhall certifie his Maieſtie of England, or his Embaſſadour reſident at this happy Port; to the end that in all occaſions future miſchiefes may be auoided. To which Conſull you ſhall conſigne all the ſlaues of the Engliſh Nation, which ſhall be found in Algier and Tunes, with a liſt of their names : And likewiſe you ſhall make a liſt of the names of all the Muſſulmen ſlaues taken by the Engliſh ſhips, and ſhall giue the ſame vnto the Conſull, who ſhall ſend it to his Maieſtie of England, that he may procure their libertie. And for the time to come, the ſhips of both ſides great and ſmall, meeting in the ſeas, ſhall ſalute one the other ; and the Engliſh ſhewing the Colours of Engliſh men, and making the ſigne of friendſhip, you ſhall ſhew mutually all courteſie, and performe all H good offices which may encreaſe this good Peace and correſpondence, without offering any the leaſt iniurie one to the other : And that hereafter there ſhall neuer be any thing done contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulations ; but that you ſhall on your parts day and night endeauour the augmentation of this good friendſhip. And the Engliſh ſhips ſhall not lade the armes and faculties of our enemies, nor in the time to come defend nor protect them. And if any ſhall do the contrary, ſuch perſons ſhall be out of protection, and ſubiect to puniſhment, without preiudice to this Peace and friendſhip, which ſhall abide firme and ſtable. And if any quarrell ſhall happen contrarie to this agreement made, that in like manner the peace ſhall not be broken, but the authors of ſuch diſturbance ſhall be duely puniſhed:

And if ſuch offence or iniurie ſhall proceed from any of the ſubiects of Algier, that you the officers I ſhall immediately giue ſeuere puniſhment : And if the offence ſhall be committed by any of the ſubiects of England, it ſhall preſently be certified to the Engliſh Conſul, that he may do or procure the like iuſtice. And that after the regiſtring of this renouation and confirmation of treatie, there ſhall be a man ſent to his Maieſtie of England with our letters, to the end that his Maieſtie may command and publiſh through all the ports and harbours of his Kingdomes, That this Peace is firmely publiſhed and aſſured; That as both his Merchants and all other paſſengers for the time to come may ſafely and freely traffique and trauell throughout all the ports of the Muſſulman territorie; ſo they may come and go at their pleaſure to the Ports of Algier and Tunes, and in their way they ſhall neuer be moleſted or troubled. And being now that we haue concluded this buſineſſe vpon theſe conditions and Articles, which are accepted, and promiſed to be obſerued on both parts ; it ſeemed neceſſarie to K vs, and we haue written and aduiſed you of all circumſtances by this our preſent and friendly letter ; to the end you, the Beglerbegh, Ianizari-Aga, and all the Colonels, Captaines, and Antients of the Armie, our beloued Sonnes, might know that this affaire hath beene diſtinctly made knowne to his Maieſtie our Emperour : As alſo, that when Bachi Baſſa was at Algier, diuers Engliſh Ships with ſome Spaniards came before your port, and attempted to burne your Fleet. Of this and of euery particular his Maieſty hath bin fully informed: But now ſeeing the Engliſh hath ſhewed all promptneſſe on their part to maintaine with you the like peace and amitie as they do with all the ſubiects of the Muſſulman Empire ; it behoooueth that you cancell all that is paſt, and according as his Maieſtie our Emperour hath expreſſely commanded, That the generall Peace ſhould be eſtabliſhed and confirmed according to the antient cuſtome betweene you and the Engliſh Nation ; I ſay, my deere ſonnes, L and you are bound, conformable to the will and pleaſure of our Lord, to vſe all courteſie and kindneſſe to the ſaid Engliſh, and neuer to offer any the leaſt wrong to their Ships or Merchants, but to obſerue firmely this Peace and amitie, that it may neuer be diſturbed or broken. And ſeeing it is knowne to all, that the Engliſh Nation is ſincere friend to this Imperiall Port, it is your dutie, and reaſon requireth, that all the Slaues and ſubiects of this Empire ſhould be their friends. Inſomuch that this our Letter arriuing, take you heed that you ſhew no contrarietie or backwardneſſe, but according to the tenour written, that you reſt in quiet, and vſe all your diligence and care to preuent euery occaſion and action inconuenient and preiudiciall. And let it be knowne vnto you of certaintie, That it is the will of the Emperour and of vs : and we do deſire, that hereafter there may be no contraſt or diſcord with the Engliſh Nation, but that you alway obſerue according to this our Treatie now written to M you, and that you giue no more occaſion to write you new Commands. Therefore receiue our benediction; that is, The iuſt and great God keepe you in the Imperiall protection, and grant you victorie ouer all our enemies, and giue you conſtancie and ſinceritie towards our friends ; of which, ſeeing the Engliſh Nation hath alway made demonſtration, certainly it is inconuenient to repay them with iniuſtice.

A iuſtice. Briefely, we recommend vnto you, That you vſe all diligence and endeauour, not to tranſgreſſe this Order: for we hauing made promiſe for you, ſhall receiue great ſhame and diſhonour, And hauing been both mediator and concluder of this buſineſſe, it behooueth you to obey and obſerue, according to the true and ſincere Tenour.

Generall of the Sea, Halil.

The Engliſh Embaſſadours Letter to the Dye of Tunes.

TO the renowned and famous Iſuph Dye, Captaine Generall of all the ſouldiers of Tunes, health and friendly ſalutations. We haue found by good experience, that the honour and fame we haue heard reported of you, hath beene grounded vpon your merits and worthineſſe; and wee are hereof extreamely gled, that a buſineſſe of ſo great conſequence as the Peace betweene mighty Princes, is committed to a ſouldier, a man that regards his honour and word. Which vertues we hauing experienced in you, we cannot chuſe but acknowledge; and do promiſe, that both here, and in all parts
C of the world we will publiſh your name and renowne, as worthy of true honour. Firſt, wee giue you thankes for the courteſie ſhewed to a young man ſent by vs with the Imperiall commands; and for the friendſhip you ſhewed to our Nation, in giuing libertie to ſome poore men, which his Maieſtie my Maſter doth take in good part, and as a ſigne of your loue. We alſo acknowledge your readineſſe to procure the ſealing of the Peace, made here at the Imperiall Port: But withall we deſire you not to ſeeke a quarrell by pretending to ſearch our Ships: You are a Souldier, and know the termes of honour;
you know alſo that our Nation are ſouldiers, and valiant men, who will not be ſubiect to any ſuch diſgrace. This point hath largely beene diſputed at the Port, and reaſon on both ſides urged; wherein it is made manifeſt, that the Captaine of the ſea of this Empire challengeth no ſuch priuiledge, nor can we ſuffer ſo great indignitie. If therefore you intend to keepe peace with vs (of which D we doubt not) we deſire you in all friendly manner to accept of the ſame Articles which are agreed with the Commiſsioners of Algier, ſigned by your friend the moſt noble Halil Baſſa, Generall of the ſea, and ſent as ſecuritie for you to his Royall Maieſtie my Maſter; the Copies of all which we haue ſent you: deſiring you to confirme them, and to conſigne them to William Cooke our Deputie Conſul, vntill we haue further aduice out of England; from whence we doe promiſe you to ſend graue and diſcreet men to liue among you, and to bring you the trade and commodities of our Countrey, whereby you and your citie ſhall haue more profit than by a warre with vs. We therefore truſt and hope in your worth, that you will cauſe this Peace to be publiſhed, which is made by generall conſent of the grand Seigniour and all his Miniſters; and that there may be no occaſion giuen by your Souldiers to ſeeke a quarrell with vs, which in the end will cauſe an vtter breach betweene his Maieſtie
E my Lord, and this Imperiall Port; which you in your wiſedome will auoid: and be aſſured, that on our parts all ſinceritie ſhall be vſed; nor ſhall you haue any doubt, that we will any way, by any aſſiſtance with your enemies, breake the antient Capitulations. Wee are bound to giue you further thankes for the great iuſtice done by you, in giuing order to recouer ſome part of the goods of a deceaſed Engliſh Merchant in your City, and that you haue cauſed neere fifteene hundred Checquines to be repayed to William Cooke. Not doubting but you will continue the like fauour; and be pleaſed to heare the further reaſons of the ſaid William Cooke, and to take order that the reſt may alſo be recouered; it being apparant and true, that there yet is wanting two thouſand Checquines, which the Deceaſed had in money and goods. This worke is acceptable to God, and honourable to you, and it will encourage our Merchants to liue vnder your protection, to encreaſe the friendſhip made betweene F vs.

Our laſt requeſt is, That you will ſet at libertie, for my ſake, our poore Countreymen, according to promiſe made by you and the Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour. Thoſe ſlaues will honour you abroad, and pray for you when you are at home, their parents, wiues, children, and friends. Wherein we will endeauour to procure the libertie of any of yours, to our vttermoſt power. And that you will warne an enemie to the peace, one Sampſon, to deliuer backe the goods and men lately taken at Modon, ſince the Peace concluded: which if he refuſe to do, I ſhall finde means to reuenge it vpon him. G In concluſion, I deſire you to accept of this young man, onely ſent to deliuer you our Letters, and to carry newes to England of your friendſhip; deſiring you to diſpeed him away in two dayes, that hee may the ſooner procure from England ſome ſhipping to come in trade to your Port. And ſo I commit you to the protection of the Almightie God, wiſhing to the honourable Gouernor and Captaine Iſuph Dye, all true happineſſe.

From your friend, The Embaſſadour of England.

The Commands ſent to Algier and Tunes by a Capigi of the Grand Seigniour, in companie of Iſerug the new Baſſa of Algier.

[Written by the Grand Segniors owne hand:]

In conformitie hereof let it be obeyed of all my Subiects. I

To the Diuan of Algier.

THe Imperiall Command; To the Caddee of Algier, to all the Doctors and Churchmen, to all the Captaines of Iſuph; to all the Commanders, Elders, and Officers; to all the Heads and Antients, and to all the Souldierie of Algier, and my ſlaues there inhabiting: At the arriuall of the high and Imperiall Affirmo, you ſhall know; That whereas from the times of happie memorie of my Grandfathers and Fathers (entred into mercie, whoſe Sepulchres let God glorifie) vnto this K day, alwayes the Kings of England haue with all ſinceritie beene in good peace and friendſhip with this high Port and all my Anceſtors; and therfore the Imperiall mind & will always hath bin, That according to the Imperiall Capitulations contracted at the firſt Treaty betweene both parties, That the ſubiects and Engliſh Merchants might freely and ſecurely go and come into all parts of this well gouerned Empire; and that they ſhould neuer be troubled, hindered, nor damnified by any man, and that the ſaid Engliſh with all their Ships ſhould haue ſafe and ſecure paſſage in the ſea, vnder the Imperiall protection, and to their hearts content and quietneſſe they ſhould follow their trades and merchandiſe; and whereas in all times paſt there was neuer done vnto them any wrong or dammage by any of our ſubiects: you my ſlaues of Algier, or ſome of you, not reſpecting the friendſhip of L thoſe with whom the high Port hath peace and correſpondence, do whereſoeuer you meet their Ships, either in the ſea, or iny port or harbour, take them and all their goods, doing them many iniuries and violences; and contrarie alſo to the Imperiall Capitulations, do make them ſlaues, and many others you kill: for which your actions ſo iniuſt, contrary to the Imperiall will and Capitulations not long ſince in the time of our brother Sultan Oſman Han (now in mercie placed in Paradiſe) his Maieſty the King of England hauing ſent his expreſſe Embaſſadour, and his Royall Letter, aduiſing him of the wrongs and ſpoyles (ſo contrarie to the League and Peace contracted, and the Imperiall will) committed by you: to the end that all you ſhould obey, and with all diligence, care, and reſpect, ſhould maintaine and obſerue the peace and friendſhip with all the friends of the high Port; that all thoſe who had committed ſuch actions, ſo contrary to the Imperiall will and Capitulations, ſhould be puniſhed; M the ſaid our brother did then ſend you his expreſſe Imperiall Commands, ſigned with his hand; which was deliuered vnto you by one Mutafaraga of the high Port, called Mahomet, whoſe dignitie God encreaſe. Which Commands being read in the preſence of you all, euery man did anſwer, ſaying, You were ready to obey the Order and Commands of your Lord; but that you had ſome particulars requiſite to be preſented to the Imperiall ſtirrop, and therefore that you did elect certaine of the principall

A cipall of your Countrey, and ſent them hither to him as your Procurators: who being arriued in the time of the regiment of my honourable Vncle, and hauing made knowne at the foot of the Throne of his Maieſtie, all thoſe your reaſons which you had giuen in inſtruction; He gaue command, that thoſe ſaid Commiſsioners, come hither in your behalfe, with the Embaſſadour of England reſident in our happy Port, ſhould haue a conference in the preſence of my late Vizier Halil, then Captaine Baſſa; and that all things there ſhould be accommodated and appeaſed. Which conference being made in the preſcribed forme, there all your grieuances were largely repeated to the end, that by reaſon of the aboue mentioned inconueniences, there ſhould not happen any breach of the antient Peace and friendſhip, all matters were then anew pacified, and by writing and new treaty accorded, That according to the antient cuſtome there ſhould be ſent an Engliſh Conſul to Algier and Tunes, and that their B Merchants ſhould ſafely and friendly go thither, and into all other parts of this well gouerned Empire, and traffique in all ports thereof, and that they ſhould neuer hereafter be any way hindered, offended, or moleſted by any of you; and for more caution and aſſurance, there being written an authenticall Letter, ſent vnto the King of England, he gaue order and hath appointed a Conſul with many rich merchandiſes arriued in thoſe ports. Which my ſaid Vncle did alſo then ſend you his expreſſe Command, That you ſhould obſerue all the ſaid Agreement. But now being newly aduertiſed, That you my ſlaues of Algier, who wholly contrary to the laſt promiſe, contract, and faith giuen, doe get, take, and ſpoyle all the Engliſh Ships that you meet on the ſea, robbing them of their goods, and making ſlaues of their men, doing them all wrong and damage; and conſidering the King of England is conſtant and ſincere in his Peace and League with vs, and that the protection and cheriſhing of his C ſubiects is neceſſarie vnto vs; and that for you of Algier, or other of my Beghs whoſoeuer, to take veſſels, goods, or men from the ſaid Engliſh Nation, ſo contrarie to the laſt Agreement made, and faith giuen, is a thing much againſt our will and the Imperiall Capitulations by vs granted; and alſo it being our will, that betweene you and them there ſhould be a good peace and correſpondence, and that the ſaid Engliſh Nation may ſafely and ſecurely traffique in all parts of this our well gouerned Empire, and that no man preſume to do them any damage or iniurie, and that for the time to come the tenour of our Imperiall Capitulations in their Land may be duely obſerued, We haue ſent you this our Imperiall Command, and We do command you,

That euery one of you, of what condition ſoeuer, do obey according to the tenour of this my Impe-riall Command, ſent you on purpoſe for this onely reaſon; That whether by ſea, or in any other place D where you ſhall meet any Ship of the Engliſh, their people or goods, you do vnto them no violence or wrong whatſoeuer; but alway according to the Capitulations giuen them, and the laſt treaty and agreement made with you, that you hold and keepe a true peace and friendſhip with them; and alſo that you obey according to the commandements formerly ſent to you in this buſineſſe; and that you neuer do nor ſuffer to be done any act contrarie vnto them, but that you with all diligence obſerue and obey this my Command ſent you: in doing whereof you ſhall obtaine our fauor and benediction. And ſeeing according to the agreement made betweene you, there were diuers ſlaues ſet free and ſent vnto you from England, you alſo ſhall ſet free all thoſe Engliſh ſlaues that ſhall be found in your hands, and ſhall conſigne them to the Engliſh Conſul. And that whereas the Ship of England which was ſent vnto you with diuers Engliſh goods, hauing been diſcharged, and receiuing your ſafe conduct, E and returning to their Countrey, being met by ſome of Algier, who had no reſpect to the accord and faith giuen, they did take both the Ship and goods, and make the men ſlaues: therefore that act being very contrarie to our louing peace and friendſhip, you ſhall deliuer the ſaid ſhip and goods and men to the Engliſh Conſul; and take heed you do not herein ſhew diſobedience to our command, and that thoſe whoſoeuer, who haue been ſo bold to commit ſuch an offence ſo contrary to the Peace and faith giuen, you ſhall cauſe to be ſeuerely puniſhed. In concluſion, know you, that in no caſe it is our Imperiall will, that the ſaid Engliſh Nation hereafter ſhall be any way troubled or damnified, ſo contrarie to our Imperiall Capitulation. Therefore let euery one of you be admoniſhed, That according as it is written in our Law, ſaying, Obey the Lord God, the Prophet, and the Emperor; that thereby obeying you ſhall obtaine my bleſsing; you ſhall neuer conſent nor permit that any thing F be done contrarie to my Imperiall will: for if hereafter it ſhall be made knowne vnto vs, that the ſaid Engliſh Nation ſhall be againe outraged and iniuried by you, be aſſured that euery one of you ſhall fall into my indignation and diſgrace, and you ſhall be puniſhed with all ſeueritie. Therefore be you aduertiſed, that the obeying of my Imperiall Command ſhall be vnto you an aſſurance and ornament both of glorie and felicitie; and hauing my benediction, euery one of you vndoubtedly ſhall obtaine happineſſe in this world, and glory in the world to come, and you ſhall enioy all your deſires. Then you my ſlaues of Algier, according to the tenor of this my Command ſent you, be you friends with the Engliſh ſincerely and perfectly, and do you entirely obſerue the Peace and League, and vſe kindely the Engliſh Conſul among you; and protect and defend their Merchants, and whether by ſea or in port you ſhall meet any of their Ships, ſhew vnto them all friendſhip, and omit no occaſion to aid, defend, and to ſhew loue vnto them: and this our Imperial Command, both of the arriual, and in what ſort you haue accepted and obeyed it, and in what forme you haue eſtabliſhed the Peace, and reſented my will and Command, you ſhall aduiſe the whole by your anſwer vnto our high Port. And thus let it be knowne vnto you, giuing alway credit vnto our Imperiall Signature.

To the Baſſa of Algier.

THe high and Jmperiall Affirmo being arriued, you ſhall know, Whereas in times paſt the Gouernours in that Prouince before you, by receiuing the fifts and tenths of the ſhips, goods, and men, which the Souldierie of Algier did take and rob from the Engliſh Nation, and by giuing them leaue and authority to do ſuch depredations & acts, ſo contrary to the Jmperiall Capitulations, the ſaid ſouldiers haue taken ſo much boldneſſe and daring, that they continue to do innumerable ſpoyles and violences vnto the ſayd Engliſh Nation: which their inſolent actions being made knowne vnto the high Port, and there was inſtantly written and ſent vnto them expreſſe and Imperiall Commands, That in no way, nor by no meanes it was not the will nor Imperiall minde, that the Gouernours ſhould in ſuch ſort conniue, and ſo euidently (contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulations) ſhould take any fifts or tenths, nor giue nor permit any licence vnto the ſaid ſoldiers, to do ſo iniuſt things; but that in this particular they ſhould do all their diligence and loue, and that they ſhould neuer take any fifts or tenths of the goods of the ſaid Engliſh, ſtollen by the ſaid ſoldiers, nor that they ſhould permit vpon no pretence, that the Engliſh ſhips, goods, and men, ſo contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulations, ſhould be neither by them nor any other, outraged, moleſted, or damnified; and that if hereafter it ſhould be knowne, that the ſaid Gouernours ſhould notwithſtanding anew haue taken & accepted the fifts & tenths of the ſhips, goods, or Engliſhmen, robbed and taken by the ſaid Souldierie, and becauſe they haue conſented and ſuffered the Souldierie to do ſuch depredations, wrong, and ſpoyles, and for hauing alſo beene the cauſe to violate the Peace, League, and friendſhip betweene vs and the King of England; that as faulty guilty men they ſhould be condignely puniſhed. Now being that we are anew confirmed, if that the Souldiers do not obey the ſaid Commands and Orders ſent by vs, and that by you the Gouernors there is leaue giuen them to continue in their iniuſt courſe of robberie and oppreſſion, and that ſtill you do take the ſaid fifts and tenths, and that you proceed in violating of the Jmperiall Capitulations; Know you, That you are fallen into our diſgrace, being it is in no ſort our Imperiall will, that the ſaid Engliſh Nation ſhould be ſo damnified and outraged. And to the end that all the Commands giuen and ſent into thoſe parts for this buſines, may be obſerued and obeyed, and that herafter by no means there may neuer be giuen nor permitted any libertie to the ſaid Soldiers to do the like depredations vpon the ſaid Nation, and that neuer you nor any after you, do neuer take any fift nor tenth, nor any part, but that alway the ſaid Nation ſhould be protected and defended, We haue giuen this our Imperiall Commandement, and we do command,

That when this ſhall be arriued, you ſhall obſerue and do according to this our high and

A Imperiall Command; onely giuen for this reaſon, and alſo in conformitie of the former Commands ſent in this buſineſſe: which you ſhall obey with all diligence and care; and that you ſhall neuer take nor accept any fift nor other ſhare, of the ſhips, goods, or men, that the Souldiers of Algier ſhall ſo vniustly take (contrarie to our Imperiall Capitulations) from the ſaid Engliſh Nation: nor neuer hereafter ſhall giue leaue, nor ſuffer, that the Souldiers, ſo contrarie to my will and Imperiall Capitulations, ſhall do ſuch ſpoyles and depredations to the ſaid Engliſh Nation; and that in no caſe you ſhall neuer permit that Engliſhmen ſhall be there ſold, but you ſhall alway protect and defend them. And know of certaintie, B That if after the arriuall of this our Command, we ſhall vnderstand, that the ſaid Nation ſhall be anew outraged and iniuried, no excuſe from you ſhall be accepted nor heard; and not onely you ſhall be depriued of your gouernment, but you ſhall be ſeuerely puniſhed. Therefore be aduiſed, and take heed that you commit no act that ſhall be contrary to my will and Imperiall Capitulations giuen to the ſaid Nation. And in concluſion, take you order that all my ſlaues of Algier may keepe peace and friendſhip with the ſaid Engliſh; becauſe it is my Imperiall deſire, that the ſaid Nation and their Merchants may come, go, and traffique in all parts of our Empire. Therefore do you do all your diligence and endeauour, and to ſee that the Peace be ſetled with the ſaid Engliſh, and take heed that you commit no negligence C nor errour whatſoeuer. And thus be it knowne vnto you, giuing alway faith to our Imperiall Signature.

The like three ſeuerall Commands, onely ſome circumſtances altered, according to the requiſites of the place, were written and ſent to the Dye, and Baſſa, and Diuan of Tunes.

This Peace thus concluded and promulged, was well and exactly obſerued for fiue yeres, and not one Engliſh ſhip aſſayled or taken, and at leaſt ſix hundred Mariners, ſubiects of his Maieſtie, releaſed from a miſerable ſeruitude and captiuitie: vntill a ſmall offence was done to them, which they eaſily apprehended, to renew their deſire of ſpoyle, by which only they D liue, as being a people without induſtrie or traffique; there being but one way to maintaine a Peace with them who are glad of any occaſion of warre, not to begin, not to vnbinde their hands; for the ſoule of Wiſedome is Preuention. And ſo wee proceed to our generall Storie.

Ali Baſſa the great Vizier beheaded.

On the foure and twentieth of March Ali Baſſa the great Vizier was ſent for into the Seraglio; where being queſtioned by the young Emperour about the affaires of the Perſian inuaſion, he was condemned inſtantly to loſe his head, which was executed in the place, and his body throwne out naked into the ſtreets. The occaſion of his ſudden death was attributed to his diſſimulation with the Grand Seigniour in the loſſe of Babylon, and that he had ſuborned E falſe aduice that there was no ſuch matter; either for ſloath, or feare to take vpon him the charge of the war, with an army that would not obey in the Citie: and the baſe mony which he had cauſed to be coyned, being but one fift ſiluer, with which hee made a whole payment to the Souldierie, putting the good dollars into his owne purſe. But indeed the true cauſe was his owne ſordid couetouſneſſe, who in ſix moneths had heaped vp an infinite treaſure, by ſale of all Iuſtice and Offices; which in the end weighed him downe to the ground, and ſupplied (like a large ſpunge) their preſent wants for the intended warre in Aſia. To this dignitie was aduanced Cerques Mechemet Baſſa, an antient Vizier, a man of an honeſt and ſincere nature, and one too good for thoſe times; who after he had enioyed his place but a ſhort while, laboured to ſurrender it, as vnable to ſupport or content the inſolencie of the Spahies F in their vnreaſonable demands of impoſſible benefits. In the meane time the preparation for the war in Aſia was aduanced, though the reſolution to ſet forward was deferred, vpon hope that by the authoritie of Cherques Mehemet Baſſa and other new Miniſters, Abaſſa Baſſa might be reduced to obedience, and that great feare and impediment remoued, they hauing vndertaken to endeauour it: though it appeared very difficult, being that he yet continued the ſiege of Angria; and that his ſcattered armie that wintered abroad begun to returne to him from all parts, he would be loth (although the Grand Seignior had ſent him another) to truſt his G life vpon a pardon.

The Emperour prepares for a war in Hungarie.

While the Grand Seigniour was thus threatened in Aſia with the King of Perſia and his owne Rebell Abaſſa Baſſa, the Emperour of Germanie made great preparations for Hungarie, to the number of fiftie thouſand men, which bred great iealouſie at the Port: but his Embaſſadour the Baron of Carey, lately arriued, to preuent a generall breach, and the expiration of the laſt Treaty made for twentie yeares at Zilwar, in the yeare 1606, diſſembling all the aids giuen to Gabor, gaue the Grand Seignior full aſſurance, that his Maſter had no intent of breach with him; but openly diſauowed the Truce with the Prince of Tranſyluania, made at Goding: and that Cæſar would make warre vpon him, vnleſſe he might haue all the places H in Hungary, in his poſſeſſion, reſtored; deſiring onely a neutralitie from the Port, according to the antient Treatie. The Prince of Tranſyluania, who now repented that hee had giuen away the vſe of his late victory, which he might haue enjoied, and foreſeeing the ſtorme that was like to fall vpon him, ſent to the Port for ſuccours; who with much ado obtained ſome Tartars, and Commands to the Baſſa's of Boſnia, Buda, Caniza, Agria, and Temizuar, to be in readineſſe with all their frontier garriſons to defend and aſſiſt him in any motion of the Emperor, or elſe not to ſtirre: being vnwilling to abandon him, who was then their chiefeſt bulwarke toward that part of Chriſtendome, whileſt moſt of their forces ſhould be employed againſt the Perſian in Aſia; who had then entred Diarbech (the antient Meſopotamia) and taken Misbin and Merdin, two principal places, and all that Prouince, except Hamit the chiefe I citie, wherein was a Baſſa, who defended the ſame with great valour and reputation: and it was then not knowne where the Perſian would limit his ambition, many other parts fearing him for that which he had alreadie done; for he had ſeparated the Arabia's, and all to the Eaſt of the Perſian ſea, from the Turkiſh Empire; as hauing conquered from Balſara Northward almoſt all to his owne Derbent vpon the Caſpian ſea.

Vpon the eighteenth of Aprill the Victuallers for the Aſian armie paſſed ouer the water, but the diſpatch of the Vizier and the armie was ſtill delayed, and little ſpeech when they ſhould depart. In the meane time the Perſian preuailed, without any oppoſition of conſequence; and no man could diſcerne the inward cauſe of this ſlowneſſe, onely the outward appearance was, A ſuſpition and complaint from the Blacke-Sea; the Citie of Caffa hauing K ſent their Mufti and other Commiſſioners to informe the Grand Seigniour, That foure hundred boats of Coſſackes were abroad; That they had done great ſpoyles in the coaſt of Tartaria and of the Turkiſh Empire, and taken many ſhippes laden with prouiſion for the Port, and forty thouſand more armed and horſed readie for ſome land attempt; which put all thoſe parts into great feare: of which they deſired that preſent care and prouiſion might be taken and ordered for their defence. Whereupon there was held a new Councell, and Ibrahim Baſſa diſpatched with thirteene gallies to make gard vntil more aids could be prepared;
intending not long after to ſend a land armie, and the Captaine Baſſa with their whole Fleet.

Abaſſa Baſſa reconciled to the Grand Seignior.

Abaſſa Baſſa (the ſuppoſed Rebel of Aſia) hauing collected his armie together, ſuddenly roſe from Angria, and departed Eaſtward, hauing done no ſpoyle to the city nor inhabitants, L
but left behinde him a better fame than any gouernor ſent from the Port; he now had accepted the Grand Seigniors pardon, and in obedience to his command, and ſhew of ſubmiſſion, marched directly towards Diarbecher, to vnite himſelfe with Haſis Achmet Baſſa, as was ſuppoſed for the defence of that Countrey, who onely made ſome head againſt the Perſian.
This reſolution of his departure did much ſeruice to that ſtate; for thereby the Ianizaries and Spahies were accorded, and encouraged to go to the warre, who before could not be drawne out, ſuſpecting one another, and fearing Him more than the forreine Enemie: For it was euident;
if he had ſtayed in the way, either the ſouldiers would neuer haue gone out, or beene ſubiect to delay, mutinies, and diſſentions, by reaſon of their factions. But now vpon this good fortune to that State, the great Vizier, Treaſurer, Aga of the Ianizaries, and all the officers M and armie was paſſed ouer to Scutari, and muſtered the tenth of May, being ordained to march the twentieth: which was expected with great longing, in reſpect of the Souldierie, who as yet behaued themſelues ſoberly, and made ſhew of reformation and obedience to Lawes. They were in all about thirtie thouſand Ianizaries, and fourtie thouſand Spahies,

A many being gone before to make the Armie compleat, and the place of their Rendeuous about Bruſſia.

In the meane time a report was ſpread, that the King of Perſia was dead: but that fame gained little credit with the Turkes, who knew it to be an vſuall policie of that King, in hope thereby to ſlacken the haſt of their forces ſent againſt him; but it did rather quicken them, inſomuch as they ſaid he had been often dead, but ſtill reuiued to ſome greater miſchiefe.

Biram Baſſa was diſpatched Generall of the frontier of Poland and Bugdania, with foure thouſand ſoldiers, and order to draw together and command all the Beghs and garriſons, and to raiſe new forces on that Quarter, in preuention of ſome attempt feared from the Coſſacks; who were in arms vpon the border, and had put all into diſtraction. To the thirteen gallies be-
B fore mentioned to make a gard in the Blacke-Sea, were added ten more; who firſt tranſported Iean Gheray Han, to re-eſtabliſh him Prince of the Tartars, and depoſe Mechmet, aduanced the yeare before. That reſolution was carried very ſecretly, and though there was ſome whiſper, yet he was not declared vntill the day he kiſſed the Grand Seigniors Veſt, tooke his leaue, mouuted his galley, and departed. The cauſe of this ſudden mutation was pretended, That Mechmet was accuſed by the Poles to haue broken the Peace, and ſo they would paci-fie the Coſſacks on better hopes: but the truth was, he was ſuſpected, becauſe he had excuſed to ſend aid to the Aſian warre, being thereto required, as fearing the entry of the Coſſackes into his Countrey: and the rather, becauſe his brother Shachin Gheray, who fled twelue yeares before to the Perſian, being in diſgrace with Sultan Achmat, was now retur-
C ned into Tartaria, at the inſtant when the Perſian did inuade the Turkiſh dominions, as if there had been ſome confederacie betweene them, both thoſe brethren being braue ſouldiers: and therefore it was feared that a dangerous reuolt or warre would breake out in thoſe parts. For if Mechmet were not ſuddenly ſurpriſed, it was thought he would defend himſelfe and his Poſſeſſion. When the gallies had performed their ſeruice to the new Prince, they were appointed to ioyne with the others, and to diſcharge Ibrahim Baſſa; one Huzein Baſſa a Vizier of the Bench being ſent to that command: Biram Baſſa hauing likewiſe order to haue an eye vpon the Tartars, as well as on the Poles. At the firſt departure of the firſt gallies, as ſoone as they came into the Blacke-Sea, they met with a ſmall Carmiſall, who reporting that only forty boats of the Coſſackes were before them, the Ianizaries mutined, and forced their D General to retyre into the Channel, and demanded more ſtrength; who were checqued, ſup-plied with more men, and ſo proceeded.

Biram Baſſa diſpatched Generall againſt the Coſſackes.

Amongſt other diſtractions and reuolts of the ſubiects of that Empire, the Pirats of Algier and Tunes caſt off all obedience not onely vpon the ſea, where they were maſters, but preſuming to doe many inſolencies euen vpon the land, and in the beſt ports of the Grand Seigniour. They began at Rhodes, where the Caſtle ſhot at them. Afterward, a fleet of ſix Pirats of Tunes met with a Flemiſh ſhip called the Moon, laden at Alexandreta; with whom notwithſtanding their Peace, they fought, and fired her, not ſauing any thing but ſome of the men, whom they made ſlaues: & after, comming into the port of Salines at Ciprus, they found two Flemings more, and two Venetians, able to fight with two ſuch Fleets. As ſoon as they E came into the Road they now claimed peace of the Flemings, ſeeing themſelues too weake to ſet vpon all foure; proteſting, That if they would aſſiſt their enemies, the breach was on their parts: who thereupon (vnworthily) promiſed a neutralitie. Then they ſet vpon the Venetians, the Captaines whereof went aſhore to craue protection of the Caſtle in the Grand Seigniours port; for which the Begh demanded fifty thouſand dollars, or elſe they ſhould take their fortune: which they refuſed, and ſo were expoſed to their owne defence; and the Pirats beginning with the ſmaller ſhip, ſhe made a good reſiſtance, but hauing no helpe, ſhe was thrice fired, and at laſt burnt to the water: The Captaine of the Dolphin (the greater ſhip) not ſhooting a ſhot, with his men ſtole aſhore, and fired her, being a veſſell of eight hundred tunnes, and armed with forty eight Pieces of braſſe. The ladings of theſe two were F valued at three hundred thouſand dollars, of which the Pirats ſaued nothing: and in ill euils it was a bleſſing, that ſuch a ſhip fell not into their hands, ſeeing the cowards were not able to hold ſuch a ſtrong Fort. From thence they ſailed to Scandaron, where finding another Fleming, and a Polacra, they ſurpriſed both, and then prepared to land: The Aga of the Scale and all the inhabitants fled, and they ſacked the towne, and robbed all warehouſes;
and

and not therewith content, they ſet it on fire, ſo that nothing remained but ſtone walls that G would not burne. The greateſt loſſe to ſtrangers fell vpon the Dutch and Engliſh; for the former loſt about thirty thouſand, and the later about ten thouſand dollars; and ſo they raigned in the port eight days, and departed. An inſolencie vnſufferable, if that State had any ſence of honour or profit: for by this example there was no Scale of the Grand Seigniour ſecure, and all trade muſt be giuen ouer, if no preſent courſe were taken for a full redreſſe.

Troubles in Tartarie.

Vpon the laſt of May, after long expectation, the great Vizier Cerques Mehmet Baſſa and the Armie for Aſia began to march; and Abaſſa Baſſa had made ſo many halts on the way, that he was greatly ſuſpected of the Ianizaries, that he lingered vpon purpoſe for them; and at the beſt it was feared, he would onely returne to Arzirum, and keepe the ſame. The Perſi-ans death was no more ſpoken of, but was rather doubted he would be found aliue ſuddenly H neere Aleppo: and the Emir of Sidon did once more threaten Damaſcus and Ieruſalem. Thus the miſchiefs and feares of that State followed one another like claps of thunder: For Mechmet Gheray, made Tartar Han the yeare before, being encouraged by his brother Shachim, newly come from his baniſhment in Perſia, would not ſubmit to the Grand Seigniours Order, and reſigne his principalitie to his Couſine Iean Gheray (not long after ſent and made Prince) and therefore he was againe recalled, fearing to put that Countrey to trouble. But before that Order could ouertake him, he was landed, and Mechmet Gheray come down with a great Army to reſiſt him; and the Generall of the gallies in the Blacke-Sea was forced to land both his Ianizaries and artillerie for his defence, and with ſuch power as they could make (not exceeding foure thouſand) to entrench them vnder the countenance of their ord- I eance, where there paſſed ſharpe blowes in three skirmiſhes, and on both ſides about two thouſand ſlaine; the Generall diſpatching one galley to the Port with aduice, and requiring preſent ſuccours. Whereupon the eleuenth of Iune a peremptorie Order came from the Grand Seigniour, That ſeeing his honour was now ingaged, he would maintaine Iean Gheray, and giue him ſpeedy aids. To which end a Councell was held the ſame day, and reſolu-tion taken to ſend ſupplies, either the Captain Baſſa, who was then ready for the Mediterran, or by order to the Princes of Bugdania and Wallachia. And thoſe brothers, then in poſſeſſi-on, had no retreit, but muſt maintaine their diſobedience by the ſword, which was a matter of as much danger as euer befell the Turkiſh Empire. Hereupon the Captaine Baſſa with ſixteene gallies went into the Blacke-Sea in aid of Iean Gheray, made Prince of the Tartars, K whom Mechmet Gheray had beaten off the land, and forced him to retyre to the Grand Seigniors gallies that carried him thither. The Emperour being ſtill reſolued to giue thoſe people a Prince, ordered all the frontier ſuccours to meet him to place them by force; which was, in the opinion of many that knew the countrey, held a matter of great difficultie, all the Tartars taking part with Mechmet, who had in his Army neere threeſcore and ten thouſand horſe.

In the meane time the great Vizier Cerques Mehmet Baſſa marched towards Dierbecker; from whence there was newes, That the Arabs, ioyned with ſome of the Grand Seigniours forces, had giuen a Checque to the Perſian: which did encourage their owne Army, who were not yet out of feare of Abaſſa Baſſa and his troupes (that ſtayed about Keſarie) earneſtly L expecting what part he would take. Yet the ſeaſon being hot, the Perſian aduanced little, but onely forraged the countrey.

The Coſſackes enter the Boſphorus,

Vpon the ninth of Iuly, betweene ſeuentie and foureſcore boats of the Coſſackes, with fifty men apeece (rowers and ſouldiers) watching the opportunitie of the Captaine Baſſa's being ingaged in Tartarie, entered the Boſphorus about breake of the day; where diuiding themſelues, they ſackt and burnt almoſt all the villages and houſes of pleaſure on both ſides the Riuer, as farre as the Caſtles, and within foure miles of Conſtantinople. The principall places were Bainkdery and Ienicoie, on the Grecian; and Stenia on the Aſiaticke ſhore: where hauing made great and rich booty, they ſtayed vntill nine of the clocke in the forenoone; and then all the city and ſubiects hauing taken the alarme, the Grand Seignior came downe to the M water ſide, the Chimacham to the water-port: Halil Baſſa made himſelfe Generall in this tumult, and hauing not one galley ready for defence, he cauſed to be manned and armed all the ſhip-boats, barges, and other ſmall wherries, to the number of foure or fiue hundred; with ſuch people as they could either get to row, or hope to fight; and diſpatched all the horſe
and

A and foot in the city, to the number of ten thouſand, to defend the caſtle from further ſpoyle. Neuer was there ſeene a greater feare and confuſion for the time: yet they expected that thoſe poore Theeues would vpon their preparation preſently retyre. But they ſeeing the Turks boats make towards them, drew themſelues together into the middeſt of the channell, not farre aboue the Caſtles, and ſtayed firme vpon their oares in battalion (in forme of a Creſcent) expecting the aſſault, the wind and current being againſt them. Halil Baſſa cauſed ſome ſhot to be made a farre off, but they anſwered not with one musket, but houered from one ſhore to another, without any ſhew of retreit. Hereupon, the Generall ſeeing their forme and reſolution, thought it not fit to aſſaile them with ſuch boats as hee had, but eſteemed it wiſedome enough to keepe them from further attempts; fearing if they had broken his fleet B of boats, which was eaſily done, that they would venture downe to Conſtantinople, which was now emptie of all defence. And thus theſe few boats hauing firſt made great ſpoile, lay the whole day, vntill the Sunne ſet, facing and brauing that great and fearefull citie of the world, and all the force it could make, and departed with their booty, with their Colours ſpred, vnfought with, or almoſt reſiſted.

This ſmall action and bold attempt, to affront ſo great an Empire, made a ſtrange diſcouerie, how much vnder the reputation, the terrour and ſtrength of that State was then, how weake and vnprouided they were. But as the Oracle commanded them, Firſt to ſeat ouer againſt blinde men, it hath beene their fortune euer to haue blinde enemies. Philip of Macedon had neuer proiected, nor his ſonne Alexander neuer aduentured with ſo ſmall forces, the C huge enterpriſe of ſubduing the Eaſterne Empire, if they had not diſcouered the effeminate and faint courage of the Aſiatiques, by the admirable retreit of Xenophon, and ſwift incurſion of Ageſilaus great armies, not daring to oppoſe the vertue of their ſmall numbers. So wee ſee, of ſmall beginnings oftentimes great matters do ariſe; for by this attempt of the Coſſacks the Poles had abſolutely broken the Peace with that Empire.

Huzein Baſſa ſtrangled in the Court.

Huzein Baſſa that was great Vizier, and vpon the tumult of the Souldierie made eſcape the yeare before (a man turbulent and hated of all men) being at laſt taken and carried into the Seraglio, after he had (by many faire promiſes) confeſſed and reſtored much of the treaſure carried away by him, and giuen to the officers of the Ianizaries to maintaine him, was ſtrangled in the Court, and had the iuſt reward of his tyrannie. And the preſent great Vizier, ſent D to make head againſt the Perſian, did yet ſtay at Iconium, expecting the Souldierie, who did ſlowly draw to him: ſo that it was thought he would Winter in Aleppo, being not able to proceed in the warre that Sommer.

The Captaine Baſſa, ſent into the Blacke-Sea to eſtabliſh Iean Gheray Prince of the Tartars, was forced to retyre to Caffa, being repulſed from the land; the people maintaining Mechmet in poſſeſſion. Whereupon, to cure the wound with as little skarre as was poſſible, he in the Grand Seigniours name was conſtrained to confirme the other, and to be content to accept a courteſie, for which he gaue ſmall thankes. And Cante-Emir-Emirze hauing againe entred Poland, and done ſome ſpoile by the cutting downe of ſome woods, was intercepted in his retreit, and routed with the loſſe of two thirds of his Armie; and the Poles with a very E great campe intrenched very neere Chotyn (the fort beſieged by Sultan Oſman in the late warre, and ſurrendered vpon the Peace) expecting the euent of the great troubles on that ſide.

The Coſſackes returne to the Boſphorus.

The Coſſackes after their firſt retreit, returned againe to the mouth of the Boſphorus, with double the number of their firſt fleet, being an huudred and fifty boats at the leaſt; the ſupply hauing lurked behinde, either for ſuccour in caſe of need, or for ſome other aduantage. They ſtayed off and on vpon the coaſt three dayes more, burnt the Pharos and ſome two or three villages. They threatened to come to the Arſenall, putting all the city in great confuſion. Gards were continued and re-inforced in all parts vpon the land; and at laſt, two Gallies (filled with porters and laboring men taken vp in the ſtreets) and about 20 boats were ſent F out to keepe watch, where they remained at the entrance of the channell. But the Coſſacks with their great booty, and two or three Carmiſals taken, retyred; and ſo the feare was paſt for that time. But ſome of the poore Coſſacks being taken ſtragling too farre vpon the land, confeſſed vpon examination, That Mechmet Prince of the Tartars was confederate with them to this attempt, in reuenge of the offer made to diſplace him. And this confeſſion haſtned the death of HuZein Baſſa, who in the time of his gouernment, of a priſoner made Mechmet a Prince, and gaue libertie to the Lords of Poland that were priſoners at the Port (of whom mention hath been made before) and diſpeeded ſuddenly the Duke of Sbarasky, who if they had then been there, without doubt they had been kept hoſtages; for in this tumult the Agent of Poland ranne ſome hazard, if by the wiſedome of the * Chimacham it had not been preuented.

About the foure and twentieth of Iuly the Prince of Tranſyluania made an abſolute Peace with the Emperour, without the knowledge or warrant of the Port: which cauſed great ſuſpition amongſt them; but they bare it both ſilently and patiently, in regard of their owne troubles then in Aſia and other places. Therefore the Prince kept the conditions more ſecret: howſoeuer, it was knowne that he ſurrendred and diſclaimed all title to Hungarie, and conſented that the Emperours ſonne ſhould be preſently choſen King thereof, and keepe his Court in Presburg: That all the Eſtates of Hungarie ſhould receiue him, and the Prince of Tranſyluania aſſiſt and ſerue him in all his occaſions: That Bethlem Gabor ſhould remain quietly Prince of Tranſyluania, and Earle of Siculi: That he ſhould hold Caſſouia and two or three other Seigniories which he formerly poſſeſſed, during life; and after, that they ſhould returne abſolutely as members to the Crowne of Hungarie. And this Article did trouble the Grand Seigniour, That the Prince at all had mentioned Tranſyluania without any relation to him; as if that Prouince had depended of the Empire. Some other Articles there were concerning the eſtates of priuat men, and mutuall pardons; this which hath been ſet downe was the ſubſtance of the Treaty.

In the meane time a Chiaus (ſent by the Grand Seigniour to the Emperour, with the news of his inauguration, and to offer the continuance of the antient Leagues and Treaties between them) returned to the Port with the Emperors Letter of acceptance, and confirmation of the Treaty made at Zitwa, which was the laſt: Wherein it was agreed, That what either ſide poſſeſſed at that time, ſhould remaine as it was; and if any road ſhould be made, and priſoners taken, or place ſurpriſed (during the Truce) on either part, that reſtitution and full ſatisfaction ſhould be giuen by him that innouated. Ali Baſſa the Vizier before, and Cerques Baſſa at that preſent, did both of them conſent to the renewing of this Treaty, which was often broken; ignorant vtterly of the affaires of thoſe parts, and of the diſaduantage to the Prince of Tranſyluania and their owne State: for hereby the Truce being againe in vigour, the Grand Seigniour was bound to ſurrender Vatz, and many other places of importance that had been ſurpriſed in a time when there was neither abſolute peace nor warre betweene them, and was obliged to make many other reſtitutions of damage. But the Imperial partie did not preſſe thoſe ſmaller matters; onely demanding Vatz and all the countrey depending, held themſelues (for their limits) ſtrictly to that Treatie, which was then againe confirmed on both ſides. This concluſion diſcontented many, who laid the blame on the information of the Baſſa of Buda, a ſuſpected pentioner of the Emperour: but it was the Grand Seigniours troubles in Aſia that made him ſilent, and ſuffer both that loſſe and many affronts from Tartarie and the Coſſackes.

Newes of the Turks Army ouerthrowne by the Tartars.

There arriued in the meane time from the Blacke-Sea two gallies, which brought the bodies of two Viziers, and certaine newes of the ouerthrow of the Armie ſent vnder command of the Captaine Baſſa, to plant the new Prince of the Tartars; who hauing landed his forces and artillerie, was routed and beaten, himſelfe wounded, twenty eight pieces of ordnance loſt, two Viziers of the Bench and about fiue thouſand ſouldiers ſlaine and taken, the reſt ſaued by flight vpon the gallies; onely the Captaine Baſſa with his fleet ſtayed about Varna to receiue new Order. There had not happened to that Empire in many ages a loſſe of more importance, in reſpect of the conſequences; an Imperiall Armie beaten, and thereby Tartaria ſeparated from obedience to the Turkiſh Empire, and that people taught to know, That they were able to make and maintaine their owne Prince. But this was no time to take too much knowledge of that diſgrace, Policie teaching them, rather to cure than to make the breach greater. For the Grand Seignior after that diſpatched a galley to the Prince of the Tartars, with a Veſt and a Sword to his ſonne, and a confirmation to him of his place; caſting all the faults vpon the Captain Baſſa, and diſauowing his attempts; though he was ſent with Commiſſion to do it. Which (to make the diſſimulation good) was like to coſt him his head, being ſent for in to anſwer the ſame. The ſudden yeelding on the Grand Seigniors part ſhewed a great weakneſſe and feare, to flatter a victorious enemie; and it was doubted how the Tartarian would accept a Gift which he had gotten by his owne ſtrength: for if he ſtood out he would proue a dangerous neighbour, the city of Conſtantinople alwaies being open to him; for Adrianople and the borders did then feare him, and euen ſome Coſſacks did ioyne with him, although before they had been mortall enemies. Yet to make ſome compenſation of this defection, Abaſſa Baſſa the ſtrong Rebell had made his peace with the great Vizier in Aſia; and to ſeale the credit of his faith by another treacherie, ſent in the heads and eſtates of three of his chiefe followers, to redeeme his owne. Which much raiſed the dull countenance of that Court; for although the pardon was diſhonourable, yet it was ſeaſonable. But they durſt not ioyne their Armies for feare of new ſtirres, for he went toward his owne gouernment of Arzirum, with promiſe to keepe it ſafe; and the Vizier marched ſlowly towards Babylon, as then held by the Perſian.

A peace concluded betweene the great Vizier and Abaſſa Baſſa the rebell.

About the twentieth of September the great Vizier Cerques Baſſa abiding in Iconium, and Abaſſa Baſſa in Kaiſerie (neere thereunto) he was earneſtly prouokad by the Ianizaries to ſet vpon him. But the Vizier hauing expreſſe order, not to make the breach greater with the Rebell, but to vſe all meanes to appeaſe him, and to reconcile him to them, would not be drawne to conſent thereunto: for which cauſe, and ſome other their ſmall diſcontents, they twice ſtoned the tents of the Vizier, and wounded him in the head. Whereupon he aſſembled the Commanders of the Spahies, declaring vnto them the great truſt the Grand Seigniour had in them; and ſhewing them an abſolute Order giuen him, to keepe good termes with Abaſſa, and neuer to fall to blowes with him, he deſired them to finde ſome way of pacification betweene him and the Ianizaries: who inſtantly promiſed their obedience and aid to execute all his commands. Then the Vizier called together ſome of the Captaines of the Ianizaries, and perſuaded them ſo to worke with their companions, that a Peace might be concluded betweene them and Abaſſa Baſſa. Who finding their fellowes very vnwilling, had much difficultie to perſuade them: In the end it was agreed, that the Vizier ſhould treat and accommodate all differences. Who preſently ſent to conferre with Abaſſa; but hee by no meanes would truſt himſelfe, or giue a meeting; and anſwered, That he would neuer depart from his followers and Armie; but if that he deſired to ſpeake with him in priuat, that hee ſhould firſt ſend his brother the Beglerbegh of Caramania, and Elias Baſſa of Natolia, in hoſtages, and then he would come vnto him. Which diffidence of his much diſpleaſed, and the Vizier was conſtrained to treat the Peace by mediation: which hauing brought to effect, hee tooke his oath three times vpon the Alcaron, To hold him as a friend, and neuer to doe him any violence. The Ianizaries alſo gaue their conſent in publique, promiſing to maintaine the word of the Vizier: And the Articles of their reconciliation being drawne in writing, were ſent to Abaſſa; who reciprocally made the like Oath, and accepted the Peace vpon the conditions following, ſigned by the Vizier: That he ſhould be confirmed Baſſa of Arzirum; his Son Beglerbegh of Orfa, and his Lieutenant of Maras (all on the borders of Perſia) and that he ſhould depart with all his Armie to the defence and cuſtodie of that Prouince, and wait vpon the aduantages of the Enemie.

Abaſſa Baſſa killeth Colophon Baſſa with his owne hands.

While Abaſſa Baſſa did treat this accommodation, Colophon Muſtapha Baſſa (the principall of his Colleagues in all his rebellion) made ſome ſhew of retyredneſſe from him, and vnderhand to parle with the Vizier apart; and in concluſion wrote vnto him, and promiſed to deliuer or to kill Abaſſa Baſſa. Which Letters of his being either intercepted or ſent him, and ſeeing that Colophon had reſolued to ſell him treacherouſly, he called him into his Tent, and asked him plainly, Why he went about to betray him; and withall ſhewing him his owne hand, he drew his ſword and claue his head, deliuering all his goods vnto ſome ſeruants of the Vizier, to conſigne to their Maſter. Then it was anew moued to Abaſſa, That he ſhould aduance with his forces preſently towards Babylon, againſt the Perſian, who had retyred his maine armie to oppoſe the Princes of Vſbecke that had made ſome incurſion; leauing fiue thouſand garriſon ſouldiers in the Citie. But Abaſſa refuſed to go; vrging, That he was only bound by the Treaty, to returne and make gard in his gouernment of Arzirum. Whereupon the Vizier, forced to riſe and aduance, hee arriued at a caſtle called Nigda (neere Aleppo) wherein were diuers chiefe followers of Abaſſa Baſſa; who hauing vnderſtood of the Pacification made, came out with preſents and victuals to meet the Vizier and his Armie, and were of him well receiued: but the Ianizaries enuying to ſee them ſo well vſed and honored, in a fury fell vpon them and killed them all (vſing the opportunitie) and entering the caſtle, put to execution their wiues and children, and euery perſon found therein, and all others that could be diſcouered in the bordering villages appertaining to him, to the great diſcontent of the Vizier. Which being knowne to Abaſſa, and ſeeing they had broken their oath and faith, he roſe with his Armie, and marched right to the Imperiall Campe; where arriuing, one of his Captaines with foure hundred horſe began the dance, and without delay fell into the Quarter of the Ianizaries, doing ſome execution for an houre and a halfe: in which skirmiſh there fell on both ſides two or three thouſand. The Vizier ſeeing this beginning, partly forced by the Ianizaries, and partly for his honor, drew vp his whole army to come to a battel in their defence. Which Abaſſa Baſſa perceiuing, and that which hee expected not (who hoped that the Vizier and Spahi's would haue giuen him leaue to reuenge many inſolencies vpon the other) vnwilling to fight with the Grand Seigniours Generall, ſounded a retreit, and got himſelfe and his armie a mile or two off diſtance. The Vizier to ſhew himſelfe faithfull to the Ianizaries, and to keepe in grace with them, ſent foure Beglerbeghs with their Regiments in purſuit of him: who finding Abaſſa and his Armie in good order, and firme, made ſome ſhew of skirmiſh, to little purpoſe. But they returned to the campe, and told the Vizier, that they had found him in battalion with forty thouſand men, and that they were not able to deale with him. The next day Abaſſa with many great threatnings marched away directly for Arzirum; and the Vizier to Diarbecher, for his hybernation; in great diſpleaſure of the Ianizaries, and the rather, for that he was beloued and protected by the Spahies.

The Tartars make an incurſion into Poland.

The brother of Mechmet Gheray in the mean time broke through the Prouince of Bugdania (Radula the Vayuod hauing made eſcape) & entred into Poland, firſt ſpoiling the country, and driuing away all the cattell; and afterward entered Wallachia, and beſieged his ſonne, Prince of that Countrey, in his caſtle of Tergouiſta, notwithſtanding they were ſubiects of the Grand Seigniour. And in ſtead of ſending backe the artillery loſt in the laſt defeat (which was expected) hee entered the Caſtle of Caffa, the chiefe Port of the Negropont, and carried away from thence all the canon and munition, which he tooke vp into the land to his towne of Bagchaiſeray, as if he meant to fortifie himſelfe (a practiſe at that time vnknowne to the Tartars:) which were ill ſignes of ſubmiſſion, and yet the name of Muſſulmen, at any time when they come to blowes doth eaſily accommodate all quarrels.

Tartar Han ſends an embaſſadour to the Port.

About the twelfth of March following, the Tartar Han ſent an Embaſſadour to the Port, with an offer of his Maſters ſeruice (which was receiued with great ioy) excuſing the enterie of the Tartars into the frontier of the Turkiſh Empire, as being done in ſeruice of the Grand Seigniour, onely to fetch Cante-Emir-Emirze and his followers out of Siliſtria, and to compell them to retyre, to auoyd and take away all occaſion from the Poles, to lament the iniuries done by them; that thereby they alſo might take the like order for their Coſſackes, and ſo the Peace might be duly obſerued on both ſides. Whereupon a Poſt was diſpatched into Poland, aduiſing what was done, and requiring that on both parts the like correſpondencie might be obſerued; or elſe that the Grand Seigniour would vnderſtand, if the Coſſackes made any new attempt, that the Peace was broken on that ſide, being they could haue no excuſe to lay the fault vpon the Tartars. This vſe was made of the Embaſſage; yet the Vizier was not without iealouſie of the ſinceritie of the Meſſenger, but thought he was ſent for exploration, to diſcouer the force, preparation, and reſolution of that State: and therefore they made all ſhew of good prouiſions; Armes being giuen out to the Buſtangies, and a great fleet dreſſing for the Blacke-Sea; wherein the Coſſackes had been alreadie ſeene, and rumor made them to exceed three hundred boats: inſomuch that all the inhabitants of the Boſphorus did daily retyre to Conſtantinople. The feare was generall, which was ſufficient argument of weakeneſſe; and the yeare before had ſhewed what might be done with a ſmall and reſolute Force.

1625. Now that the ſeaſon ſerued, the Perſian prepared to continue the inuaſion, and the Vizier to oppoſe him. All the Souldierie departed towards the Campe, though they intended not to meet, but to make warre by diuerſion. Abaſſa got ſome credit at the Court, and they eaſily

A apprehended all occaſion to beleeue his reconciliation. One of the chiefe Commanders in the Perſian Armie ſent to Abaſſa Baſſa to perſuade him to deliuer Arzirum (his gouernment) to the Shaugh: which he ſeemingly accepted, and trained him on with eight thouſand men to take the poſſeſſion; when in the meane time he drew together his troupes, and ſuddenly ſent them vnder the conduct of a Prince of Georgia, and ſet vpon them that ſuſpected no treaſon, routed them, and ſlew a thouſand, whoſe heads he diuided, and ſent them for Pre-ſents to the Port and the Campe. Vpon which action, by the multitude he was proclaimed to be the beſt Subiect of the Grand Seigniour, and named to be Vizier. But ſome thought it not ſo great an aſſurance of his fidelitie, becauſe he went not in perſon, nor would come out of his ſtrength, though commanded to draw into the field to aſſiſt in the generall ſeruice; ex-B cuſing himſelfe vpon the neceſſitie of defending the Frontier. Neither could he refuſe to ſend ſome of his followers to this exploit (being vrged thereto by ſome of his Captains) without diſcouering himſelfe too ſoone: his reſolution vndoubtedly being, That while thoſe two great Oppoſites ſtroue for the whole, he would keepe a part of Aſia, and his owne head;
knowing that he could make his peace with the ſurrender to the Conquerour, at pleaſure.

From theſe parts were not the greateſt nor neereſt fears; for the Prince of the Tartars (hauing made peace with the Poles, and taken the Coſſacks into his fellowſhip) made ſhew of ſome deſigne againſt the Turkiſh Empire, and the people were very indifferent, many inclining to him. The Coſſacks with three hundred Frigots croſſed the Blacke-Sea, ſacked and burnt the ſuburbs of Trapezond and all the adioyning coaſt; and retyring, were receiued C into the port of Ghioſleue, belonging to the Tartars; which augmented the iealouſie, that they would vnite.

The Coſſackes ſacke the ſuburbs of Trapezond.

At the ſame time there appeared a little Rebell in Natolia, one Ianet Ogli, a ſimple Spahi not aboue twenty foure yeares of age, dwelling in the plaines of Tirria; who vnder the colour of reformation of the Commonwealth, came downe to Smyrna with ten thouſand followers. The Citie amaſed, ſent to Conſtantinople for ſuccours, but receiued an anſwer as cold as their means to helpe them: The Chriſtians fled to their ſhips, by chance in the port; the Gouernor to the Caſtle: But it ſeemed he had priuate quarrels with ſome great men in the Towne; whoſe faction ſent out foure thouſand ſhot to keepe a paſſage; which being beaten, he came before the citie, and executed his will, beheaded two Caddees, puniſhed diuers in-D ſolent ſouldiers, placed and diſplaced the Officers, and proclaiming peace in the Grand Seig-niours name, offended no priuate man, nor did any ſpoyle; but giuing a particular protection to the Conſuls, and promiſing them in their quarrell, if they were oppreſſed, to returne with his rod of correction, he departed to his owne home without any further trouble. The operation of that medicine proued wholeſome, though it appeared dangerous; and he pretended to haue had order from the State, a diſorderly way: but it was likely they did rather conniue at, than approue of that rude execution of Iuſtice. Howſoeuer, not long after hee had diſturbed Smyrna, he tooke vp armes againe with a greater power, which followed the im-punitie or proſperitie of his former attempt; for he marched toward Burſia in Natolia: and the State was forced then to take his actions into conſideration, which they would haue ouer-E ſeene. There was two Councels held about him, and a reſolution taken, while his forces were but new and wauering, to reſiſt the beginnings, and to ſend out ſome ſtrength to ſuppreſſe him: but who ſhould command, who would obey, or whom to truſt, could hardly be agreed. He ſtill vſed the name of the Grand Seigniour, and the common blinde of rebellion, Reformation: but what he would haue, or whither his deſignes drew him, was the more dangerous for the vncertaintie.

Ianet Ogli a Spahi commeth in a rebellious manner to Smyrna.

The Armado ſent into the Blacke-Sea for ſuppreſſing the Coſſackes arriuing at Varna, a garriſon towne kept by Gebegies (an inferiour Order of ſouldiers) there fell out a quarrel betweene them and the Ianizaries. Theſe (after the ſway of their inſolence) would take from the other their Ouens in their owne Towne: which being not endured, a priuate fray was be-F gun betwixt them; which breaking out into a faction, the fellowes of both Orders became intereſſed and ingaged, and they fought a ſharpe battell; many of both ſides fell, to the number of a thouſand. The Captaine Baſſa, who could not preuent this quarrell, ſought to appeaſe it, by doing ſome iuſtice againſt the Gebegies; but it ſeemed it was enough to enrage them againſt him as partiall; and too little to ſatisfie the Ianizaries, who thereupon forſooke

the gallies, and kept the land, leauing the Armado without ſouldiers to gard it, in danger of the Tartars and Coſſacks.

The Great Vizier in Aſia gaue command, That no ſouldier ſhould retyre to Winter garriſon, but ſtay with the Armie about Babylon, the fitteſt ſeaſon being then to make the war: diſpoſing himſelfe in the meane time to take in places of leſſe import. Abaſſa Baſſa moued not, and promiſed obedience in all things; but to go out of his Hold of Arzirum he did peremptorily refuſe.

Strange predictions of a great plague which enſued.

The yeare and ſeaſon was full of contagion, which was obſerued by ſome forewarnings, and ſome extraordinarie diſpoſition of the aire and accidents: For, on the eighth of May at midnight there was a great and fearefull earthquake at Conſtantinople, which endured about ſix minutes; and croſſing the ſea, was felt in Greece, Aſia, and the Iſlands. And on Munday the twenty ninth of Iune, at night there began a moſt terrible tempeſt, with ſo violent and continuall thunder and lightening, that all the city of Conſtantinople ſhewed as if it had been on fire; at the end whereof fell a ſtorme of haile that brake tiles and glaſſes, ſo that ſtones by report were taken vp of a hundred and fifty drammes; but from credible witnes that weighed diuers of them, the next morning there were found of ſixty and ſeuenty drammes apiece, (which is about ſeuen or eight ounces) wherewith many were wounded. On Sunday the third of Iuly, another tempeſt of thunder and lightning began at Conſtantinople, which burned a woman and her children in their bed, and ſlew much cattell in the field. And the fifth of Iuly the ſickeneſſe was growne to that heigth, that the Turkes proclaimed their publique proceſſion and prayers; which is performed with great ſolemnitie by the Mufti and all the Mullaes, accompanied with the Viziers and the chiefe of the city, attended by the people at a little Moſchie on the edge of the plain of Achmadan, ouer the water on Grecia ſide: which ceremonie is neuer vſed vntill the mortalitie exceed a thouſand a day; which was eaſily knowne by the burials, that were all made without the walls, and account of them were kept at euery port: and that day was numbered onely to go out of the gate of Adrianople nine hundred and ſeuenteene. On the eighth following there died a 1034: by computation of the whole (being many ports of buriall) there could not die leſſe than two or three thouſand a day, beſides Galata, Pera, and Scutari, the infection being ſpred almoſt into all the villages. The ſame day, proclamation was made in the Citie, That no Butcher ſhould kill mutton; a murrion or plague (whither was vncertaine) hauing taken that ſort of cattel ſo violently, that they died in multitudes with ſores in the fields; and it was not knowne what they ſhould eat, nor where ſafely to prouide it.

The Perſian feignedly deſires peace, and the Georgians ſend their Embaſſadors, Vpon the approch of the great Vizier toward the Prouince of Babylon, there was a motion made on the part of the King of Perſia, of peace; but it was vnderſtood by the Vizier to be but an artifice to delay his Armie. There came Embaſſadours from the Princes of Georgia, who hauing formerly depended vpon the Perſian, were about nine yeares before betrayed and tyranniſed by him: in reuenge whereof they hauing taken protection of the Grand Seigniour, and the laſt ouerthrow giuen to the Perſian (though attributed to Abaſſa) being executed by a Nobleman of that Nation, they then ſent to offer themſelues in a confederacie of that warre. The meſſage was acceptable, and the Archbiſhop of Calcedon their countryman appointed to receiue, entertaine, and returne with them as Embaſſadour from that Port, to confirme and diſpoſe the whole Nation (who were gouerned by three Princes) to enter into this League, and to make warre vpon the King of Perſia. The race of thoſe three Families had long ruled that Countrey, whereof one was accounted the chiefeſt (though the others had ſeuerall iuriſdictions) of which the maſculine line was then failed, except onely one, who being made Turke young, was a Baſſa neere the Red-Sea. The State ſent vnto him, and made meanes to the Vizier, that he might returne and be their Prince; but on condition that he ſhould become a Christian: but that being denied them, they elected the daughter of their laſt Prince, notwithſtanding their antient Law, that excludes the ſucceſſion and rule of women; and hauing procured therein a diſpenſation from the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, thoſe Embaſſadors had alſo order for formes ſake, to procure the confirmation from the Grand Seigniour; which was granted them.

The Ianizaries mutined in the Blacke-Sea being againe appeaſed, the Captaine Baſſa ſent out Sackſachi Baſſa, hauing made a fleet of an hundred and foureſcore frigots, and armed

A them to keepe the riuers about Oſu, by which the Coſſackes deſcended. Sackſachi arriuing at Oſu, and finding all quiet, on the Biram day went aſhore; and being at dinner, was ſurpriſed by the Coſſacks, and hardly eſcaping, loſt all his fleet, and many of his men. The Captaine Baſſa hauing aduice of his ouerthrow, made all haſt to Oſu, and finding no ſhew of enemie, reſolued to go on towards Caffa; but that night the Coſſackes deſcending with their boats by many out-lets, the Baſſa of Oſu ſent to him to returne ſpeedily and make haſte towards Conſtantinople, for that the Enemie, growne proud with their late victorie, ſuppoſing no other force abroad, were directly gon for the Boſphorus, and were reſolued to aſſault the Imperiall city, or at leaſt (as they boaſted) to burne the Arſinall. Vpon this aduice, the Captaine Baſſa ſet ſaile, and the next morning by breake of day, and in a fog fell in with the fleet B of the Coſſackes (conſiſting of three hundred and fifty frigots, that carried from forty to foureſcore muſketiers apiece) and was ſo mingled with them, that he could neither vſe his ordnance for the danger of his owne gallies, nor auoid them without fight. Thus engaged, the Coſſackes furiouſly began the aſſault, and being three or foure boats to one gally, boorded them: twice they entred to the maine maſt of the Admirall galley of the Turkes, killed three at the helme, and broke the rudder off; which being againe faſtened by foure Chriſtian ſlaues, and the Sunne breaking out, ſo as the gallies could vſe their great ſhot, and the wind riſing, the Coſſackes were forced to leaue their fight, and betake them to their oares; where in parting, with the ordnance (as was reported) thirty boats were ſunke, and ſix or ſeuen hundred men taken vp. The conflict was bloudy on both ſides, being come to hand blowes, and C the Ianizaries almoſt conſumed. The Captain Baſſa ſent to the Port for ſupplies of men, and all that tooke pay of the Grand Seignior, euen to the old ſoldiers which were put to penſion, were ſent away, ſome to make gard at Chananchy by land, on the mouth of the Boſphorus; other by water to re-enforce the Armado, and all was filled with trouble and terrour. The feare of the Tartars likewiſe was not ſo extinguiſhed that there was not cauſe to expect ſome attempt by land, Shachi Gheray being in armes; and thoſe motions, if not ſuddenly appeaſed, would occaſion another breach with Poland.

The Coſſacks returne to the Boſphorus.

The Plague at that time raged as if it would haue diſpeopled the city of Conſtantinople and the villages adiacent, and the Francke Nations did all feele it; but the Turkes and Iewes by Armies, as if they went to conquer hell, if there were no league and confederacie be-D tweene them. On the three and twentieth of Iuly there was Corban or ſacrifice made at the gate of the Seraglio, two Beeues and a hundred Sheepe: at euery other port of the citie two Beeues and ſome Sheepe for the contagion and warre.

Ianet Ogli returned againe towards Smyrna, and the Chaya or Lieutenant of the Bey of the city, raiſing three thouſand ſouldiers, went out againſt him, hoping to draw more to follow him: They met at a plaine, and fought valiantly, Ianet Ogli remaining victor, with the death of the Chaia and two thouſand of his men: and he was dayly expected at Smyrna, hauing ſent before to aſſure the people that he would do no violence to any Trader or inhabitant, but onely renew the Oath of obedience to him, and puniſh ſome that were authors of this enterpriſe againſt him. The Merchant-ſtrangers were ſo confident in him, as they purpoſed not to ſtirre, but to receiue him as their Protector; and thought the Rebell an hone-E ſter man than any Iuſtice of their Towne. The myſterie of this ſtrange courſe could ſcarce be penetrated, for he ſtil reported he had authoritie from the Grand Seignior; though it was denied at the Port, for they were glad to know how to quiet him.

Yet not many dayes after, he fought a battell which he loſt, and was taken, being betrayed by his owne followers; and it was deſired that he might be brought aliue to be ſeene at the Port; but the Ianizaries crucified him, and ſent his and his mothers and his brethrens heads together, ſo that the tumor was ſuddenly allayed.

Ianet Ogli taken and ſlaine.

About the foure and twentieth of September the gallies returned from the Blacke-Sea, with the loſſe onely of foure by a great ſtorme. The Captaine Baſſa brought in triumph two F hundred & ſeuentie poore Coſſacks, & was receiued as if Pompey had againe finiſhed the Piratique war, that almoſt famiſhed Rome: But they did not triumph at the victorie, but ouer the conquered people; and they eſteemed this ſea fight next to that of Lepanto; but the nobler for the eſcape: for doubtleſſe if the winde had not riſen too great for the frigots, which were in number aboue foure hundred, the whole fleet had bin in danger to haue bin towed Northwards G euen into the iawes of the Enemie.

The great Defterdar ſtreled & throwne into the ſtreets.

About the ſame time, the great Deſterdar, Treaſurer of that Empire, was ſent for into the Kings gardens, and there by the Buſtangi Baſſa ſtrangled and flung out in his ſhirt into the ſtreets; an vſuall end of riches and greatneſſe in that Court. Otherwiſe, the State of that empire did then produce no remarkeable alteration: for the iealouſie of the Tartars was ſomewhat appeaſed; but the Termes with Poland were vncertaine, while the Coſſackes were yet vnreſtrained. The Grand Seigniour vſed all flatterie to the Tartar Han, to enter Poland in reuenge: Which he promiſed, and rode as farre as Akyrman; but from thence excuſed his not proceeding, vpon the waters: which was doubtfully interpreted, That hee had no will. In the meane time the King of Poland ſent an Armie againſt the Coſſackes, to ſhew his ſinceritie H to the Peace; which was very well taken of the Turks.

The Perſians ouerthrown by the Georgians, and the Biſhop of Calcedon ſent Embaſſador to them.

The Georgians in the meane time gaue a blow ro the Perſian, and ſent many of their heads to the Port by a Nuntio; who was preſently diſpatched away with the Biſhop of Calcedon, as Embaſſadour of the Grand Seignior, to enter league with thoſe Princes, to make ſome diuerſion. Abaſſa the old Rebell would not yet truſt himſelfe with the Vizier, but pretended he would vnite himſelfe with the Georgians in the ſeruice of that State; although he fortified himſelfe ſtrongly, and diſcharged himſelfe of his Ianizaries. The Grand Seignior to aſſure him, or to preuent that hee ſhould not reuolt, ſent him the dignitie of a Vizier, a Sword and a Veſt, and authoritie to make warre in companie of the Georgians, in qualitie of a Generall (ſo well a ſtrong Theefe proſpered there:) and he arriued not long after with his I Army at * Moſul, a place recouered from the Perſians in the way to Babylon: who vnderſtanding of ſupply of eight thouſand, ſent thither by the Perſian to re-inforce the garriſon, ſent out a party of Courds, that encountred and broke them, obtaining a full victorie with the fall of two thouſand, and the General and two young Sultans taken priſoners; who were ſent to the Port, with the heads of their followers. The newes of which ouerthrow was receiued with much ioy and content in the Court. The Vizier demanded a million and two hundred thouſand Checquines to be ſent beforehand for foure moneths pay of the Army; giuing this reaſon, That foreſeeing he muſt Winter in thoſe parts, and that Babylon would be defended, it was neceſſarie to haue money to hold his ſouldiers together; for if hee ſhould diuide them to their Hybernation, it would be Auguſt before they could be drawne into the K field, and the Spring loſt: and to hold them that were alreadie almoſt in mutinie, were impoſſible, vpon credit. To this end all wayes were vſed to raiſe money; a third of which ſum was ſent from the Port, but the reſt was hardly found (for the ordinarie charge far exceeded the reuenue) and fell very heauie vpon ſuch as were forced to contribute.

*Niniue.

The Perſian King, reported to be taken in his limbes at the ſame time (which did commonly forerunne ſome ſudden enterpriſe) lay with his Armie about Tauris, indifferently to ſuccour Babylon, and to attend the Circaſſians, or to make ſome diuerſion when hee ſhould ſee the Viziers Armie ſetled and ingaged in a ſiege: Which was not long deferred; for hee beſieged Babylon, wherein were eight thouſand Perſians in defence. His regular army (conſiſting of Ianizaries and Spahies, directly payed from the Grand Seigniour) were lodged on L the one ſide; and the Beghs (which were thirteene) with the Timariots and Souldiers repartited on their gouernments on the other. As they began their approches, in a morning twentie thouſand Perſian horſe fell into the Quarter of the Vizier, and did a great execution: but the alarme taken by the Beghs, they came to his reſcue, and the Perſians retyred. In that faction there fell fiue or ſix thouſand Turkes. Whereupon afterward there was made a generall muſter, and not found aboue foure thouſand Ianizaries, of twelue thouſand; nor ten thouſand Spahies, of thirty thouſand that were written for the warre: ſo that all the ſtrength did reſt in the Beghs, who were well followed, and little care or obedience in the other Orders. There were ſeuen Princes of the Arabs, who were ſubiects to the Grand Seignior, and ought to ſerue and aid him when they were commanded; but being ſummoned, they raiſed their M forces by common conſent, and ſtayed vpon their owne borders; anſwering, They durſt not diſpleaſe the poſſeſſor of Babylon; but if the victorie did returne, they would yeeld their antient obedience vnto the Grand Seignior: and if the Perſian did hold his recouered right, they

A they alſo would not longer acknowledge any ſuperiour, being (as they pretended) borne of free Anceſtors.

1626.

About the fiue and twentieth of March there fell a great ſtorme vpon the Bailo of Venice, for an accidentall fight by a Venetian Veſſell with a Bey of Andry: Many of the Turks were ſlaine, and the Captaine Baſſa pretended great damages; auerring, That their galley was rich and rifled. He anſwered wiſely and ſtoutly, That it was a chance; and would vnderſtand of no compoſition, but only write to the Senate to examine the cauſe by iuſtice. But the Turks ſought to draw an inference, That he, as Procurator of the Republique, was bound to ſtand in Law before the Iudges of the Port (where he was like enough to be heard and condemned B together) and then to remaine as a Pledge for ſatisfaction. But he would not yeeld ſo much aduantage; inſiſting, That he was an Embaſſadour, to expound the ſence of his Prince, and to maintaine the Amitie: and ſo by his ſtanding mute the buſineſſe reſted in diſcontent.

The Ianizaries mutine againſt the Boſtangi Baſſa.

The gouernment of the Turkiſh Empire dayly declined, and (as a great and ſtrong Bodie) had violent luctations before it yeelded and waſted. The Ianizaries about the laſt of March mutined againſt the Boſtangi Baſſa, for beating one of their Order (for diſorder in the night) by the Grand Seigniours command, and before his window. By their Canon, they ought to be deliuered to their owne Capes to be iudged and puniſhed; yet, though the Emperours word ſhould be aboue the Law of his Slaues, and though he auowed the fact, ſent and wrote vnto them, nothing would appeaſe them; onely his life they pardoned, exacting his diſpla- C cing, with ſentence of incapabilitie euer to beare office. He had been a good ſeruant to his Maſter, carefull of the publique Honour, ſeuere againſt the licentiouſneſſe of the times, and therefore vnfit for them. Afterward (following the example) they began to quarrell with the Vizier, who had fauoured the Boſtangi; and with much labour they were ſilenced for a time, but not quieted. This was their eſtate: What could then ſtrangers expect, when the Emperor ſuffered iniuries of his owne bondmen?

At the ſame time, an open rupture betweene the Grand Seigniour and the King of Poland was like to ſucceed an inuaſion made a little before into Podolia by the Tartar Han; who returning from thence with a great prey, was met, and loſt with a part of it, the greateſt part of his Army. Whoſe brother Iean Geray refuſing to accompanie the action, as contrarie to D the Peace and his Oath, ſent the Generall Coneſpoloky the copy of the Order from the Port; which being diſcouered there, they hearkened after any ouerture or meanes to make vp the breach, and to procure a new reconciliation. But the ouerthrow giuen to the Tartars encouraged the Poles to declare their reuenge, and to auow the attempts of the Coſſacks, who were then ready with ſeuen hundred frigots, to fall vpon ſome part neere Conſtantinople, munition being allowed them, and a Poliſh Captaine to euery boat. They threatened to fight with the Grand Seigniours Armado, and made a vow to inueſt and carry away the Admirall Galley. All the villages on the Boſphorus to the gates of Conſtantinople trembled, and the city it ſelfe was not without feare; ſoftened by certaine prophecies and Aſtrologians, who foretold a great blow from a Northerne people. Twentie gallies kept the mouth of the chan- E nell, and the Captaine Baſſa was to depart within ten dayes with forty more; almoſt alreadie conquered with his owne and the common feares.

The Grand Seigniours Army beſieged before Babylon.

Certaine newes was brought from Babylon, That the King of Perſia had beſieged the Viziers campe, and that he was lodged vpon his Trenches, and had cut off all acceſſe of prouiſion: ſo that the Grand Seigniours care was then greater to ſaue his Armie, than to recouer the Citie. Yet his Miniſters did abate little of their pride, but were more readie to doe a wrong or any inſolencie than euer; inſenſible of their owne eſtate, or diſſembling it a peruerſe way.

The King of Poland being yet very loth to breake the Peace with the Grand Seigniour, which had been concluded betweene them chiefely at the inſtance and mediation of his Ma- F ieſtie of Great Britain; although the Tartars had entred his countries, and done great ſpoile, he cauſed his Miniſter to write to his Maieſties Embaſſadour at the Port, to lay downe their iuſt complaint: which the Embaſſadour did, in confidence of his friendſhip with the Chimacham; to whom he went directly, preſſing him as well to a conſideration of his Maſters and his owne eſtate, as of that of the King of Poland; ſaying, That all the burthen and blame would finally light vpon him; it being the vſuall way of great Princes, to diſcharge their failings G and errours vpon their Miniſters. This admonition moued the Chimacham much, and this was the ſubſtance of his anſwer:

* Lent.

* Chancellor.

In all Lawes and Religions (ſaid he) there is nothing more odious than to be eſteemed a Lyer; becauſe Law and Religion preſuppoſe truth, eſpecially in great Miniſters, vpon whoſe faith much of the publique quiet depended: but moſt eſpecially at ſuch a time (for then it was * Ramazan) ſeparate to deuotion, that it was moſt abhominable to God to ſweare a lye, by whome hee ſwore, and by the life of the King, all whoſe benefits might be poyſon to him in his heart, if euer either he or his Maſter gaue any order or intimation to the Tartar Han to enter Poland, or to do any act contrarie to the Peace: which if he had done he might iuſtifie, ſeeing the Coſſackes the yere before did make the firſt breach, and gaue the occaſion. To witneſſe this aſſertion he called the * Reitzkatab, who made H no ſcruple, iurare in verba Magiſtri, to ſweare to what his Maſter had ſaid: onely he confeſſed there were Commands written to Mehemet Gheray, by intelligence and conſent of the Poliſh Generall, to enter the countrey of the Coſſacks on both ſides, to reduce them to obedience; with reſtriction of any damage to be done to thoſe comprehended in the Peace: and that whatſoeuer the Tartar Han had done more, was and ſhould be diſauowed, as beyond his Commiſſion. Many other matters he repeated, as the remoue of Cante-Emir, and the death of Hagi Key, onely to auoid any occaſion of their parts. And in concluſion, all his diſcourſe tended to an expreſſion of deſire to maintaine a good and perfect Peace. His Maieſties Embaſſadour asked the Chimacham, what he was willing he ſhould write in anſwer to the King of Polands Miniſters? Who briefely anſwered, That they had no other intent but to keepe I the late Treaty; and that if vpon the Poles part (as they had begun) the Coſſackes ſhould be reſtrained, they would take abſolute order with the Tartars; who had no other pretence of quarrell, but a claime of a certaine penſion (mentioned in the Treaty) vſually giuen them; which if his Maieſty of Poland would eſtabliſh, there ſhould neuer be more occaſion of thoſe mutuall laments: That it were a diſhonour to the Grand Seigniour, to ſeeke and entreat the comming of an Embaſſadour to ſettle thoſe late diſorders; but if the King of Poland pleaſed to ſend one, he ſhould be receiued with all rites and reſpects. To this the Engliſh Embaſſadour replied, That he doubted ſome ill example of the vſage and detention of others, would make the Polacke warie, and difficult to engage any perſon of Qualitie. To which hee gaue all ſuch aſſurance of good and free acceptation as words could expreſſe. All which, the Embaſſadour K returned in writing to the Miniſters of Poland; entreating both parties to conniue at what was paſt, and endeauour by all means afterward to reſtraine thoſe mutuall incurſions, which were begun anew by the Coſſackes, the noyſe of whom had ſtrooke the Imperiall citie with great feare.

The Spahies cauſe the Chimacham to be ſtrangled.

* Maſter of the Horſe.

Vpon the third of Iuly the Spahies aſſembled in the Hippodrome; diſcontent with the gouernment of the old Chimacham Georgi Mehemet Baſſa (the ableſt and wiſeſt man in that State, but to Chriſtians malicious, and of the Poles a continuall perſecuter) who had the authoritie of the great Vizier in his abſence at the war; and in great furie ran to the houſe of the Mufti, and demanded of him to pronounce a ſentence of death againſt him, and that he would L riſe and informe the Grand Seigniour of their will; which if hee refuſed, they threatened a generall reuolt, and to do their owne iuſtice. There was no remedie; the Emperour being enformed, was pleaſed inſtantly to diſplace him, and to giue the office to Regeb Captaine Baſſa, and his to * Imbraher Baſſa; hoping thus to quiet all matters. But this gaue them no ſatisfaction, they demanded in greater furie his life. The poore old man was retyred into the Grand Seigniours protection, who vſed all meanes to appeaſe them, offering to baniſh or confine him: but nothing would content and ſeparat them vntil he had deliuered him vp; who the next day was ſtrangled and throwne into the ſtreets, where the Barbarians vented their ſpleene vpon his dead body, cutting off his eares and noſe, and carrying them in triumph to their fellowes. Preſently they demand the life of ſome others, principally of Morat Chiaus M the Cuſtomer (odious to all men) whom when they could not finde they ſacked his houſe. Within a day or two after, they began to be quiet, vpon promiſe, That if he could be found he ſhould be rendred to them, and others to be brought in Iuſtice: but all feared that that Peſtilence and Deſtruction of the city would eſcape by force of his money, hauing three times before been in the like danger. That great Miniſter the Chimacham was ninetie

ſix

A ſix yeares old, had been forty fiue yeares Vizier, and thrice Chimacham. The great ſeruices he had done, euen to the preſeruation of the Empire, nor any other reſpect could protect him from this rage. The occaſion then taken againſt him, was, That he did conceale the ill eſtate of the Army in Babylon, flattering the Grand Seignior while their fellowes periſhed; and certaine Letters written in bloud, as from the Campe, produced to accuſe him; which afterward were diſcouered to be written in Conſtantinople. When the ſentence was deliuered to the Boſtangi Baſſa, he came to the lodging of the Chimacham in the Kings Garden, where he thought himſelfe in ſanctuarie, and for reuerence to his age and place, held it (being written) in his hand, rather to intimate, than to be the meſſenger. The poore old man perceiuing it, deſired an houre to pray; and coniured him to warne the Grand Seigniour, B hereafter not to be ſo eaſie to conſent to ſhed innocent bloud, which within few dayes hee would repent: and laſtly he entreated, that he might not die by the foule hands of the Hangman: which coſt him deare; for the Boſtangies executioners, either for reſpect, or for want of skill, could not finiſh his life (ſo great was his old heart) in one houre: hee was buried by a few Raſcals, his owne ſeruants hid, and no man daring to accompany him to his laſt Bed.

The immediate foregoing diſcourſe was filled with the iniuſtice and inſolencie of man; but this bringeth with it examples of the iuſtice of God, who reuengeth the bloud of his enemies and wicked men, vniuſtly ſpilt, to preſerue his image euen amongſt them that ſtudie to deſtroy it. To this may be fitly applied that boldneſſe, Non eſſe curæ Deis ſecuritatem eorum etiam vltionem: C The Ianizaries either enuious that they had no part in the laſt ſedition, or being innocent, vnwilling to participate in the infamie, or rather it was their turne to doe ſomewhat; forced the boats of the gallies which lay aboue Conſtantinople in the channell, and came downe to a garden houſe vpon the ſea in the night, where the Emperour priuately repoſed, and began to exclaim againſt the death of the Innocent; proteſting they had no ſhare therein, but as obedient ſlaues they deſired the peace of the State, and that Iuſtice and quietneſſe might returne to the City; and requiring reuenge vpon diuers whom they accuſed as the authors of thoſe tumults, they named their owne * Segmen Baſſa as the principall, and eighteene of their owne officers, and diuers others of the chiefe Spahies, who held councels together, and were become heads of Factions; which vntill they were all cut off, there was D no hope of good gouernment and peace. The Grand Seigniour gaue them milde words, and promiſed to do iuſtice, and to puniſh all ſuch as ſhould be found guilty: but nothing being don to ſatisfie them, and it being beleeued that the new Chimacham conniued, and had bin a partie to al their counſels, at leaſt his preferment made him obnoxious to that ſuſpition; and it was moſt true, that the Segmen Baſſa & his followers & faction were the contriuers of the fal and murther of Georgi Mehemet Baſſa, and very probable that he was fauoured if not practiſed by the new Miniſter; the Ianizaries roſe againe, and by force brought downe the gallies neere the city, and landed and held a Councell very ſecret in their chambers. This bred much ſuſpition and feare; but the day of publique audience being come, according to the cuſtome, they repaired all to the Seraglio, and waited in their order: their Segmen Baſſa only E did not appeare; and it was thought he abſented purpoſely by agreement with the Chimacham, leſt there ſhould be ſome occaſion to examine the paſt buſineſſe, which would not endure the light. The * Diuan being finiſhed, and the Viziers and * Caddee-Leſchers comming toward the gate, they were ſtopped by the Ianizaries, and told plainely they would ſpeake with the King. Such perſuaſions as were requiſite were vſed; but there was no remedie, they would deliuer their owne meſſage. The young Emperour at firſt was afraid, and retyred; but to auoid greater inconueniences, reſolued to come out to them. Order was inſtantly giuen to ſend for the Mufti and the Antients of the Law, and many Santons, for the Segmen Baſſa, and others of qualitie to be preſent at this action. In the meane time a Throne was brought out, and placed in the great Court, and the Grand Seigniour came forth F and ſate in his Maieſtie, attended and aſſiſted by all the great Miniſters and officers of his empire, to ſtrike a reuerence and feare into the ſouldiers, whoſe purpoſes were not yet diſcouered. Contrarie to all expectation, an Electo ſpake for them: In all humble manner profeſſing their obedience, and lamenting the ſickeneſſe of the State, and thoſe dayly inſolencies; and declaring, as they were not guilty of this laſt mutinie, ſo they were readie to ſpend their bloud in defence of their

Prince, and for the reformation of thoſe diſorders, to which there could be applied no remedie but by G
the ſword of Iuſtice to cut off all thoſe heads which held Conuenticles, and plotted dayly alterations, onely to gouerne the whole Empire at their will. They deſired their Petition might be accepted, and thoſe diſturbers of the peace ſought out and executed, in which they would aſſiſt : and that new names and titles might be forbidden, which many had taken vp as Heads of Factions ; and the Souldierie reduced to their antient diſcipline : Which if his Maieſtie would grant, and ſpeedily put in practiſe, they were ready to die in his ſeruice ; otherwiſe, as there was no hope of quietneſſe, ſo they did foreſee greater miſchiefes dayly contemplated, which they would oppoſe as well as they were able. At the end of this Oration (which might haue become a Cato) they deliuered a briefe petition in writing, wherein they modeſtly accuſed the new Chimacham of confederacie and conni-nence with their Segmen Baſſa, whom they anew appealed, and gaue vp the names of thoſe their owne Officers, and Spahies, vpon whom they layd all the burthen of the dayly tumults. H
The Emperour gaue them a ſhort but ſatisfactorie anſwer ; yeelding to their requeſt, yet mingled with ſome admonition ſuch as became a Prince : and ſo they departed euery man to their owne reſt. But the Segmen Baſſa hauing ſome intimation that his name was renewed in that liſt of death, tooke the firſt opportunitie, fled, and hid himſelfe ; and diuers others, con-ſcious of their owne merits, retyred, and thereby condemned themſelues : not one roaring Spahi to be ſeene in the city ; all things were ſo calme as if Aſtræa were deſcended. There was no diſtemper but in the heart of the Chimachim, who was afraid to bring his complices into triall, and yet was ſure if they were not taken, their eſcape would be his ruine : for the Ianizaries exacted of him an account of the execution. With much diligence the Seg- men Baſſa was apprehended and brought to the Court. He was firſt examined, rather to find I his owne treaſure which was infinite (for he had the ſpoyle of Greece in the laſt gathering of tribute-children ; and of the Seraglio at the death of Sultan Oſman) than to diſcouer other men. The Grand Seigniour ſent for him, and after few words, gaue ſentence to haue his head ſtrucken off ; which was inſtantly performed before the dore. Afterwards diuers of both Orders were taken (as was reported, to the number of twenty two) priuately ſtrangled and throwne into the ſea ; and ſome (principally branded) were hidden and fled. This trouble turned the Grand Seigniour to account many wayes ; for by confiſcations he aduanced a million and two hundred and fiftie thouſand dollars of the Segmen Baſſa ; by the Scriuano as much ; by others, very great ſummes ; and, as if peace had riſen out of the graue of the old K Chimacham, there was heard no more noyſe : the Spahies ſhrunke, and the Ianizaries as their glory tooke vpon them an auſtere reformation. But there were many inward ſores and diſcon-tents, which notwithſtanding all this cleere aire, were like to breake out, and one day could not be ſufficient to cure or purge the corruptions of that State.

The Grand Seigniours Army in diſtreſſe.

While the Grand Seigniour was thus troubled with appeaſing his diſordered and mutinous Miniſters and Slaues at home, newes was brought from Babylon, That his campe there was in great extremitie, beſieged without by the Perſian, Maſter of the field, and conſequent-ly of their prouiſions ; nakedneſſe, famine, and diſeaſes, within, were more terrible than the Enemy ; and the ſupplies ſent, ſtayed at Dierbeker, not daring to proceed without better gards : inſomuch as if ſpeedy ſuccours were not giuen them, the army muſt diſhonourably L and dangerouſly breake and ſteale away. But hereupon there was a publique Councel held, in which all Orders as well ciuile as militarie aſſiſted ; and a preſent ſupply collected, and a Generall choſen to conduct them.

The Grand Seigniour, becauſe the greateſt part of his land forces were thus buſied and employed againſt the Perſian in Aſia, ſent his Letters (at the inſtance of the Prince of Tranſyluania) to diuers Kings and Princes vnited for the liberty of Germany, to encourage them to perſeuerance and conſtancie in ſuch deſignes as were fit for that purpoſe. But this was an art of Gabor, to inſinuate (by this ſhew) into the Grand Seignior an opinion of great confederacie with thoſe Princes, to make himſelfe more valued and conſiderable at the Port ; and on the other ſide to improue his authoritie in Chriſtendome, by the pretence of ſo much cre- M dit, and ſo great aids ready for his ſeruice. The copy whereof doth here immediately follow.

Prince Morat euer Victorious;

TO the moſt glorious amongſt the great Lords of Ieſus, and chiefe amongſt the higheſt of the people of Meſsiah, Directors of all the affaires of Chriſtians, Princes of the limits of power and honour, Lords who direct to greatneſſe and glorie, and Kings ouer many Nations, who antiently haue declared themſelues to beare true loue and affection to our high Port: and to all Kings and Princes, glorious Potentates, and other Gouernours of the people of Ieſus, whoſe laſt dayes wee pray God may euer be happy: but eſpecially to thoſe who haue at the preſent deſired the friendſhip
B of our moſt happy Port, the ſanctuarie and refuge of the Cæſars and Princes of our age. To them let it be knowne, vpon the ſight of our moſt high and Imperiall Signature, That there is arriued at our happy Port, a meſſenger with a Letter from the moſt glorious amongſt the followers of Ieſus, and the moſt reſpected and honoured amongſt the people of the Meſsiah, Director of the affaires of the Nazaren people, Patron of the limits of honour and power, and Lord of greatneſſe and glory, Bethlem Gabor, Gouernor of Tranſyluania, and King of Hungarie, whoſe laſt dayes be propitious; beeing a true ſeruant and an vndoubted friend to our high Port, by the great mercie of the moſt high God euer preſerued; and by the wonderfull protection of the chiefe of Prophets our Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha (whom God bleſſe) kept ſafe, with a moſt noble, high, and continued off-ſpring:
which did ſignifie, That ſome of you who in thoſe parts be Kings and great Gouernours, and chiefeſt
C and moſt glorious of the honoured and famous amongſt the Lords that are obedient to the Meſsiah, haue antiently ſhewed your ſelues conſtant and firme in your affection and ſincere goodwil to our high Port; and that ſome others of you, being Lords of great Countries, do now deſire frienſhip and acquaintance with our Imperiall Maieſtie; and that the Gouernor of Tranſyluania and King of Hungarie, holdeth at the preſent good friendſhip and correſpondence with you, and that you haue united your ſelues with him for good and honorable ends: who letteth vs vnderſtand, That you haue ſent Meſſengers and Letters to him; certifying him, That although ſome of you were antient and vndoubted friends long before of our high Port; yet others of you who haue beene more remote, doe now deſire to approch our familiaritie; and that he ſhould be the guide and preſenter of the ſincere Faith and good affection which you pretend to haue with vs. And the ſaid Bethlem Gabor King of Hungarie, D in obſeruance of the perfect obedience and loue to our happy Port, hath enformed vs of the truth of your ſtate, and your offered friendſhip. Which his Letter, with all the particulars therein contained, we haue cauſed to be tranſlated by our Viziers, and preſented to our Imperiall view; ſo that nothing therein hath been hidden or vnknown to vs from the beginning to the end: the particulars whereof hath pleaſed our happy eyes, and the friendſhip which you haue deſired to make with our high Port, hath been accepted of our Imperiall Maieſtie: and all thoſe things he certified there are moſt acceptable to our ſincere minde; aſſuring you, That our high Port hath and ſhall be at all times open to the whole world, but eſpecially to thoſe who by a freſh and new friendſhip ſeeke to enter in and receiue it. And as all our Progenitors, and we our Selfe, to all the Friends of our houſe haue beene euer benigne and courteous, ſo to you ſhall be ſhewed all honour from our Imperiall Dignitie, and more E fauour than to others who are your equals. And in token that you may know we do accept of your loue and friendſhip offered, we giue you ſafe conduct to ſend your Embaſſadours into our high Court; writing this our Letter vnto you, full of all affection and integrity. At the arriuall whereof it is meet, that in conformity of the good affection and ſincere frienſhip which you haue promiſed and expreſſed to our high Port, you vſe all diligence and care to fulfill and proſecute this worthy and good buſineſſe which you haue begun, hauing your mindes attentiue and ſetled vpon the ſame, in ſuch ſort as they be ſtable and ſure, according to antient cuſtome in like caſes. And to other Kings, friends of this Port, you ſhall ſend your Embaſſadours of Honour, that the meanes of loue and friendſhip may encreaſe euery day; and the good effects vpon our part ſhall be dayly augmented, and the houres of our affection ſhall go forward and continue: and by the grace of the high God, your Embaſſadours or F other Miniſters comming to our happy Port, ſhall haue aſsigned them euery one apart their houſes;
and according to the forme and manner of our Imperiall Maieſtie ſhall be entertained and protected;
and when it ſhall be fit for them to returne to you againe, we will take order that they ſhall haue commodious and ſafe paſſage. Therefore reſt ſatisfied in minde, and giue good credit to theſe our happy lines ſet downe concerning this affaire: and be you alſo firme and conſtant in your friendſhip, corre-

ſpondence and confederacie. And we haue ſent to Muhemet Baſſa our Vizier, &c. (whoſe glorie G God continue) who at the preſent is Gouernour of Buda, our expreſſe Commands, and giuen order, That all the Armies belonging to him, of Buda, Boſnia, Temeſuar, Caniſia, and Agria, and other places adioyning thereunto and beſides them, to the moſt eminent Beglerbeghs of the Prouince of Greece (whoſe Armies belong vnto him) the moſt valiant Captaines of all our Empire; and to other perſonages of eminent ranke, who haue vnder their command many thouſands of men; That they repaire to our ſaid Vizier and Generall, (whoſe glory God encreaſe) and being all gathered together, that they make their Muſters and Campe at the confines neere Buda, in ſuch a place and part as ſhall be fit for that purpoſe. And on the other ſide alſo, That Bethlem Gabor (Gouernour of Tranſyluania, and King of Hungarie, ſhall leuie a good Armie, and keepe good correſpondence with our ſaid Vizier, that they may be in a readineſſe and prepared, in caſe that any Enemy inuade the H ſaid King of Hungarie, or the Prouince of Tranſyluania; that then they vſe all their diligence and readineſſe to repell them, and fulfill all theſe duties which concerne the honour of our State, and are beſeeming the reputation of our Religion. And by the grace of God, after that your Embaſſadours (honourable and fit perſonages) ſhall come here with your Letters, and eſtabliſh a good Peace and friendſhip, there ſhall be no doubt but you and your Countries and Allyes ſhall be protected by vs, and hereafter comprehended in all our Treaties of Peace which we ſhall conclude and eſtabliſh. In concluſion, All that which our noble minde can expreſſe or promiſe, ſhall be effected: whereof we haue giuen notice at large to all our Miniſters. Of euery other particular the Gouernour of Tranſyluania and King of Hungarie will write to you more amply; to whom I deſire you to giue faith and credit; and to obſerue good correſpondence, both with him and our ſaid Vizier Muhemet Baſſa of Buda: I and you ſhall write vnto vs (when this our Imperiall Letter ſhall come to your hands) of what other thing ſhall happen, by your Embaſſadours; which by the grace of God you ſhall ſend to our high Port: and you ſhall be very carefull alwaies to fulfill the beginnings of this our friendſhip and Amitie.

Written in the middle of the moneth of Iuly, 1626. in Conſtantinople.

About this time there arriued a Letter from the King of Great Britaine to the Grand Seigniour, concerning the Treaty of Algier and Tunes; and complaining of diuers iniuries done K vnto his ſubiects, and requiring Iuſtice and redreſſe: which being reſpectiuely anſwered, are worthy of publique communication.

His Maieſties Letter to the Grand Seigniour.

CHARLES by the grace of the moſt high God, King of Great Britaine, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Chriſtian Faith, &c. To the high and mightie Emperor Sultan Morat Han, chiefe Lord and Commander of the Muſſulman Kingdome, ſole L and ſupreme Monarch of the Eaſterne Empire, ſendeth greeting.

WE haue vnderſtood by our Embaſſadour reſident with you, with how much honour and reſpect the death of our deere Lord and Father of euer glorious memorie was condoled at your Imperiall Port; And if the ſignification thereof, and of our peaceable ſucceſſion to theſe Crownes, haue not in all this time come vnto you immediately from our Selfe, it hath not been through any default of our affection, or reſpect to you, but many important affaires vpon our firſt acceſſe, and the dangerous infection wherewith our Royal M city of London, and many other principall parts of our Kingdome haue been viſited, haue diuerted vs, and forced vs to defer theſe offices longer than we intended or deſired. And as we hope you will for theſe important reaſons, readily & freely excuſe thoſe omiſſions which

A in ſo weighty occaſions may well be diſpenſed withall; ſo we pray you to be aſſured, That we are deſirous that the Amity which hath of long time been held betweene our Predeceſſors, may be renewed, continued, and confirmed; and the entercourſe of Trade betweene our ſubiects and yours be maintained and preſerued, for the good of both our kingdomes and people. And to giue you the better proofe of our reall and ſincere intentions therein, we haue ratified and do ratifie the Treaty made by our Embaſſadour Sir Thomas Roe in that your Imperiall Port, with your Subiects of Algier and Tunes; and we cannot doubt, but that you for your part will keepe a conſtancie in the exact performance thereof, and to that end
B will lay your Royall command vpon thoſe your Vaſſals of Algier and Tunes, duly to obſerue the Articles of that Treaty in all reſpects towards our Subiects. We do likewiſe recommend vnto you, and pray you, in conformitie to our deſire of friendſhip and good correſpondencie, to confirme and ratifie thoſe priuiledges which haue been formerly granted by your Predeceſſors, to our Merchants, and to enlarge the ſame according to preſent occaſions, and as ſhall be moſt conuenient for the good of both our Kingdomes: which as we will ſtudy by all good meanes to keepe vp in full force, and moſt aduantageous execution; ſo we may not omit to repreſent vnto you the grieuances of our Subiects, when they are vniuſtly wronged, contrarie to the Capitulations betweene vs, and we preſume without your knowledge
C or conſent. That which we haue now to deſire your Iuſtice in, is, Firſt, Extreame iniuries done by inferior Officers, and ſpecially by one Morat Chaus a Cuſtomer of that Port, who hath not onely broken, but alſo ſcorned and contemned the Articles of the Capitulation, and that in the publique Diuan, to your diſhonour, and to the great preiudice of our Merchants. Secondly, an open iniuſtice done to our ſubiects in Algier, where the Engliſh Conſul and the reſt of the Nation were reſtrained of their libertie, their goods ſeiſed vpon, and forced to pay great ſummes of money, contrarie to Iuſtice and the direct termes of the Treaty. But if while we on our behalfe do obſerue the Capitulation and all good termes of D friendſhip, ſuch meane perſons as Cuſtomers and other Officers be ſuffered, and borne out in theſe iniuſt inſolencies and oppreſſions vpon our ſubiects, in a manifeſt breach of the Capitulations; we cannot ſhut our eares againſt the Petitions of our ſubiects, but muſt according to their humble ſuit, giue order to withdraw their perſons and eſtates from ſuch dangers, wrongs, and iniuſtice; vnleſſe vpon this our inſtance we finde a ſpeedie redreſſe, and exemplarie puniſhment inflicted vpon ſuch as haue or ſhall tranſgreſſe the rules of Iuſtice, and the amity and Contract betweene vs, which we recommend to your iudgment and care as a matter wherein the welfare of our and your people and countries is intereſſed. We do E further particularly pray you to giue expreſſe order for the vpholding and maintaining that Article of priuiledge for the paying but only of one Cuſtome within all the Ports vnder your Iuriſdiction, with free libertie to export any commoditie, hauing once payd cuſtome, without further charge; and that our ſubiects be not exacted vpon contrary to that priuiledge.
The further particulars of our ſubiects grieuances, and what elſe we deſire to be negotiated with you, we haue giuen in charge to our Embaſſador Sir Thomas Roe, to whom we pray you to giue credit, and to returne vs full anſwers to the ſeuerall points of this our Letter.
Wherein if you ſhall giue reliefe to our ſubiects, and puniſh thoſe that violate the Capitulation, F we ſhall receiue it as a ſingular teſtimony of your iuſtice, your good intentions towards vs, your conſtancie in your Contracts, and your iudgement in what hath relation to the good of your owne Dominions, and we ſhall be readie to anſwer that reality of yours, in whatſoeuer may reſt on our part to performe. Dated the firſt of March, 1625.

The

The Grand Seigniours Anſwer to his Maieſties Letter of Great Britaine.

Prince Morat, euer ſucceſſefull;

TO the mighty Prince, reuerend among the Maieſties of the Princes of the Law of Jeſus, obeyed of the great Potentates followers of the Meſsia, the onely director of the important affaires of the Nazaren People, Soueraigne of the limits of Honour and Power, the moſt glorious CHARLES, King of Great Britaine: To whoſe laſt dayes we wiſh all felicity.

TO the ſublime and happy Throne of our high Port, the Seat of the perpetuall Vicariat, the which by the mercy of the Diuine Maieſtie of the mighty God, and by the grace of the Lord was the Seale of the Prophets, vpon whom be continuall bleſsing, and the refuge of the Princes vpon the face of the earth, and the Sanctuarie of the Potentates of the world; your Letter with accuſtomed ſinceritie is arriued, by the hands of your Embaſſador, the elect among the Nation of Meſſiah, Sir Thomas Roe, reſident in our happy Port, to whoſe end we wiſh bleſſedneſſe. The which, according to the antient Ottoman cuſtome, and the vſed Imperiall forme, was by our ſupreme Vizier and glorious Vicegerent tranſlated and expounded, and being preſented before our State of moſt ample honour and felicitie, and ſeene by our Imperiall eyes, and conſidered in our benigne ſight, from the beginning to the end, our noble vnderſtanding hath entirely conceiued the inſerted buſineſſe, and all particulars thereof; and our diſcreet aſpection, from the leaſt to the greateſt, hath comprehended all your propoſed affaires, all which conduce to loue. The principall whereof is (beſides that you haue fully mentioned, and declared the ſtate of the Amitie that betweene both Dominions hath beene preſerued by your Fathers and Anceſtors) That now your Maieſtie, after your Father of glorious memorie, being by iuſt inheritance aſcended to the Regalitie of thoſe Crownes, doth aduiſe vs, That you alſo, more than your Father, are ſtable and firme in the ſame way of friendſhip, and moſt conſtant toward vs, in preſeruation of the Peace and good correſpondence, and daily attentiue to endeauor the ſtrengthening of the Peace and Amitie with our Port, and reſolued to accompliſh the ſame, and not to faile in any part of louing correſpondence. With which your friendly aduice, with moſt ſincere words expreſſed, and to vs moſt gratefull; That you in a bleſſed houre, and a happy time, haue poſſeſſed, and begun to raigne in the Kingdomes of your Father; the ſecret of our pureſt heart was greatly reioyced, and did conceiue aboundance of contentment, and our Imperiall Maieſty alſo hath therefore obtained, and together expreſſed all manner of gladneſſe and loue toward your Maieſty, indiuining you all happineſſe.

You haue alſo aduiſed vs, That your aboue named Embaſſador, yet abiding in our bleſſed Port, hauing formerly treated with thoſe of Tunes and Algier, and contracted concerning your Merchants, and their free traffique and commerce in thoſe parts, and conformably with them agreed, concluded, and confirmed the Peace; the which being very profitable and commodious to both our Kingdomes, that you haue alſo ratified, and in the whole condiſcended thereunto; deſiring, That on our behalfe alſo the ſame ſhould be obſerued: and to the end that for euer hereafter there may be no deuiation from the ſame Accord, and that to the Merchants, according to the antient cuſtome, going and comming to thoſe parts to traffique and negotiate contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulation, no iniurie may be by them done, That we ſhould ſend to our Vice-Kings our expreſſe Commands. Therefore you ſhall know, That we haue alreadie ſent to our ſaid Vice-Royes, with expreſſe order, our moſt efficacious and Imperiall Commandements, and ſtrictly charged them, Neuer to tranſgreſſe the ſame contracted Agreement; and that they take heed, Not to do any wrong or violence to any of your Merchants (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) trading and vſing thoſe parts.

And furthermore, hauing ſignified vnto vs, That certaine Magiſtrates and Cuſtomers of ſome Scales of our well defended Empire, contrarie to the Articles and Couenants written in the Imperiall Capitulations, do make diuers demands of grieuances and impoſitions of your Merchants, and

under

A vnder the name of Meſteria,* and ſuch like, do pretend and exact money from them: and hauing alſo aduiſed vs, That conformable to the Imperiall Capitulation, your Merchants hauing payd their due cuſtome; and tranſporting their goods to other Scales, that they alſo demand of them a new Cuſtome: Therefore it being in no wiſe our Imperiall will that in our proſperous dayes, and iuſt and peacefull raigne, contrary to our Imperiall Capitulation, that wrong ſhould be done to any man; We haue giuen vpon this particular, our requiſite and ſufficient Imperiall Command, and ſtraitly commanded and ordained, That they ſhall neuer tranſgreſſe our Imperiall Capitulation; and that the Nation of your Merchants, in what place or Scale ſoeuer they ſhall go, That the Magiſtrats and Cuſtomers do all diligence, that the ſaid Merchants may liue quietly, contentedly, and ſecurely; and hauing payed in one Scale the cuſtome of any merchandiſe, which being not ſold, and that they B ſhall tranſport it to any other Scale, that they take great heed, not to demand nor take of them any new cuſtome, nor euer, contrary to the Canon, to exact of them any new impoſition or other grieuance.

* Cuſtomers.

You haue alſo further aduiſed vs, That the late Huſſreph Baſſa, while he remained in the charge of Vice-King of Algier, did vniuſtly take your Conſul, reſident in Algier, with the Merchants which liued with him, and hauing impriſoned them contrary to the Law, Iuſtice, and the friendſhip betweene vs, did take from them certaine thouſands of dollars, and had done to them other great wrong and damage: Therefore, ſeeing it is more cleere than the Sunne-ſhine day, that it is not in any ſort by our conſent, that ſuch iniuſtice and inſolent actions ſhould be committed, and there being then preſent in our happy Port ſome of the principall perſons of the garriſon of that place of Algier, who did C know the whole proceeding, and wee hauing commanded they ſhould bee examined of that buſineſſe, they were preſently brought to Iuſtice, and being all of them variouſly reprehended and affrighted, they did anſwer, confeſſing and obliging themſelues, That all the money taken they would repay from the reuenue of the Cuſtome, and Fiſts collected; and as ſoone as they ſhould arriue in Algier, they would take order that the Conſul and all the Merchants ſhould be ſet free. In conformitie whereof, we alſo haue written our moſt effectuall and noble Command, reprehenſiue and threatning, directed to the Vize-Re of Algier, & commanded him, That in this buſines he vſe no negligence, but that without further delay he ſet at libertie the ſaid Conſul and Merchants, and reſtore vnto them entirely all their goods taken from them, and that he know, that hereafter no ſuch action ſhall be pardoned; and that your Conſul ſent into thoſe parts, according to antient cuſtome, ſhall be entertained D and honoured, and that he do punctually obſerue and execute the due termes of friendſhip.

And in the concluſion, concerning all the included particulars of your letter; in due forme, and befitting our Maieſty the Fountaine of Iuſtice, and conformable to the Tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, there haue been written diuers our noble Commandements, and conſigned to the hands of your ſaid Embaſſadour; and for the time to come, in all things which ſhall lead to the encreaſe of our friendſhip, and thoſe offices, commodious and profitable to the Merchants of both our dominions, our Imperiall ſtudy and attention ſhall not be ſpared: and be you aſſured, that the termes of our Amitie and good correſpondence which to this day hath beene continued, ſhall be of vs with excellent endeauour maintained.

But being informed from our honorable Gouernor, wiſe Councellor, & Vizier, Haydar Baſſa (whoſe E ſplendor God preſerue) whom we haue aſſigned and ſent to the cuſtodie of the boundleſſe Ayman, that there is come a petition, with a repreſentation and atteſtation of the principall of that Kingdome, to our happy Port, declaring, That in times paſt, in the gouernment of our Fezeli Baſſa, Vizier, now dead, being that certaine men of warre appertaining to your Kingdomes, had contrary to the Capitulations, aſſailed the Merchants which with their goods returned from India, and fought and taken their ſhips, and it being made knowne to the ſaid Fezeli Baſſa, that our Merchants had been damaged to the value of ſix hundred thouſand Dollars: which action being it was contrary to Law, iuſtice, and our Imperiall Capitulation, and that it was requiſite that the ſpoylers ſhould be condemned, the ſaid Fezeli Baſſa did collect from the Maſters of the ſaid Men of warre, for the ſaid goods taken from our Merchants, an hundred thouſand dollars, and did conſigne it to the true owners: and F whereas there was yet remaining to them fiue hundred thouſand dollars, the which to this day is not ſatisfied, the ſaid men of warre not containing themſelues in due forme, haue armed a new 7 ſhips from your Country, and haue come and aſſailed 14 ſhips of our Merchants, which from India were ſailing to the Scale of Ayman, and hauing taken the Maſters priſoners, haue made ſpoyle and depredation of all their facultie; and that now the Dutch Nation and your Men of warre ride at an-

The Grand Seigniours Anſwer to his Maieſties Letter of Great Britaine.

Prince Morat, euer ſucceſſefull;

TO the mighty Prince, reuerend among the Maieſties of the Princes of the Law of Jeſus, obeyed of the great Potentates followers of the Meſsia, the onely director of the important affaires of the Nazaren People, Soueraigne of the limits of Honour and Power, the moſt glorious CHARLES, King of Great Britaine: To whoſe laſt dayes we wiſh all felicity.

TO the ſublime and happy Throne of our high Port, the Seat of the perpetuall Vicariat, the which by the mercy of the Diuine Maieſtie of the mighty God, and by the grace of the Lord was the Seale of the Prophets, vpon whom be continuall bleſsing, and the refuge of the Princes vpon the face of the earth, and the Sanctuarie of the Potentates of the world; your Letter with accuſtomed ſinceritie is arriued, by the hands of your Embaſſador, the elect among the Nation of Meſſiah, Sir Thomas Roe, reſident in our happy Port, to whoſe end we wiſh bleſſedneſſe. The which, according to the antient Ottoman cuſtome, and the vſed Imperiall forme, was by our ſupreme Vizier and glorious Vicegerent tranſlated and expounded, and being preſented before our State of moſt ample honour and felicitie, and ſeene by our Imperiall eyes, and conſidered in our benigne ſight, from the beginning to the end, our noble vnderſtanding hath entirely conceiued the inſerted buſineſſe, and all particulars thereof; and our diſcreet aſpection, from the leaſt to the greateſt, hath comprehended all your propoſed affaires, all which conduce to loue. The principall whereof is (beſides that you haue fully mentioned, and declared the ſtate of the Amitie that betweene both Dominions hath beene preſerued by your Fathers and Anceſtors) That now your Maieſtie, after your Father of glorious memorie, being by iuſt inheritance aſcended to the Regalitie of thoſe Crownes, doth aduiſe vs, That you alſo, more than your Father, are ſtable and firme in the ſame way of friendſhip, and moſt conſtant toward vs, in preſeruation of the Peace and good correſpondence, and daily attentiue to endeauor the ſtrengthening of the Peace and Amitie with our Port, and reſolued to accompliſh the ſame, and not to faile in any part of louing correſpondence. With which your friendly aduice, with moſt ſincere words expreſſed, and to vs moſt gratefull; That you in a bleſſed houre, and a happy time, haue poſſeſſed, and begun to raigne in the Kingdomes of your Father; the ſecret of our pureſt heart was greatly reioyced, and did conceiue aboundance of contentment, and our Imperiall Maieſty alſo hath therefore obtained, and together expreſſed all manner of gladneſſe and loue toward your Maieſty, indiuining you all happineſſe.

You haue alſo aduiſed vs, That your aboue named Embaſſador, yet abiding in our bleſſed Port, hauing formerly treated with thoſe of Tunes and Algier, and contracted concerning your Merchants, and their free traffique and commerce in thoſe parts, and conformably with them agreed, concluded, and confirmed the Peace; the which being very profitable and commodious to both our Kingdomes, that you haue alſo ratified, and in the whole condiſcended thereunto; deſiring, That on our behalfe alſo the ſame ſhould be obſerued: and to the end that for euer hereafter there may be no deuiation from the ſame Accord, and that to the Merchants, according to the antient cuſtome, going and comming to thoſe parts to traffique and negotiate contrarie to the Imperiall Capitulation, no iniurie may be by them done, That we ſhould ſend to our Vice-Kings our expreſſe Commands. Therefore you ſhall know, That we haue alreadie ſent to our ſaid Vice-Royes, with expreſſe order, our moſt efficacious and Imperiall Commandements, and ſtrictly charged them, Neuer to tranſgreſſe the ſame contracted Agreement; and that they take heed, Not to do any wrong or violence to any of your Merchants (contrary to our Imperiall Capitulations) trading and vſing thoſe parts.

And furthermore, hauing ſignified vnto vs, That certaine Magiſtrates and Cuſtomers of ſome Scales of our well defended Empire, contrarie to the Articles and Couenants written in the Imperiall Capitulations, do make diuers demands of grieuances and impoſitions of your Merchants, and

vnder

A vnder the name of Meſteria,* and ſuch like, do pretend and exact money from them: and hauing alſo aduiſed vs, That conformable to the Imperiall Capitulation, your Merchants hauing payd their due cuſtome; and tranſporting their goods to other Scales, that they alſo demand of them a new Cuſtome: Therefore it being in no wiſe our Imperiall will that in our proſperous dayes, and iuſt and peacefull raigne, contrary to our Imperiall Capitulation, that wrong ſhould be done to any man; We haue giuen vpon this particular, our requiſite and ſufficient Imperiall Command, and ſtraitly commanded and ordained, That they ſhall neuer tranſgreſſe our Imperiall Capitulation; and that the Nation of your Merchants, in what place or Scale ſoeuer they ſhall go, That the Magiſtrats and Cuſtomers do all diligence, that the ſaid Merchants may liue quietly, contentedly, and ſecurely; and hauing payed in one Scale the cuſtome of any merchandiſe, which being not ſold, and that they B ſhall tranſport it to any other Scale, that they take great heed, not to demand nor take of them any new cuſtome, nor euer, contrary to the Canon, to exact of them any new impoſition or other grieuance.

* Cuſtomers.

You haue alſo further aduiſed vs, That the late Huſſreph Baſſa, while he remained in the charge of Vice-King of Algier, did vniuſtly take your Conſul, reſident in Algier, with the Merchants which liued with him, and hauing impriſoned them contrary to the Law, Iuſtice, and the friendſhip betweene vs, did take from them certaine thouſands of dollars, and had done to them other great wrong and damage: Therefore, ſeeing it is more cleere than the Sunne-ſhine day, that it is not in any ſort by our conſent, that ſuch iniuſtice and inſolent actions ſhould be committed, and there being then preſent in our happy Port ſome of the principall perſons of the garriſon of that place of Algier, who did C know the whole proceeding, and wee hauing commanded they ſhould bee examined of that buſineſſe, they were preſently brought to Iuſtice, and being all of them variouſly reprehended and affrighted, they did anſwer, confeſſing and obliging themſelues, That all the money taken they would repay from the reuenue of the Cuſtome, and Fifts collected; and as ſoone as they ſhould arriue in Algier, they would take order that the Conſul and all the Merchants ſhould be ſet free. In conformitie whereof, we alſo haue written our moſt effectuall and noble Command, reprehenſiue and threatning, directed to the ViZe-Re of Algier, & commanded him, That in this buſines he vſe no negligence, but that without further delay he ſet at libertie the ſaid Conſul and Merchants, and reſtore vnto them entirely all their goods taken from them, and that he know, that hereafter no ſuch action ſhall be pardoned; and that your Conſul ſent into thoſe parts, according to antient cuſtome, ſhall be entertained D and honoured, and that he do punctually obſerue and execute the due termes of friendſhip.

And in the concluſion, concerning all the included particulars of your letter; in due forme, and befitting our Maieſty the Fountaine of Iuſtice, and conformable to the Tenor of our Imperiall Capitulations, there haue been written diuers our noble Commandements, and conſigned to the hands of your ſaid Embaſſadour; and for the time to come, in all things which ſhall lead to the encreaſe of our friendſhip, and thoſe offices, commodious and profitable to the Merchants of both our dominions, our Imperiall ſtudy and attention ſhall not be ſpared: and be you aſſured, that the termes of our Amitie and good correſpondence which to this day hath beene continued, ſhall be of vs with excellent endeauour maintained.

But being informed from our honorable Gouernor, wiſe Councellor, & Vizier, Haydar Baſſa (whoſe E ſplendor God preſerue) whom we haue aſſigned and ſent to the cuſtodie of the boundleſſe Ayman, that there is come a petition, with a repreſentation and atteſtation of the principall of that Kingdome, to our happy Port, declaring, That in times paſt, in the gouernment of our Fezeli Baſſa, Vizier, now dead, being that certaine men of warre appertaining to your Kingdomes, had contrary to the Capitulations, aſſailed the Merchants which with their goods returned from India, and fought and taken their ſhips, and it being made knowne to the ſaid Fezeli Baſſa, that our Merchants had been damaged to the value of ſix hundred thouſand Dollars: which action being it was contrary to Law, iuſtice, and our Imperiall Capitulation, and that it was requiſite that the ſpoylers ſhould be condemned, the ſaid Fezeli Baſſa did collect from the Maſters of the ſaid Men of warre, for the ſaid goods taken from our Merchants, an hundred thouſand dollars, and did conſigne it to the true owners: and F whereas there was yet remaining to them fiue hundred thouſand dollars, the which to this day is not ſatisfied, the ſaid men of warre not containing themſelues in due forme, haue armed a new 7 ſhips from your Country, and haue come and aſſailed 14 ſhips of our Merchants, which from India were ſailing to the Scale of Ayman, and hauing taken the Maſters priſoners, haue made ſpoyle and depredation of all their facultie; and that now the Dutch Nation and your Men of warre ride at anchor

chor in the port of Mecha, and do pretend the return of the hundred thouſand Dollars taken by Fezeli Baſſa. Which brute and ſcandalous wickedneſſe, in affront of our Imperiall power, to dare to perſeuer, and to ſpoyle and ranſacke thoſe parts, being ſignified to the feet of our Imperiall Throne, the Ocean of Iuſtiſe, and that thoſe robbed Merchants are ſubiects of our well defenced Dominion: Being in no manner our Imperiall will, that there ſhould be loſt one of the ſaid Veſſels, nor any the leaſt part of their goods detained; and being that ſuch an action is very ingratefull, and oppugnant to the Peace and friendſhip betweene vs contracted, to the end that all the ſaid Merchants may be ſet free, and that their goods and faculties taken, may be entirely reſtored to the true owners; which your Maieſtie cauſing to be done, you ſhall accompliſh the requiſite termes of true Amitie, and ſhall fulfill the offices of our ſincere Correſpondence, and ſhall ſtrengthen the foundation of our good and mutuall fidelitie and League, wee haue written you this our preſent Letter, full of all effectuall loue.

At the arriuall whereof it is conuenient, that in conformitie of the great, perfect, and ſpotleſſe Amitie betweene your Anceſtors and our happy Port, and the Imperiall Houſe of eternall glorie, and the antient good Concord, Vnion and Correſpondence, that alſo your Maieſty ſhould be firme and ſtable in all wayes, with iuſt proceedings to preſerue and maintaine the meanes and Orders of friendſhip deſcended from your Fathers and Anceſtors. And if your Maieſtie deſire and will, That the termes of Amitie, and our good Correſpondence ſhall be perfectly obſerued and kept, you will then beſtow your good diligence and care, that the aboue mentioned happened action, ſo diſcrepant from our Imperiall minde and will, that is, as is aboue written, That the fourteene ſhips of our Merchants which came from India to our well defenced Dominion, and Scale of Ayman, and were taken and ſurpriſed by the Engliſh Men of warre, and the Merchants which were found in them all made ſlaues, and all their goods and faculties made prize; that they may be all ſet free, and all the goods taken from the ſaid Merchants, may be entirely reſtored to the true owners; and ſo your Maieſtie ſhall haue conſerued our moſt happy minde and affection, and protected our moſt honorable and noble deſires: the performing of which your friendly office, vndoubtedly will produce to your kingdomes many beneficiall and profitable effects; and certainly you ſhall finde, that it will redound to the great honour and fame of your Maieſtie. And by the grace of God, after that this our happy and moſt louing Letter ſhall arriue, by ſome honourable perſon, and to you faithfull; be you pleaſed to ſend aduice to our excelſe Port, of the manner of your vſed diligence and affection in this buſineſſe, and of the effect of the libertie of our ſhips and Merchants, and of the full reſtitution of all the goods taken, to their right owners; and with what readineſſe you haue expreſſed your ſinceritie and affection to our Imperiall Maieſtie. Which buſineſſe we haue alſo earneſtly recommended to your aboue named Embaſſadour, that when he ſhall more largely haue enformed you, that you be pleaſed to giue him credit, and that in the time to come you will attend to apprehend all thoſe meanes worthy the conſeruance of our Friendſhip, Peace, and Correſpondence.

Giuen in our well defenced Citie of Conſtantinople.

Which is the twentieth of Ianuarie, 1626.

Vpon the opportunitie of the foreſaid troubles within the Turkiſh Empire, and either to giue reputation to the Armes of the Houſe of Auſtria in Germanie, or to affright Gabor, and diſſolue the correſpondence which he had practiſed with ſome Allyes, or perhaps hoping really to obtaine a Peace, and by the eaſe both of expence, and vſe of ſo many ſouldiers on the frontier of ſo great an Enemie as the Grand Seigniour, to effect with more expedition their vniuerſe ends; there was in the month of Iune, in the yeare 1625, a Gentleman diſpatched from the Vice-Re of Naples, in a Frigot of the Spaniſh King, accompanied with ſix or ſeuen ſeruants, with Commiſſion to go to Conſtantinople; and being there arriued, to deliuer certaine Letters of ouerture of a Peace betweene the Grand Seigniour and the King of Spaine. To aſſiſt him in his negotiation, there was ſent by ſeuerall wayes a Benedict Frier called

A called Padre Berill,& a Greek brought vp in the colledge at Rome,called Cannachi Roſſi,both practiſed in the ways of that court,& formerly imployd in other ſeruices of intelligence and exploration. Their Inſtructions were forked ; theſe to practiſe on the Greeke church,to ſupplant the Patriark:and if both the treaty & their machinations ſhould faile,to attempt to raiſe the Coſſacks, by promiſe of a ſum of mony, to trouble the grand Seignior, & to diuert his forces & reſolution from aſſiſting the Prince of Tranſyluania in Hungarie, as ſhal be at large mentioned in a ſubſequent diſcourſe. The gentleman was born a Bologneſe,& had ſerued Gaſparo Gratiani,late Prince of Walachia,and by that means had ſome experience and acquaintance at the Port. On the way he gaue himſelfe out for an Embaſſadour, which raiſed more rumour, and gaue warning to thoſe who were diſaffected to the ſucceſſe of his vndertakings.
B But before we relate how he proceeded,it wil giue ſome light to later negotiations,to looke a little higher, vpon what ground and occaſion this enterpriſe was aduanced.

The State of Spaine hauing often (but eſpecially when it was preſſed with any neceſſitie) practiſed to make a Peace with the Turkiſh Empire; particularly by the mediation of a Iew taking the name of Gabriel de Buona Ventura,who was ſent with Letters and Inſtructions from Chriſtophero de Mora and Catagneo the Secretary in the time of Rodulphus the ſecond, who had then warre with Sultan Morat: whoſe enterpriſe being diſcouered at Vienna, was by that Emperour interrupted. In the yeare 1619, the Baron Molart being then Embaſſadour from the Emperour Ferdinand, he diſpatched firſt a Captaine called Franciſco, and after him Padre Antonio Berill, with Inſtructions of one tenour, vnto the Duke of Oſſuna then Vice-
C King of Naples. The ſubſtance was, that he found the opportunitie faire, and the Turkes well inclined to make a generall Peace with the Houſe of Auſtria; that therefore this ſeaſon was not to be omitted,but that the duke ſhould preſently diſpeed to him ſome man of quality and wit to aſſiſt, and fit to mannage ſo great a buſineſſe : That this man ſo choſen, ſhould not take on him as directly ſent from Spaine; becauſe it would then be expected,that hee ſhould appeare as an Embaſſadour: which would require great expence in preſents and traine, and waſte much time in ceremonie. Thus the Negotiation would be moſt properly and expeditely perfected by him and the Embaſſadour of Cæſar, becauſe in the Capitulation of 1606, betweene the Emperour and the Grand Seigniour, it was expreſſely cautioned, That it might be lawfull for the King of Spaine to enter into that Treaty, or to be compriſed, if it pleaſed D him. To theſe Inſtructions were added diuers reaſons and examples; and diuers accuſations againſt the Venetians and Hollanders; but the cardinall argument was, That by obtaining this Peace the King of Spaine might with ſecuritie ſubdue his Rebels, and finiſh his conqueſts, and defend his Indies from the feare of inuaſion, threatened after the expiration of the Truce in Holland. Some other ouertures were made in theſe Inſtructions, and reaſons to enforce them, which the modeſtie of Hiſtorie ought to omit. But this negotiation, being inuolued in that of the Emperour, and depending of it, which ſucceeded not according to their expectation, fell before it was ripe. Yet the reaſon continuing, to ſhut that backe-port, when their armes were buſied with other deſignes, the ſame practiſe was renewed, by the mediation of another Portugal Iew called Cormaro; who went into Spaine in the yere 1624, E and was thence returned to Naples, and from him and his offers occaſion was taken to ſend this Bologneſe to the Port. Who being now arriued at Conſtantinople,tooke firſt ſanctuarie in the houſe of the Agent of the Emperour : where meeting with Berill and Roſſi, and conſulting which way to lay or begin their buſineſſe,they at laſt reſolued to worke by the Agent,to whom they were addreſſed, and not to diſcouer themſelues vntill they ſaw how the generall propoſition was taſted. Their Inſtructions were framed of fiue Articles : To moue a perpetuall 1 Peace betweene the King of Spaine and the Ottoman Empire. To induce the acceptance 2 whereof, to offer to ſet free all the Turkiſh ſlaues, to the number of foure hundred, which were then in the Spaniſh captiuitie. To vndertake and promiſe to ſecure the ſubiects of the 3 Grand Seigniour from all loſſe or ſpoyle in the Mediterran ſea, and to keepe the coaſts and F ſhores from all inuaſion. To vndertake by the Red-Sea to ſerue all the Empire with the riches 4 and commodities of Eaſt-India, at better rates than they did buy of the Engliſh and Hollander, and in them to aduance the Cuſtomes eighty thouſand dollars yearely. Laſtly, That the King of Spaine ſhould oblige himſelfe to procure the King of Poland to reſtraine 5 the Coſſackes from their vſuall excurſions in the Euxine ſea. Theſe were amplified with many reaſons, arguments, and accuſations; but in the concluſion reſtrained, That if they ſaw G no probabilitie to obtaine and aſſure the Peace, that then Berill ſhould proceed to prouoke the Coſſackes, and this Gentleman ſhould not appeare in the Negotiation, but reſide in the houſe of the Emperours Agent, vnder the name of his Secretarie, vntill further direction.

When theſe Propoſitions were firſt moued, the ſpacious ſhew made them acceptable; but when the particulars were weighed, eſpecially that offer, To keepe the ſea and coaſts of the Mediterran free from any ſpoyle or inuaſion; the Vizier moued a queſtion, Whether the King of Spaine were ſoueraigne Lord of the Duke of Florence and the Grand Maſter of Malta? and if not, How he could command them, or reſtraine the Knights of Saint Stephano and Malta, who were Religious Orders, and ſworne enemies to the Port? To this obiection receiuing no cleere and ſatisfactorie anſwer, the Vizier began to miſtruſt, and to demurre. But H delayes (which are vſuall in that Court) nor ſuting with the account which this Bologneſe was bound to render to the Duke of Oſſuna, of his ſucceſſe, Either to aſſure a Peace, or not to loſe the opportunitie of a diuerſion by the Coſſackes; cauſed him to attempt both at once, and to employ Padre Berill to execute his part: Who being taken in Siliſtra on ſuſpition, by the Baſſa Diach-Mehemet, and his Letters opened, the Spaniſh friendſhip was diſcouered; and the Bologneſe ſtole himſelfe out of the Countrey, and as it was reported, was at his returne impriſoned, for the vanitie of entituling himſelfe as a publique Miniſter, and venting his Maſters name in ſo great a Theatre. And the Agent of Cæſar aſſiſted to accuſe him; who not able to containe him within the limits of his Commiſſion, but that he would breake out, and diſpute that he ought perſonally, in the name of the Vice-Re to treat with the I Vizier; threatening to cauſe his penſion from Spaine to be retrenched, as cold in the ſeruice of that Crowne; the ciuile ſtrife proceeded from heat to blowes: and it was beleeued, That the Agent vnder-hand both haſtened his flight, and procured his puniſhment.

The ill and diſgracefull ſucceſſe of this attempt, and the diſſention betweene Miniſters ſo ſtrictly obliged by common ends, made many men beleeue, that the wiſe ſtate of Spain would not againe raſhly and ſuddenly engage their reputation to a ſecond ſcorne. But Feare and Neceſſitie, that obey no rules, enforced as it ſeemes the Vice-King of Naples (for all theſe practiſes were maſqued vnder his name) to doe a ſeruice that would be moſt acceptable when it was done. For the rumour, That the Prince of Tranſyluania did prepare an armie, and that the Grand Seigniour had giuen order to the frontier Baſſa's to aſſiſt him; and that the K Count of Mansfelt, and Duke Weymar were expected with their troupes to ioyne with him; this collegation appeared terrible, and to threaten Vienna it ſelfe: and therefore it was iudged the beſt counſell, openly to offer a Peace, to amuſe or ſeparate the Force of the Turke, or vnder the ſhadow of a Treaty, to ſteale away the firſt opportunitie of action. So that contra-1626. rie to all expectation, ſuddenly in Aprill of this yere, it was aduiſed from Raguſa, That there was there arriued in a Galliot of Naples, another Mercury, a Spaniſh Gentleman, that openly auowed himſelfe to be directly ſent from the Vice-Re, to offer a Peace to the Grand Seigniour, and to prepare the acceptance of Embaſſadours or Commiſſioners fit to treat it. Hee was well attended, and furniſhed with exchange, and earneſtly recommended from the Vice-King to the Senate of that City. At his firſt landing he made grauitie, and expected ſome L ceremonies and reception: but thoſe ſmall States, who are like a graine betweene two milſtones, thinking their greateſt ſafety conſiſted in taking no notice, and in being on both ſides diſintereſſed, would not vnderſtand him; and he finding himſelfe deceiued, was carried in a cloſe chaire to the Monaſterie of the Friar-Minors, and kept himſelfe priuate; onely ſending another Letter (which was written to a Vizier at the Port) to thoſe Magiſtrates, deſiring them to diſpeed it by Poſt to Conſtantinople, and to prouide him guides for his journey thither: both which were done, and two Turkes appointed to conduct him. Before his departure, he diſpatched another Currier to Belgrade to a Correſpondent there. It was likewiſe aduiſed from Raguſa, That he was laden with Preſents, and had order to ſpend freely: which was dangerous in a Court where all things were vendible: and thoſe that fauoured the de- M ſigne, triumphed, and accounted the prize alreadie wonne, nothing being more diſcourſed than the Peace betweene Spaine and Turky. As a forerunner of this negotiation, to ſmooth the wayes, there was ſpred ſome weekes before this newes, a Letter printed in Spaine, Cum Licentia, as written from the Grand Seigniour to the Catholique King; offering Peace, and

A promiſing to ſeparate from all his Enemies, and to leaue them to iuſt puniſhment, and neuer to aſſiſt or ſupport them; with a Catalogue ioyned, of an infinite Preſent that ſhould be ſent by the Turke, to procure the acceptance of this Amitie. At the firſt ſight this Letter was deſpiſed as a fiction; onely ſome contemplatiue men did make conſtruction, That it was ſpread to encourage the people of Hungarie, and to remoue the feares of the Turke, or to raiſe a jealouſie in Gabor and his Friends; eſpecially being ſeconded with a concurrent rumour, That a Miniſter really was ſent to treat Peace, and an Embaſſadour expected to follow him, that at leaſt he ſhould be receiued to gaine time. But theſe were poore ſhifts for for ſo great and wiſe a State: yet whatſoeuer the purpoſe was, whether it was a counterfeit, or directed to ſome end, it was taken vp and vſed as an inſtrument to reiect the Embaſſage, and to prohibit B the Bearer to approch the Court: For whether it fell into the hand of a Moore-Franke expelled Spain, or were made vſe of by any that deſired to croſſe the concluſion of ſuch a Peace, in ſuch a coniuncture, ſo dangerous to many Princes and States, it was ſhewed the great Vizier, and Mufti, commented vpon, and vrged as a great affront to the Grand Seigniour. At which they tooke ſo high and ſudden diſdaine, that they gaue inſtant Commands, and ſent horſemen to beat the wayes, with Commiſſion to all the Beghs and Caddees to aſſiſt them, That whereſoeuer they did meet or finde this Gentleman, that they ſhould carry him directly backe to the ſea ſide, and ſee him ſhipt; with admonition, Not to preſume to land on penaltie of death. And others to checke the Senate of Raguſa, for receiuing any Miniſter of their enemie, without asking leaue or conſulting the State.

C The Gentleman was by this time aduanced foure dayes iourney toward the Port, where he fell and brake his leg, and was carried backe in miſerable paine to Raguſa, and returned to his old lodging. Where the horſemen found him, and deliuering their Letters to the Senat, demanded to haue him giuen vp into their hands. But they refuſed to breake their Sanctuarie, and only promiſed to obey the effect of the Grand Seigniors Command, ciuilly to ſhip him, and to ſend him backe to Naples. Which was done in the preſence of thoſe Turks, and letters written by the Senat, both to the Vice-King & the Vizier, to excuſe themſelues, That they durſt diſpleaſe neither party, but deſired to liue in the grace of both Princes.

The Grand Seigniours Command to all the Sanzackes and Caddees of Greece, to returne the Spaniſh Gentleman ſent from the Vice-Re of Naples.

VPon the ſight of this our Imperiall Signature, you ſhall take notice, That the Spaniards (being alwayes antient Enemies of our happy Port, the Fountaine of Felicity) haue of late ſought to aduantage themſelues of ſome Princes which keepe good E friendſhip and correſpondence with vs: To which end the Vice-Roy of Naples did ſend the laſt yeare a Meſſenger to our Imperiall Port; intimating, That the King of Spaine was deſirous of a Peace with vs: But in regard they haue euer beene our Enemies, and that the Peace which they did then offer was fraudulent, and onely to ſerue their owne ends; wee did not vouchſafe to giue him audience, but rather reiected both himſelfe and his meſſage. And now againe we haue notice giuen vs, That there are others come to Raguſa, from the ſaid King of Spaine, about the ſame buſineſſe, with intent to come forward to our happie Port: Therefore we haue ſent Muſtapha our Capigi with our Imperiall Command, That F if any ſuch like perſons ſhall come within any of your ſeuerall Iuriſdictions, That you ſtay them, and without one houre or moment of delay deliuer them to him, to be carried forth of our Dominions, and made returne to their owne Countrey. This is a buſineſſe of very great importance, and therefore we command you to be very warie and circumſpect in ſearching out for ſuch perſons, and that you vſe no negligence or delay therein, but ſpeedily obey and put in execution this our Imperiall Command, not ſuffering any one whatſoeuer, comming either from the Vice-King of Naples, or the King of Spaine, to proceed forward toward our happy Port. And you ſhall certifie vs in writing, by the ſaid Capigi, how and in what manner you haue executed our Command. And if any ſuch perſons comming from the Vice-King of Naples, or King of Spaine, haue any Letters or writings, you ſhall take them from them, and ſend them to our happy Port. And after you ſhall haue ſeene and vnderſtood this our Command, you ſhall giue faith and credit to it, and reſtore it againe to our Slaue Muſtapha Capigi.

Another of the ſame Tenour was ſent by the ſame Meſſenger to the Commonwealth of Raguſa.

The Princeſſe of Tranſyluania elected to ſucceed the Prince in that Prouince.

About the ſixth of September, the Prince of Tranſyluania ſent a Poſt in great expedition to the Port, with Letters and Inſtructions to his Agent there; the ſubſtance whereof was reduced to two heads; Firſt, to declare to the Grand Seignior, That his Eſtates in their Dyet, by his conſent, had elected his Lady to the ſucceſſion of that Principalitie: and to require the confirmation, according to the antient Rites and Capitulations betweene them. For his ſudden reſolution, without conſulting the Grand Seigniour, and in excuſe of the ſex, he propoſed many reaſons, all directed to one ſcope: That the encreaſe of the Houſe of Auſtria was ſo dangerous to all Germany, that it was requiſite to prouide for Tranſyluania, to preuent the corruptions of an Inter Regnum, wherein the Imperials might worke diſtemper and diuiſion: and therefore it was neceſſarie that a Succeſſour ſhould be declared, and in poſſeſſion; and one well allyed and ſtrengthened by the Princes oppoſite to the Auſtrians; which conditions meeting in his wife, made her without all exception. That this election was paſſed with the conſent and in contemplation of his Allyes and friends of the Port, and vnder their aſſurance of protection. And that therefore he ſhould vrge the Grand Seignior to concurre and to approue his care, employed onely to preuent and humble the Common Enemie. Secondly, That whereas then ſix yeares paſt, when he liued in peace, without offence of the Emperour, he had beene commanded by the Grand Seignior to moue his Armes, and to prouoke an Enemie, now become irreconcileable: Which Councell had been continued vntill that time, by the moſt experienced Miniſters of the Turkiſh Empire; and Letters ſent him the yeare before of the ſame tenour; and that he had lately required a plaine approbation of his proſecution of thoſe deſignes, which being formerly indifferent, were now become neceſſary: And to perſuade them, not to loſe this opportunitie of confining the Emperour for euer within Germany, and ſetling an aſſured peace and ſafety to the Turkiſh frontier; that was by his conqueſt of Hungary. That if he found any difficultie in either of theſe, That the ſucceſſion were refuſed to his Lady, or ſuccours to him to proſecute the war; that he ſhould vnmaske, and plainely proteſt, That he had been engaged firſt by the Grand Seigniour, and made confederation with many friends, with his conſent and approbation, too late to be reuoked, and his owne honour ſo farre thereby expoſed, that he could not retire, but would prouide for his owne ſafety. Therefore, as he would pay his tribute, and continue his faith; ſo, if they would leaue him to himſelfe, they muſt not diſdaine the like meaſure in their occaſions, from him and his Friends.

His Letters and meſſages were roundly deliuered to the Miniſters of the Grand Seignior; and a generall anſwer giuen, That for the ſucceſſion they would conſult and reſolue to his fit ſatisfaction; and that a Letter ſhould be preſently written to approue the antient Councels. The Agent not content with that coldneſſe, nor well diſcerning the times, preſſed the Vizier to a more direct and particular anſwer.

But in the inſtant there arriued newes from Babylon, That the Campe was riſen and fled, by

A by the fauour of the night, forced to burne their Tents and prouiſions, and to breake their great Artillerie, and caſt it into the Euphrates; That the miſeries in the Army had been ſuch as men in the field neuer ſuffered (conſumed by famin, and ſuffocated by heat: by this, twelue thouſand died in one day; the other might be iudged by the price of a buſhell of barly; ſold for thirty eight checquines of gold.) That the Great Vizier had beheaded three of the moſt valiant Baſſa's, hoping thereby to caſt the enuy of his ſhame vpon them: and, That retyring to * Moſul, the Perſian vſed his victorie, and following a flying Army, did continuall execution for ten dayes vpon the Reare. So great a blow the Turkiſh Empire neuer receiued; the newes whereof was taken with ſo much ſadneſſe, that it was no ſeaſon to treat of making new warres. The Emperours Agent made vſe of this deiection, and oppoſed all the B Tranſyluanian negotiations diametrally, and promiſed the preſent comming of a great Embaſſadour to ratifie the Peace betweene the Grand Seigniour and his Maſter. And the Turks knew not whom to beleeue, weakened in ſpirit by their ſucceſſe and the preſent conſtitution; Futuri ambiguus, & magis quid vitaret quàm cui fideret certus; doubtfull of the future, and rather certaine what to auoyd, than whom to truſt. Wherefore the Prince of Tranſyluania's Agent reſolued, not to prouoke by an importune preſſure, a diſpairefull anſwer; but to giue them time to recollect ad gather heart, and to accept of their generall Letters, with a promiſe from the Chimacham annexed, That as ſoone as a few days of conſultation and prouiſion for their affaires in Aſia were paſt, that he would enter into a particular conſideration of his Maſter, and giue him ample content in them; and that in the mean time he might proceed cheerefully.

C The Baſſa of Buda in the meane time ſent a Poſt to the Port, with certaine newes of the arriuall of the Duke of Weymar and Count Manſfelt in Sileſia; and that the Prince of Tranſyluania was riſen to ioyne with them, hauing mutually exchanged and ſent ſome Troupes one to the other; and that himſelfe was marched neere Vatz, to conferre with the Prince in his paſſage, to reſolue together of the proſecution of their deſignes. Whereupon the Emperours Agent at the Port made violent exclamations; proteſted the breach of Peace, and vſed ſome ſcandalous arguments againſt the Friends of the Prince, begged, threatened, and enforced all his powers to diuert or affright the Chimacham; who knew no more than was infuſed into him, and for the moſt part beleeued the laſt man, or as his feares guided him. D This cauſed ſome ſtop of the diſpatch of the inueſtiture of the Princeſſe of Tranſyluania, and other negotiations of the Prince: And the Agent had procured a Letter from the Grand Seigniour to his Maſter the Emperour, of excuſe; yet referring all concluſion, if they ſought Peace, to a treaty with the Prince of Tranſyluania and Morteſa Baſſa of Buda. Other Letters were diſpatched to the Baſſa, to beware of impertinent actions, to occaſion an vnſeaſonable rupture: yet ſo mingled and qualified, as that they intimated, any thing would be accepted that was throughly done. Againſt the inueſtiture the Emperours Agent ſhewed all his wit and ſtrength; obiecting, That ſhe was a woman, a ſtranger, and a German. By this only he hoped to begin a diſcontent betweene the Grand Seigniour and the Prince of Tranſyluania; knowing, that the election once paſſed, would not be recalled, and that if it were not confir- E med at the Port, the Prince and Eſtates of Tranſyluania would find themſelues wronged, and their libertie encroached vpon, and perhaps ſeeke other refuge: for the Emperor would willingly haue accepted any returne or aſpect towards him. But the art, to ſow a diſſention, or to entice the Prince to depend vpon the Emperour, and to take of him that which he could not obtaine at the Port, being at large opened to the great Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour, it was againe reſolued to diſpatch the Grant, and to ſend the Embaſſadour with vſuall ceremonies: who was to depart within ſix dayes.

The Duke of Weymar and Count Manſfelt arriue in Sileſia with an army.

The Prince of Tranſyluania being vnited with Morteſa Baſſa of Buda, diſpatched from his Campe at Zetzen aboue Nouegrade, a Currier to the Grand Seigniour; aduiſing, That Walſtain, and Iſterhas Palatine of Hungarie, were drawne vp with their Army to oppoſe his F proceedings, and to keepe him from ioyning with Count Manſfelt. Who ſent to him a gentleman to know the cauſe of his entring the Imperiall Dominions; and profeſſing they came as friends, and offering many conditions, deſired that order might be giuen to both their Armies to retyre a dayes iourney, and betweene them a place aſſigned for Commiſſioners to meet and conſider of ſome accommodation. To whom the Prince anſwered, He had no purpoſe to vſurpe any thing in Hungary, but onely to deliuer them from the tyranny of the Germans, and to relieue his Allyes oppreſſed, whom he could not betray; nor had hee any power to treat with them. The Armies being neere, and parties abroad, did occaſion ſome blowes, and great skirmiſhes for two dayes; wherein on both ſides ſome bloud was ſpilt, the Prince taking himſelfe to haue the better, hauing gotten twenty ſix German Launciers priſoners, and ſome light Hungarian horſemen; and that Walſtein the third day retyred fiue Dutch miles, and fortified himſelfe at Wiuar. This faction was begun upon the fifth of October. Vpon the Enemies remoue, Meſſengers did mutually paſſe betweene the Prince and Count Mansfelt, and appointment made for their ſecure meeting the third day after: Vpon which, Gabor promiſed to follow the Imperials, and to attempt them. Morteſa Baſſa made an offer to ſet downe before Nouegrade; but was withdrawne by the prince, not to ſpend time before a town, & loth to giue it to the Turks. He wrot, That Count Mansfelt had made agreement with the cities of Sileſia, all ports being open to him; & that he paſſed without any offence, and had brought with him ſome Deputies from Breſlaw and the Nobilitie of that prouince. That all the ſtrong places of Hungarie had ſent to him, That they would not aid the Emperour againſt him, if he committed no ſpoyle; and were ready to receiue and obey him, if he were Maſter of the field, and able to protect them: And therefore he had now deſired a Command from the Grand Seigniour to the Baſſa of Buda, that hee might not retyre (according to the Turks vſe) but winter with him; leſt his Allyes thereby diſcouraged, the opportunitie of his part ſhould be loſt, and a faire entrance opened to the Emperour to follow a reuenge. The Grand Seigniour, who formerly was ſo wary and backeward to conſent to any breach, being now vnawares engaged, Lupum auribus tenens, holding the Wolfe by the eares, without ſcruple granted his deſire, and the Orders were ſent away; That what was done being paſt recall, Morteſa ſhould Winter with the prince of Tranſyluania, and not retyre without his conſent, but in all things follow his direction: yet limited according to their neceſſities and the nature of feare, full of caution, not to aduenture vpon vncertaine grounds, with power & inſinuation to make a Peace, if profitable and ſafe Conditions ſhould be propounded.

The army of the Imperials defeated by the Prince of Tranſiluania's Troupes.

At length Count Mansfelt ioyned with the prince of Tranſyluania and Morteſa Baſſa, hauing vnder his command ſouldiers, but miſerably worne out with a long march (and diuided with the Duke of Weymar, who ſtayed in Sileſia) without any munition or fit Armes: which diſcouraged Gabor, who expected ſuccours, but found (as he pretended) a charge: yet as they were they reſolued to ſet vpon the Army of Walſtein neere the riuer Gran the ſixteenth of October; which retyring continually vpon the paſſage of the water, they fell on, and made a great diſorder, and tooke many priſoners, whoſe heads they afterwards cut off. Walſtein being not able to ſuſtaine their fury, after this loſſe plainely fled. Whereupon the Vantgard of the prince of Tranſyluania followed him, and had ſlaughter of his Reare all the way betweene Gran and Vaghe; which riuer the Enemy paſſing vpon two bridges of boats, there was a new fight begun, and many of the Imperials cut off: his Troupes entering the bridges peſle meſle with them, got the paſſage, and hauing ſlaine a great many, put all the Army into greater feare: ſo that now they were reſolued to follow them euen to the gates of Presburg and Vienna, as they wrote to the Port.

Notwithſtanding this good ſucceſſe of the prince againſt the Imperialiſts, hee in the beginning of Ianuarie (by reaſon of the hardneſſe of the Winter, and that he receiued not ſuch ſupplies of contribution from his Allyes as he expected, and the Turkes verie deſirous of a peace with the Emperour, by reaſon of their warres in Aſia againſt the Perſian) ſent a Meſſenger to the Emperour, excuſing his taking vp of Armes, vpon the vnperformance of ſome Articles in his late Treaty, and the not ſending an Embaſſadour to the Port; aſſuming the neceſſitie of obedience, and offering to make a Truce for three moneths, and to diſpatch Commiſſioners to the Emperour, to mediate the concluſion of peace with the Grand Seigniour. To which he receiued anſwer, That if firſt he did not diſmiſſe the Turkes, and ſeparate himſelfe from Count Mansfelt and his Troupes (with whom hee would admit no parle, nor make any accommodation) hee would giue no audience to any that came from him. Vpon which anſwer the prince returned to Caſſouia, and Morteſa Baſſa to Peſth.

Count Mansfelt alſo returning toward the State of Venice, in his way thither died at

Boſna-

The death of Count Manſfelt and duke Erneſt.

A Boſna-Seray neere Spalato in Dalmatia: the newes whereof comming to Duke Iohn Erneſtus, already weakened with a Feuer fourteene dayes, he alſo fell into an Apoplexy, and died at Turocz in the North part of Hungarie, where he was quartered for the Winter. His body was opened, and not one drop of bloud found, but his heart withered to the ſmalneſſe of a Nut.

The Prince of Tranſyluania's excuſe for making a Truce with the Emperour.

The Agent of the prince of Tranſyluania, in excuſe of his Maſter for this ſudden defection, had order to declare vnto the Embaſſadours of his friends and Allyes at the Port, That the Truce with the Emperor was not made by his Maſter alone, but by a conſultation, where were preſent a Commiſſioner of the King of Denmarke, Duke Iohn Erneſt, Count Manſfelt, and diuers Deputies of the prouinces of Morauia and Sileſia; and the generall conſent of the B Councell of War induced thereunto for theſe reaſons: Firſt, Becauſe the Baſſa of Buda was expreſſely commanded to retyre; who muſt obey, vntill he could better informe the Grand Seigniour, and if poſſible, incline him to the warre. Secondly, Being to enter into conſideration, if the Turkes by no meanes could be induced to continue their Aids, that time might be gained to acquaint the Confederates with their eſtate, and to conſult with them, of means to proſecute the Enemie with their owne Forces: and to that purpoſe, that Count Manſfelt had taken his voyage toward Venice. Laſtly, the neceſſitie of drawing to garriſon, beeing a Truce in effect, they thought it no preiudice to aduantage themſelues by one in words. That vpon the eighth day of Decmber the Embaſſadour of the King of Denmarke returned to his Countrie, fully ſatisfied and informed of all their proceedings and Councels; in which C it was concluded to re-inforce their troupes in the Spring, by the aſſiſtance of the Barons of Morauia and Sileſia, whoſe Deputies were ſent purpoſely to enter into the Confederacie, promiſing to ioyne their Forces with them: and that in Iune following the Prince would draw into the field, and march directly into Auſtria, to make that prouince the ſeat of the warre; where it was promiſed that the King of Denmarke ſhould meet him, and vnite their Armies, by which meanes onely they hoped to finiſh the miſeries of Chriſtendome.

The Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour hauing made a great complaint vnto his Maieſties Embaſſadour reſident at the Port, That ſome of his Maieſties ſubiects had robbed ſome of the Grand Seigniours in the Red. Sea, for which they required reſtitution according to the Capitulations of peace. Whereupon his Maieſties Embaſſadour writ this Letter to them as D followeth:

To all Admirals, Captaines, and other Commanders of Engliſh Ships, Subiects of his moſt ſacred Maieſtie, trading or nauigating in the Red-Seas.

AFter my hearty commendations and greetings; Theſe are to let you know, That Haydar Baſſa of Ayman hath giuen information to the Grand Seignior, That ſome Engliſh Ships in com- E pany with Hollanders, haue ſurpriſed diuers Indian Ships, wherein (as they pretend) were many Merchants and Subiects of the Grand Seigniour; and haue taken their goods, contrarie to the Peace and Amitie betweene his Maieſtie and the Grand Seigniour. Which Information (we being aſſured of your diſcretion, and well knowing you haue no ſuch authoritie from his Maieſtie, nor any other deriued from his Royall power) although we hope it is falſe, and that you no way haue exceeded your commiſſions & inſtructions, yet the lament of thoſe parts being vehement & many (wherin the grand Seignior hath complained by his letters to his Maieſty purpoſely written, demanding iuſtice of ſuch actions) and to preuent the proſecution of ſuch courſes, contrarie to the Peace, and being thereunto ſolicited by the Chimacham, as a meanes to auoid all occaſion of breach betweene both Nations, I haue thought fit to ſend you theſe our Letters of Aduice, to put you in minde, exhort, and require F you, That you be very heedfull, not to giue iuſt occaſion of offence and ſcandall, nor that you take or make prize of any ſhips or goods belonging to any ſubiect of the Grand Seigniour, contrarie to the Peace, Amitie, and Capitulations of his Maieſtie for free commerce. Wherein you are wiſely to conſider the conſequences of this buſineſſe, and of our trade in the Grand Seigniors Dominion; and that his Maieſtie will do iuſtice vpon all ſuch as interrupt the publique Peace. We further deſire you to examine the truth of ſuch accuſation, and to make certificate to me, of all the late proceedings of our Ships in thoſe parts, that I may be able to giue a reaſon, and to anſwer for you, according to my dutie; that all our trouble here (which may be of great conſequence) may be auoided: And for the future, exhorting you to do no action or violence to any of the Subiects of the Grand Seigniour, contrarie to the Peace, for that ſuch is his Maieſties will and pleaſure. And ſo I bid you heartily farewell.

Giuen in Conſtantinople the nineteenth day of Ianuarie, 1626.

Although the Prince of Tranſyluania kept his Army in their Hybernation, and that the Grand Seigniour had giuen order (at the inſtance of ſome of his Miniſters, fauorers of peace) to recall Morteſa Baſſa of Buda from his gouernment; yet it was moſt cleere, euident, and vndiſputable, that the Prince did with all ſinceritie endeauour to continue the warre, notwithſtanding his Treaty, made for neceſſitie, and referred for ratification to the Grand Seignior. His priuate negotiatiation with the Capi-Aga and Caſlar-Aga, not communicated to any, and the good effect it wrought, was ſufficient teſtimonie of his conſtancie and inward purpoſes: and vpon the death of Duke Iohn Erneſtus, that Army being in want and almoſt in mutinie, he releiued them, and gaue them two moneths pay, one in meale, butter, honey, cheeſe, barley, and other victuals, and the other in mony; aſſuring them that they ſhould uot want, vntill both meanes and orders came from the Princes, to whom the Count of Mansfelt was diſpatched. This the Prince writ to the Port, as a greater argument (becauſe chargeable) of his deſire to oblige them; which if he meant peace, had been caſt away. But after the death of the old Chimacham (protector of him and all his actions) the Emperours friends wrought vpon the pretended patriots, and conuerted their feare into a ſeeming ſinceritie and care of auoiding an engagement in a double war: who finding the State entangled in the troubles of Aſia, made that the foundation, not only to diſpute againſt any other, but to threaten the contradictors of their opinion. Theſe for the moſt part were men popular, but vtterly ignorant of the preſent conditiõ & affairs of Hungary; yet they ſo far preuailed (quod in ſeditionibus accedit vnde pulres erant omnes fuere, which hapneth in tumults where many are, al men run) that the Vizier, to ſatisfie them, was enforced to command the retreit of Morteſa. Theſe things hapning in the inſtant when they concluded to diſpatch a new Vizier, & to raiſe the ſoldierie to follow him, there was no time to ſpeake of another enemie, and thoſe wiſe men could do but one thing at once. But the zeale of this Councell laſting no longer than while it was blowne by Cæſars Miniſters, and that the ſupply of Aſia was reſolued, and the Grand Seigniour being fully informed by Gabors laſt Letters, which threatened as much on the other ſide, That if that opportunitie were loſt, and that the Houſe of Auſtria ſhould poſſeſſe Germany; or at the beſt, the Princes colleagued take the example and make peace, hee muſt expect a ſharpe inuaſion and reuenge, then when he ſhould haue no friends, and their Army buſied in Aſia: vrging the neere allyance of the Emperor with the King of Poland, the inſtigation of the Pope, and whatſoeuer might beget a feare that they ſhould be incloſed with enemies. This admonition taught them the wiſedome to be content to keepe their Oppoſite exerciſed at anothers charge; and though as yet they durſt not, or would not ſo openly declare, as to pull the war vpon themſelues, yet they found it neceſſarie to be contiuued, and therefore they reſolued to temporiſe, and to auoid a preſent extremitie, by the colour of the Truce. In the meane time to leaue Bethlem Gabor at his libertie, and to obſerue how the Princes proceeded to maintaine and ſupply their Troupes; meaning to ſtep in when they ſhould ſee their Armie in the field. To this purpoſe Morteſa Baſſa was re-eſtabliſhed in his gouernment, and the buſineſſe ſo carried with him, that he ſhould make no ſhew of mouing, vntill the time fit to take horſe; and that then he ſhould haue leaue and command to correſpond with Gabor according to the occaſion.

A Dutch Gentleman diſpeeded to the port by the Emperor, diſguiſed in French attyre.

The Emperour hauing had notice of theſe counſels and deſignes, diſpaiched a Dutch gentleman toward the Port, with Letters and Inſtructions to his Agent and Friends there; and commanded him to make his iourney by the way of Raguſa, giuing it out that he was a French man, leſt he ſhould be diſcouered in the ſhorter way by Buda, and ſtopped, and his papers and Inſtructions ſearched. Notwithſtanding all this diſguiſe, notice came to the Port

before-

A beforehand of the comming of this Meſſenger; and the Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour cauſed him at his arriuall to be confined, not ſuffering him to deliuer any Letters: the Vizier forcing him to decipher his Letter to the Emperours Agent in his preſence, not truſting him with his owne ſecret. The ſubſtance whereof was vehement complaint againſt the Prince of Tranſyluania; accuſing him to be the author of all the troubles and diſcontents of the frontier. That ſince his aduancement it was not poſſible to maintaine the Peace, nor that Amity which was contracted betweene their kingdoms; intimating a deſire to haue him depoſed, as a perturber of the world. Expoſtulating the mouing of thoſe new Armes and the preparations of the Baſſa of Buda. He had Letters likewiſe to the Grand Seignior, but was not ſuffered to deliuer them: but they reſolued to ſend him backe to Buda, there to open his B meſſage, and if it ſhould ſeeme fit to Bethlem Gabor and the Baſſa to treat peace, that then an Embaſſadour from the Emperour ſhould be accepted, but no inferiour perſon, nor querelous Letters. Thus it was plotted to the aduice of Gabor; who gaue this counſell, that he might in all occaſion both know the ſecret, and direct the anſwer, and by making himſelfe ſeeme neceſſarie to the Turkes, he guided all their reſolutions to his owne ends. On the other ſide, Morteſa Baſſa hauing had notice, that a meſſenger was ſtollen by, and arriued & heard at the Port, ſent a Poſt with Letters, complaining, That he ſhould haue any entertainment there, or was admitted any audience: That if the Grand Seigniour had with confidence really referred the concluſion of peace or warre to Bethlem Gabor and himſelfe, all other Treaty was impertinent and hurtfull, and might produce vncertaintie or contrarietie in the reſolution; deſiring
C that he might be diſmiſſed inſtantly and ſent to him, becauſe one of the Imperial commiſſioners being arriued at Comara, had aduertiſed, That they could not enter into conference vntill the returne of this Meſſenger. Whereupon the Vizier diſpeeded him without any anſwer to the Emperour, or Treaty, or other reſolution than that which was formerly mentioned; rather taking from him, than receiuing his Letters; only a Fede for his diſcharge was giuen him, that he had brought and preſented them, but comming from the country of an Enemie, they could not be accepted. Thus he was ſent to Morteſa by a Chaus, and with him an anſwer to the Baſſa, That his negotiation was wholly referred to him and the prince of Tranſyluania; with this caution, That he ſhould protract, and beware to be raſhly ingaged in an open warre.

D About the one and twentieth of Aprill newes came to the Port from Cairo, ſignifying
the reuolt of Gemen in Arabia, vnder a pretending prince whom they call an Ayman or Prieſt: That he had ouerrunne the Countrey, and beſieged the Baſſa in the principall Citie.
To whoſe reliefe the Baſſa of Cairo had ſent by Suachim in the Red-Sea three thouſand ſoldiers;
but it was aduiſed, That if more ſuccours were not ſupplied, that the Holy Countrey would be loſt. This cauſed frequent Councels, and did much trouble the State; eſpecially the feare of Mecha, Medina, and the deuotions of their Prophet. The great Vizier arriued at Aleppo, but complained for men, munition, and money: to raiſe the firſt, the Viziers of the Bench were ſent abroad; one to Greece, another to Natolia, a third to Tartarie, others to other places; inſomuch as the City was left deſolate. Munition was aduentured by ſea to E Scanderone; and mony extorted from the poorer (per fas & nefas) or drawne from rich ſubiects (precario) to concurre to aſſiſt in the publique want.

A dead ſilence now poſſeſſed all things; and there was little newes from the Prince of Tranſyluania, how he proceeded, nor what he purpoſed: only the tripartite Commiſſioners were met at Comaran, where they treated; and the generall inclination of the Miniſters at the Port being wholly bent to peace, they aduiſed Morteſa ſecretly, and excuſed themſelues to Gabor vpon the Mufti; whoſe feares the Imperials had made the ground of their hopes, and that Councel. But it ſeemes it was reſolued at leaſt, not to breake; the Emperors Commiſſioners preſſing a reſolution on the one ſide, and Gabor on the other raiſing new difficulties, and endeauouring to diſſolue the Treaty, and to leaue the occaſion of the war open F to time and opportunitie. The Turkes being driuen vp in a ſtreight how to pleaſe both, fell at laſt vpon the Prince, accuſing him, That he had in December before treated apart, and made his owne peace with the Emperour, vpon conditions to his owne aduantage, without conſulting the Port: which was true; for vpon the retreit of his Army, and the diſpaire of the forces of Count Mansfelt, (which hee found weakened by a long march) and the diſ-

union of the Generals, he had treated and ſigned Articles; but as he pretended, they were G concluded in a Councell, with the conſent of his Friends or their miniſters: which as hee could not directly deny, ſo he did not abſolutely confeſſe; tempering what he had done, with diuers conditions; of the declaration, of the conſent of his Allyes, and the ratification of the Grand Seigniour. This Treaty was noyſed and bruted from Vienna, and the copy ſent to Conſtantinople purpoſely to diſcredit him: ſo that it was no more a ſecret; and thereupon the Prince diſpatched a Poſt to his Embaſſadour, to ſatisfie thoſe who might except againſt him: profeſſing not onely what he had done apart by neceſſitie, and for want of ſupplies, but that he would proceed in the generall Treaty: becauſe there was no other way to vnblinde the Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour; who ſo much affected the aſſurance of the Border, that they would not beleeue any arguments, as ſauoring of other intereſts, but that he would H at the conuention raiſe ſo many rocks and impoſſibilities, as that the breach of the conference ſhould be the beginning of the warre, and a bond of neceſſitie in the Turkes to partake in it. The Emperour remaining ſtill iealous of delayes, ſent another meſſenger to the Port, with a ſecond complaint againſt Bethlem Gabor and Morteſa Baſſa, as the diſturbers of the antient Truce; and an expreſſion of his feruent deſire to maintaine a good peace with the Ottoman Empire, which he ſaid could neuer be ſecured, vnleſſe the Grand Seigniour ſhould place ſuch Miniſters in the frontier gouernments, as were louers of the publique quiet. For the eſtabliſhing whereof he had ſent his Deputies to meet thoſe of the Port, who hauing agreed (as he pretended) vpon Articles, and reconciled all differences, that he was ready to ſend a great Embaſſadour thither, to confirme whatſoeuer ſhould there be concluded. This was done I onely to get an acceptance of ſome perſon of Qualitie to be preſent at the Port; which Gabor and Morteſa Baſſa hindred, to keepe that State without any light but ſuch as they pleaſed to giue them. But it being obiected to the Meſſenger by the Vizier, That the Emperor had made a Peace apart with the Prince, and that therefore he had obtained his ends without the communication of the Grand Seigniour, which gaue much ſuſpition of ſiniſter purpoſes, the Emperours Meſſenger did not deny but that there was ſome ſuch thing done; but that his Maſter did not truſt in it, nor could euer reſt ſecure in the word of that Prince, vnleſſe the authoritie of the Port did ſtrengthen it. In concluſion, feare on the one part to loſe an opportunitie of peace; the death of Mansfelt, ſome diſaſters of the Friends of the Prince in Germanie, and the failing of aids expected, all concurring on the other part, made both ſoften and K decline, and reſolue to take care onely of their owne affaires, and to leaue the World at libertie.

The Captaine Baſſa diſpatched with an Armado into the Black-ſea.

The Captaine Baſſa was ſent vp to the Euxine ſea with a gallant fleet for flagges and ſtreamers, reſolute to attempt the ſhutting in of the Coſſacks by building two Forts on the outlets of the Boriſthenes: who prepared to reſiſt him, and were intrenched neere his expected deſcent. The Poles made ſome braues, That they would aſſiſt them, and maintaine their Frontier, as Lords of that ground: but it was not beleeued they would hazard their peace with the Grand Seigniour, by fighting with his Generall, but rather conniue till he ſhould be returned, and then to raze and ouerthrow what was raiſed, and excuſe it vpon their outlaws. This enterpriſe was like to coſt ſome knockes; but as matters then ſtood, the Poles were not L in ſtate to make any great progreſſe, the King of Sweden hauing diuerted them to their owne defence in Pruſſia: yet howſoeuer they reſolued in this particular, they muſt keepe an Army on foot, leſt they tempted the Enemie to vſe the occaſion.

While all the ſea forces were imployed in this deſigne, the Arches were left vngarded, and 6 gallies of the great duke of Tuſcany came to the mouth of the Helleſpont, & took one Gallion and many leſſer ſhips of the Cairo fleet; the booty whereof by report amounted to ſome millions of dollars. This ſudden alarme cauſed the Grand Seigniour to ſend into the Blacke-Sea to recall ſome forces, and inſtantly from the Armado twelue gallies were ſpared, and diſpatched to ſeeke the Chriſtians, who were departed with their riches.

An Embaſſadour from Perſia arriueth at Aleppo.

There arriued at the ſame time a Perſian Embaſſador at Aleppo with ouertures of peace: M vpon whom the Grand Vizier put gards, neither accepting nor refuſing his meſſage; and ſent to the Port to declare, that the State muſt either furniſh him with a million and halfe of gold, and ſtore of munition, or elſe grant him a Commiſſion to entertaine that opportunitie and motion of Treaty; for with leſſe ſupplies he could not proceed. The firſt was impoſſible, A and the later much againſt the ſtomach; but a freſh aduice bringing the report of a great Embaſſadour following the former with rich Preſents, and faire offers, made many beleeue or hope a happy concluſion; though men of beſt iudgements eſteemed it very difficult, vnleſſe Babylon ſhould be ſurrendred. All men made this concluſion, That if peace could be ſetled on that ſide, the Turkes had yet ſpleene enough to reuenge the braues they had endured from the Imperials; who though they ſought a Truce, proſecuted it inſolently, threatening fire and ſword if they obtained not their deſires. And thus the Treaty at Comaran had ebbs and flouds, heats and colds, as the feare or hope of the affaires of Aſia did temper it.

The Perſian Embaſſador arriueth at the Port.

This expected Perſian Embaſſadour not long after arriued at the Port, with little hope to buy peace at a cheaper rate than the ſurrender of Babylon. And the gallies of the Grand B Seigniour ſent in purſuit of the Florentines, by great diligence ouertooke them in a port of Morea, and recouered all the prizes, [So their great wealth was like a dreame, when they awaked it vaniſhed:] And vpon the ſixteenth of Iune they returned and entered in triumph, towing in all the repriſed booty. It ſeemes they were become too rich to fight, and the Turkes, though ſuperiour in ſtrength and number, were content with the gaine, and glad not to force men alreadie ſpoyled, into diſpaire.

About the firſt of Iuly the Baſſa of Buda ſent poſt to the port, with aduice, that the emperors commiſſioners at Comaran had preſented certain articles, containing accounts & reſtitutions: which being ſent to him, he had receiued, but could not allow them; anſwering, That the Grand Seigniour did not treat with Merchants; Which had like to haue bred confuſion: but C that they were ſince entered into new conference, and had concluded in the generall, a reſolution to peace; with conſent that both parties ſhould haue time to ſend to their Maſters for freſh inſtructions in particulars. Whereupon he had diſpatched that meſſenger to the Port, to vnderſtand the ſence, & to receiue abſolute directions from thence. By him Bethlem Gabor did write a ſharpe Letter; confeſſing plainly (ſeeing he could not longer conceale it) that hee had made peace for himſelfe; but accuſed the negligence of thoſe Miniſters as the cauſe thereof: Firſt, That they would neuer conſtantly truſt his aduices of the opportunitie of the warre; but their Mufti and Booke-men, who were fitter to interpret their Law, than to iudge of the Word and matters of State. That he would be true to the Grand Seigniour, but yet not neglect himſelfe, when he ſaw how little care, avthority, and credit was giuen to him: D That the Letters written to him from the Vizier were ambiguous and irreſolute, but that diuers others had threatened him not to be the occaſion of a warre. And therefore, to proue himſelfe faithfull and true to his owne firſt counſels, he offered, That if the Grand Seignior would breake off the Treaty, and reſolue to vſe the time, that he was readie to march in ſix dayes warning. He amplified the proſperitie of the remaines of Manſfelts Army in Sileſia, the occaſion, and all other fit arguments to moue them to a change of thoſe degenerate councels of peace. But this was an art, to caſt the fault on others, for the concluſion of that which he had ſuffered to proceed, and beyond his power to remedie. Yet it much perplexed the Vizier, who excuſed himſelfe, and returned all the blame vpon the Lawyers, as men ignorant, by whom he had been ouerborne; and that he neuer conſented to peace or Treatie in E his owne iudgement, but had proceeded ſincerely according to his engagement, as far as he durſt, and, that ſo much his continuall Letters witneſſed for him; promiſing, that hee would cauſe a Conſultation to anſwer theſe aduices, and that he would not agree to any concluſion without the ſatisfaction of the prince and all others that were friends to the Port, and the reſtitution of the oppreſſed libertie. Which ſolemnly handled in a full Councell, and Orders diſpatched away as the finall reſolution of that State, to leaue the power of making peace, or breaking the Treaty, to the iudgement of Gabor and the Baſſa of Buda, wholly and without reſtriction.

What effects this would worke was ſomewhat vncertaine; but ſuch appeared the inclination of thoſe into whoſe hands the Treaty was now referred, that there was a ſtrong opinion, F the Emperour ſhould faile of the ſecuritie expected: Eſpecially becauſe the ouertures of peace which the Perſian made by his Embaſſador there ariued, together with their neceſſitie, had raiſed ſome ſhew of inclination to hearken to accommodation in thoſe parts. But it came aduiſed from the Treaty, That the Commiſſioners being met the ſecond time, the Imperials inſiſted vpon high termes, demanding a ratification of the old Peace of Zitwa, then expired, without any addition or diminution; and by vertue thereof, reſtitution of Vatz, ſtollen during that time: declaring they had no authoritie to proceed to any new negotiation. To G which the Turkes replied, That ſo much ceremonie needed not, to appoint a ſolemne meeting to confirme that which two Letters onely from their Princes might haue done: That that truce being run out, was no longer in vigor nor in being. If they would treat a new peace, that they were ready; but to expect any reſtitution, or reuiuing of the old, it was in vaine, and their meeting fruitleſſe. And the Germanes as ſtiffely preſſing their owne propoſitions, the Conference was for a while interrupted, and a current rumour ſpread, The Conuention was diſſolued. But Morteſa Baſſa diſcouering by diſcourſe, That the Imperials ſtood vpon ſo peremptorie points, as ſuppoſing that all the Forces were drawne into Aſia, and that the Grand Seignior could not ſhew an Army on that ſide; ſuddenly gaue order to all the troups that were ready about Buda, and in the frontier, to march to Peſth, and to ſhew themſelues H in the field. Whereupon the Germans began to mollifie, and were content to renew the Treaty. At a third ſeſſion they reſolued to employ the force of gold, and to winne Morteſa by corruption; to whom they preſented from the Emperour ſix thouſand Dollars, with promiſe of a greater reward. This Caſt changed all the Game; and he vndertooke both to diſcouer the deſignes of Bethlem Gabor, and to croſſe him in his Maſters Court.

The Miniſters of the Grand Seigniour hauing exhibited a ſecond complaint to his Maieſties Embaſſadour, for ſome wrongs done vnto his ſubiects in the Gulph of Perſia, he ſent vnto them this enſuing Command, to obſerue the antient Capitulations.

I

To all Gouernors, Admirals, Commanders of Ships,

Or other his Maieſties Subiects trading in the Kingdome or Gulfe of Perſia.

After our louing commendations:

The Engliſh Embaſſadours Letter to his Maieſties ſubiects trading in the Perſian Gulfe.

WHereas Aly Baſſa, Baſſa of Balſara, hath ſent his Letters to this high Port by the hands of two of his ſeruants inhabiting in thoſe parts; by them informing the Grand Seigniour, K
That the Engliſh nation trading in the Perſian Gulfe, in Ormus, Iaſques, Mumbrun, and other parts of the kingdome of Perſia, do make prize & take the Veſſels and Frigots of the ſubiects of the Grand Seigniour dwelling in Balſara, Laſha, and the coaſts of Arabia, trading to Meſchit, India, Goa, and Calicut; and that they make Slaues of all the paſſengers, Merchants or other, that they finde vpon the ſaid Veſſels, being ſubiects of this Empire. Further, That they do vnite themſelues with the Perſian (now in warre with the Grand Seigniour) aſſiſting him not onely with munition, but Veſſels & frigots; and that they help and teach the Perſians (enemies of this Port) to build Gallies, Galliots, and other Veſſels of warre, to arme in thoſe ſeas; prouiding them of Shipwrights and all other neceſſaries for the fitting of an Armado, thereby to inuade or beſiege the Port of Balſara, or Laſha, or to make incurſions vpon the territories of this Empire. Which actions being alledged to be contrary L to the Capitulations of his moſt ſacred Maieſtie, and to the publique Peace and commerce betweene theſe Kingdomes, I haue beene called before the Chimacham, Deputie to the Great Vizier, to make anſwer to theſe obiections, and to prouide ſome timely remedie, before thoſe proceedings ſhall giue further occaſion of diſcontent. To which accuſations I being able, concerning the fact, to ſay nothing; but that knowing ſuch actions to be vniuſt aud vnlawfull, and contrary to the will of his ſacred Maieſtie, and your Commiſſions and Inſtructions from the Companie and your Principals, for whome you ſerue: I do hope that herein you haue not offended, nor giuen any iuſt occaſion of lament, vnleſſe you haue beene thereunto by like acts of hoſtilitie prouoked. Notwithſtanding being vrged by the great Miniſters of this Port, and that it will require ſo much time to enforme his Maieſtie, and to ſeeke redreſſe by ſo long a courſe, (to whom neuertheleſſe the Grand Seigniour will write his Letters of complaint, M to require Iuſtice in ſuch caſe) and for the preuention of future euills of very great importance to the ſubiects of his Maieſtie (which you may eaſily conceiue) and for the declaration of his Maieſties ſincere and conſtant purpoſe to maintaine a good and iuſt Peace with the Grand Seigniour
& all his dominions, which I know to be his Maieſties royal wil: and that I make no doubt of your obedience

A dience to all his Orders and purpoſes, like good ſubiects that muſt anſwer your actions at the tribunall of his high Iuſtice; I haue thought fit and very requiſite to ſend you this our Declaration, and in the name of his Maieſtie to admoniſh and require you, That you preſume not to take or make prize of any of the Veſſels or Subiects of the Grand Seignior, trading in the ſea whereſoeuer; nor to make any ſpoyle of their goods, or hurt or detaine their perſons: nor that you intermeddle not in any inuaſion or attempt of the King of Perſia, to aßiſt him or his Armes againſt the ſubiects or Dominions of the Grand Seigniour, neither by ſea nor land, nor by prouiding them of munition, Shipwrights, or other Artſmen, to teach them the vſe of Gallies, thereby to inuade the territories or ſubiects of this Empire; but that therein you carry your ſelues neutrally and indifferently, betweene two Princes both in peace and amitie with his Maieſtie. Wiſhing you well to conſider, the inconuenience B which may ariſe to others, and the damage in time to your ſelues, by teaching a powerfull Nation to vſe their ſtrength in ſea-cauſes, of which they are now vtterly ignorant, and of which practiſe wee haue a lamentable example in theſe ſeas. And no way doubting, That like good ſubiects, you will conforme your actions and proceedings in thoſe Seas to the rules of his Maieſtie (for that ſuch is his will and pleaſure, In declaration whereof I haue affixed his Royall Seale) yet I am enforced to proteſt, That the contrarie will giue occaſion of much trouble and danger to your ſelues, and in the end loſſe and damage to your Principals.

Giuen in Conſtantinople the third of September, in the yeare of Grace 1627.

Halil Baſſa Great Vizier, ſent to the warre in the end of the laſt yeare, being arriued at Dierbecher, reſolued to enter Perſia (notwithſtanding that the King had an Embaſſadour at the Port treating of peace) and gaue order to certaine Beglerbeghs to make another inuaſion by Van; and did endeauour to draw Abaſſa Baſſa, with his Forces ioyned with the Georgians, to do the like on his frontier: who gaue good words, and hopes of due obedience. Whileſt theſe deſignes were in preparation, the Perſian by his Generall beſieged Achiska, a Citie of great importance neere Arzirum: Whereupon Halil ſent Diſlenk Baſſa of Natolia, with ſix other Baſſa's, to Abaſſa, to perſuade him preſently to performe his word, and to riſe and vnite his ſtrength with them. With theſe he ſent three thouſand Ianizaries vnder twelue Captains, D with his owne Letters; who being arriued neere the City, he appointed them to incampe, and ſent them prouiſion for a day or two, vntill he could put his affaires for his departure in order. Theſe reſting ſecure, in the night he ſet vpon them and cut them in pieces, ſome few eſcaping to the Port. Diſlenk and another, Muchmet Baſſa, were ſlaine; the Captaines that he tooke aliue, or came to him to treat, he ſent to the Perſian: whereby Achiska being in great diſtreſſe, and vnſuccoured, was preſently ſurrendred to the Enemie. This newes being brought to the great Vizier, the next morning he roſe with all his whole Army, laying aſide all deſigne againſt Perſia, and marched right to Arzirum; vowing to puniſh the Rebell, or there to end his life: who was ſtrong, fortified, victualled, prouided, and reſolute.

The Perſian beſiegeth Achiſca.

Notwithſtanding all the colours, proteſtations, and perturbations of the Prince of Tranſyluania, E That he would finde occaſion and quarrell to diſſolue the Treaty of Comaran, or that he would ſeparate himſelfe from the Turkes; yet at laſt he ſent his Embaſſadour Francis Micoſcrentz to the Grand Seigniour, about the later end of October, to acquaint him that the peace was concluded. And within a few dayes after, the Internuntio of the Emperor arriued with a branch of oliues at the Port: And this Embaſſadour and two Agents of Gabor went to the Chimacham with a Letter from their Maſter, vnder the Seale of great ſecrecie; of freſh aduice, That the King of Denmarke was vtterly broken and fled into certaine Iſlands, all his Countrey, and Germany proſtrate at the mercy of the Emperour (which newes the Imperials had formerly ſpread) counſelling the Chimacham to make an end of their peace with the Emperour, and to diſpatch and accept of any Conditions, and to ſend the Internuntio away
F with ſpeed and content; leſt the Auſtrians puffed vp with thoſe victories, ſhould take the aduantage of their delay, and preſent them worſe termes, or refuſe it abſolutely. Whereupon the Miniſters of the Port reſolued eaſily to peace; changing former Ænigmaticall Letters they had written, and huddled vp a haſty Concluſion. They added further, That the Princes of Germanie treated a Pacification, which was like alſo to take effect; and either way, that
the Bethlem Gabor certifieth the Port, of peace betweene him and the Emperour.

the Emperour would be at liberty to make warre vpon him. Whether they feigned the firſt G part, to accelerate the ratification; or feared the later, and that their Maſter ſhould therein deſeruedly be left out, was hard to iudge: but they onely by this office (which the Turke did beleeue was ſincere) merited of the Emperour the conſummation of what was done; and thereupon they Both made their attonement with the Emperour, according to their ſeuerall Capitulations.

What was the ſecret cauſe and reaſon of this ſudden alteration, Gabor hauing made all demonſtration, that he would continue the war; hauing proceeded euen to threats and proteſts againſt the Miniſters of the Port; and being irritated anew after the concluſion of his owne Treaty, by the complaints and practiſes of the Emperours Agents, to bring him into diſgrace or ruine; ſo that hee could repoſe no truſt in an enemie newly reconciled, H and ſo often prouoked; did breed much inquiſition, and many doubted ſome great miſtery, either of his reuolt wholly to the Imperiall part, or that he had ſome other high deſigne in Poland. But thoſe who were leſſe ſpeculatiue and curions, and looked onely vpon euident matter, concluded, That finding himſelfe betrayed and forſaken by Morteſa Baſſa, and that he could no longer diſguiſe his owne ends, which were, To oblige the Emperour to him for the Peace, if it were made; and to blinde the Turkes, to conuert their force and authoritie to better his conditions in the Peace; and that hee foreſaw ſo much renitencie and inconſtancie in them, to proſecute the warre, the vigour whereof depended vpon contingencies and the ſucceſſe of the Vizier in Aſia; that he reſolued to preuent, being preuented & diſcouered. For certainly if he had not roundly ſhut vp the occaſion, I by being the firſt that ſeemed to merit of both parts, in reconciling the difficultie he himſelfe had raiſed, he had been ſtript naked, and left in the ſtate of the Conſtable Count of S. Pol, betweene Lewis the 11 of France, and the Duke of Bourgundie. This onely was obſerued by all, That whatſoeuer the ends of Gabor and Morteſa were while they were vnited in counſels, they did ſuffer the Grand Seigniour to know no more than conduced to thoſe ends, and that they had power to change the reſolutions of the Port, with euery winde of rumor they pleaſed to obtrude; and that if Gabor had beene countenanced and nouriſhed in his hopes, to weare the Crowne of Hungarie (which was the ſcope of all his intentions) that he had credit and wit enough to haue moulded the Turkes (who ſaw the affaires of Chriſtendome onely through the glaſſe of his relations) to his owne deſignes; and that he would haue continued K the warre at his pleaſure; and they at whoſe coſt it had beene made, ſhould haue beene the leaſt and laſt, to know the internall motiue. For ſo it often happens, That great Princes and States haue beene inuolued in troubles, and ſhut vp with Peaces, vnder the ſpecious name of The Publique good, by the paſſions, deſignes, or ambitions of their Allyes or Miniſters, the cauſe and pretext being ſeldome rightly diſtinguiſhed.

It hath beene formerly intimated, That Gabor had ſecretly treated apart; and now the generall Peace being concluded, the Articles themſelues will moſt cleerely diſcouer, either to what ſtreights the Prince was driuen, or what were his intentions; the order of Time giuing place to that of Story, we haue choſen this period to publiſh them. L

Articles of Peace concluded betweene the Emperour of Germany, Ferdinand, and Bethlem Gabor Prince of Tranſyluania, in the moneth of December, 1626.

I. THe Prince of Tranſyluania doth promiſe, by the Faith of a Chriſtian, neuer to moue Armes or vſe any hoſtilitie againſt the Maieſtie of the Emperour, or the Houſe of M Auſtria, or their Succeſſours; much leſſe to enter into their Dominions with an Armie: Not to aid his Enemies, nor to keepe correſpondence with them: Not to plot any innouation in the Kingdome of Hungarie or other Chriſtian Countries; neither to ſtirre vp

and

A and prouoke the Turks or Tartars, or others, to inuade them: Not to entertaine nor aſſiſt in any euill Counſell againſt his Maieſtie, nor to giue eare to the requeſts and deſires of his Enemies; but rather to reueale all their conſpiracies and wickedneſſes which ſhall be made made knowne vnto him: and by all meanes to demonſtrate and ſhew a ſincere minde truly deſirous of Peace, and ſolicitous of the Common good.

That the Prince ſhall inſtantly depart with his whole Army out of the territories and cities II.
of the Emperour; and that he ſhall reſtore as well all goods belonging to the Imperial Treaſure, as thoſe of his faithfull ſubiects.

That he ſhall remoue from him the Rebell Mansfelt, and all other his Followers and adherents III.
B deſirous to inuade the Dominions of the Emperour. And that he ſhall not ayd any Stranger whatſoeuer, who at his inſtance hath entered into the territories of his Maieſtie with Count Mansfelt; to whom Letters of publique ſafety ſhall be giuen, that they may returne by twenty or thirty in a Troupe; with condition, That in no place of their retreit they ſhall ioyne with the enemies of the Emperour.

That ſeeing it is fit for the eſtabliſhing of the Peace, that the inhabitants of Countries IV.
and Cities belonging to the Prince, by the conſent of the Emperour, ſhould remaine during his life, in obedience and fidelitie to him; and that thoſe Inhabitants ſhould do homage to C the Emperour (ſauing their corporall Oath to the Prince) to keepe inuiolate theſe Articles:
That they ſhould haue leaue by Letters of full authoritie and power granted them by the Prince in their firſt aſſemblies and Conuentions, to make ſuch oath of Homage.

That at the ſame time of the performing of the Homage and Oath, beſides the Oath before V.
the laſt warre, they ſhall take a new, according to the agreement betweene the Prince and the Commiſſioners of the Emperour.

The Prince ſhall procure, that all places vpon the confines which were taken by the VI.
Turkes in the laſt warre, ſhall be reſtored: and that all Captiues on both ſides ſhall be ſet at D libertie: and that the Prince ſhall procure the freedome of all ſuch the Emperours ſubiects as ſhall be in the Turkiſh captiuitie.

That all the ſubiects of the Emperour, lately inticed and drawne to the ſeruice of the VII.
Prince, ſhall be free from their Oath: and if the Prince haue any of their Letters of obligation in his hands, that he ſhall reſtore them: And that theſe conditions confirmed, all other things formerly treated, ſhall remaine in their former ſtate and vigour.

That if any other difficulties ariſe, they ſhall be accommodated with fidelitie and quietneſſe, VIII.
by Commiſſioners on both parts: And that all thoſe who in the laſt commotion haue ſerued the Prince, ſhall be abſolued, according to the Treaty and agreement at Vienna.

E That all Inhabitants of Counties and Cities which haue ſerued the Prince, ſhall be abſolued; IX.
onely thoſe excepted who haue voluntarily taken vp armes againſt the Emperour, for whom he ſhall onely intercede: excuſing alwayes priuate men which haue done priuate wrongs, for they ſhall according to Law and cuſtome, ſeeke their reſtitution by Ciuile Action.

That all other Articles of peace concluded at Nichilsburg and Vienna, ſhall remaine in X.
their former vigour and force: except vpon the behalfe of the Emperour, the payment of thirty thouſand Dollars, and the care of the confines granted vnto the Prince. And that F all goods of the Emperours Clergy, poſſeſſed by the Prince, ſhall be reſtored, from the yeare 1619, till this preſent day: Except the Abbyes of Replana, belonging to the Seminarie of Strigonium; for which the Prince ſhall pay to the Emperor yearely fiue hundred Florens.

At the arriual of the Meſſenger ſent from the commiſſioners of the Emperor, to the Port, G with the newes of the concluſion of the Treaty, and the ratification on the part of Ceſar, he preſented this Letter.

The Emperours Letter to the Grand Seigniour, a little before the ratification of the Peace.

Ferdinand the ſecond, by the grace of God Emperour of Germanie, &c. We giue notice H hereby to your Maieſtie, That by the diligence and wiſedome of our Commiſſioners on both parts, all controuerſies which haue heretofore happened are well accommodated; and all iniuries and hoſtilities of the future preuented. Now for the better and more exact obſeruance of this our ſaid Treaty, we haue ſent vnto your Maieſtie our Internuntio Stephano Baloc, Captaine of Tata, to giue you notice of the Agreement betweene our ſayd Commiſſioners, and to preſent you with the Capitulations, ſeuerally ſigned and ſealed by them. Which we pray your Maieſtie to accept word for word; and hauing ſigned them with your Imperiall hand, that you will ſend them backe vnto vs with all expedition:
Not doubting but your Maieſty out of your benignitie and greatneſſe, will obſerue and keep I the ſame, as we vpon our part do promiſe euer to do.

rages

A rages done vpon the ſubiects of both Parties. Whereupon the ſaid Commiſſioners in the aforeſaid place did treat and conclude a good Peace for the ſpace of twenty fiue yeares, in the current yere of our great Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha the Meſſenger of God, 1037, and of the Venerable Chriſt, 1627, as appeareth by a ſealed Capitulation containing eleuen articles. And you alſo deſiring and accepting the good Peace for ſo long time, hauing ſent the ſacred Capitulation to our happy Port, by your eſteemed and honoured amongſt Chriſtians, Stephano Baloco, Captaine of Tata; deſiring in your Letter, that it may be obſerued word for word. And although we haue declared heretofore vpon our Imperiall part, that we would haue made new Capitulations; yet ſince it hath euer beene our Regall B cuſtome, affectionately to correſpond with the intentions of thoſe great Princes which profeſſe amitie, deuotion, and friendſhip to our high Port (by the immence fauour of God, the ſtay and refuge of great Lords and Princes;) We declare and demonſtrate our ſingular greatneſſe and magnificence, and approue ſufficiently, and hold lawfull the confirmation of the Peace for the ſpace of twenty fiue yeares, according to the ſaid Letter, beginning from the yeare 1627. Whereupon our high Order is giuen out in writing, for ratifying and confirming of theſe our new Imperiall Capitulations.

C Thus much is the Preface, according to the ſtile of that Court; That which followeth is the Capitulation, as it was accepted and ſent by the Grand Seigniour; tranſlated out of Turkiſh word for word, without any alteration.

That ſeeing the Peace eſtabliſhed formerly at Zitwa, Vienna, Comar, and Chiarman, hath remained in the ſame ſtate, and in the ſame articles, without any alteration, it ſhall not be violated by any new occaſion of contention. I.

D That the difference of Vatz, whereof is made mention at the preſent, ſhall reſt in the ſame ſtate that the Commiſſioners on both ſides ſhall agree. II.

That the new Forts built vpon the confines of Croatia, contrary to the Peace, ſhall be demoliſhed. To which purpoſe our ſaid Deputie Mehemet, and our Vizier Morteſa Baſſa ſhall meet vpon the frontiers of Buda with your Deputies, at the time appointed by the Treaty, and there vpon the places on both ſides ſhall cauſe to be demoliſhed the Forts built contrary to the Peace: wherein if they finde any impediment, they ſhall chuſe able and valiant men to performe and execute the ſaid ſeruice. III.

That after the approbation of this happy Peace, your great Embaſſadour ſhall come to E Comar, and ours ſhall repaire with our Imperiall Letters to Strigonium: and there one of them aduiſing the other, yours ſhall ſet forward to our happy Port, and ours ſhall aduance to you. For ſo it is agreed by our Imperiall Order, both carrying with them the new Imperiall Capitulations. IV.

That all complaints of Villages ſubiect to both parts, ſhall be layed aſide, and no violences, taxes, or contribution, contrarie to our former Conuention, ſhall be exacted: and all Forts built in the common confines ſhall be raſed: and reciprocally it ſhall be made knowne, according to the antient Treaty, what great men do dwell amongſt our Tributaries. F And for the execution of the ſixteenth and ſeuenteenth articles of the Peace of Zitwa, the tenth of Vienna, and the fourth of Comar and Chiarman (for ſuch was then the agreement) two Capigi Baſſa's of our high Port ſhall be deputed and diſpeeded, the one to this ſide, and the other to that ſide of the Danuby; and vpon your part you ſhall ſend two VI ſuch like qualified perſons to the ſame places: who being met together with the Deputies of Morteſa Baſſa and the Palatine of Hungary, ſhall rectifie all diſorders, and ſee that good iuſtice be done on both parties; for ſo it is our moſt high pleaſure. G

VI. That the Slaues which haue beene taken during this our Treaty ſhall be freed and ſet at libertie without paying any ranſome: and that thoſe who were taken before the ſaid Treatie ſhall be exchanged or redeemed, according to their qualities and eſtates; by the interpoſition of Morteſa Baſſa and the Palatine of Hungarie deputed for that purpoſe.

VII. For the good of poore people on both ſides, the Commiſsioners haue thought it fit to conclude this renewed Peace for twenty fiue yeares, from 1627. whereunto we haue giuen our Imperiall aſſent. H

VIII. That all Merchants and others our ſubiects on both parts, ſhall haue ſafe paſſage and conduct through both our dominions: and we haue giuen command to our Baſſa's, Beglerbegs, Generals, Beyes, and Captaines vpon our Confines, to apprehend, bring into iuſtice, and puniſh all ſuch as ſhall any way diſturbe or moleſt them contrary to the Peace. As likewiſe the Palatine of Hungary and other your Miniſters ſhall do on your part, if they finde any ſuch offendors.

IX. That our Beglerbeghs, Sanzackes, Captaines, and Gouernours; and your Generals, Commanders, and Captaines, ſhall vpon occaſion employ all ſuch Perſonages as are louers of the Peace and common good. I

X. That there ſhall be no damage or hurt done to any of our ſubiects in any of your Kingdomes or Dominions, neither by ſea nor land; as there ſhall none be done to yours in our Dominions.

XI. That all by-paſt wrongs, enmities, and vnkindeneſſes on both parts ſhall be forgotten and layed aſleepe: and that this happy Peace ſhall be ſincerely and firmely continued and kept inuiolate. K

Vpon condition that the Emperour performe and obſerue all the aforeſaid Articles, and that there follow no action from any Miniſters, contrary to the ſaid Peace; Wee promiſe and ſweare by God our Creatour, who made the whole world of nothing; and by the honour which we beare to our moſt high Prophet Mahomet Muſtapha, That there ſhall not be done during the whole terme of the ſaid Peace, the leaſt hurt or damage to the Subiects, Countries, Kingdomes, Caſtles, or Forts of the ſaid Emperour, by any of our Miniſters or Armies, nor to any Chriſtian ſlaues ſubiect to our happy Port. L

I haue choſen the Capitulations as they were ſigned by the Grand Seigniour; which though the Articles are very generall, and matters of the greateſt moment either referred, or not fully eſtabliſhed; yet being therefore aduantageous for the Turke, who would not deſcend into particular definition, becauſe by the vertue of former Treaties, all places ſurpriſed ought to be reſtored, and depredations ſatisfied, he would neither breake, nor yet oblige himſelfe to reparation: and indeed the difficulties were inſeparable by Turkiſh Law; for no place can be ſurrendred to the Chriſtian, where a Moſche hath beene erected; which was the caſe of Vatz: And the Emperour could not conſent to abandon his claime with charitie grounded on the Articles of Zitwa; ſo that both ſides were contented to be vnited, rather than pacified for the time, and both did thinke that they had the aduantage: The Emperor, In preſeruing his Title; The Turke, In not declaring. So the one part accepting the ſignature of the other, without diſpute, the bodies of the Treaties being very different, if not contrarie; yet ſo deſirous they were of peace, that they did wittingly ouerſee, one the arts of the other: and in effect, there was no firme Peace eſtabliſhed, but that either ſide might find firſt M

matter

A matter, and ground it on the Capitulation it ſelfe, when occaſion ſhall inuite them to breake. Therefore I obſerue, that it is not the letter, but the minde that makes a true Peace: and I am perſuaded, that the mindes of theſe Princes, howſoeuer neceſſitie hath reſtrained them, are ſo diſcrepant, that the firſt opportunitie will diſcouer them in their owne colours and nature. And this ſort of concluſion was moſt fit for Gabor (not to haue matters ſoundly examined and healed) who was principally ſafe by an ill intelligence, and maintaining of iealouſie and ſubiect of new diſcord betweene thoſe Empires.

Halil Baſſa riſeth from the ſiege of Arzirum.

Halil Baſſa Generall of the Army in Aſia, was forced in the meane time to riſe from the ſiege of Arzirum; and retyring, Abaſſa Baſſa followed him ſeuen dayes, and cut off all his Reare, and tooke his Treaſure, Cannon, and baggage, to the great diſcouragement of the B Turkiſh State. The Army afterward fell into mutinie, and ſought to ſtone their Generall. Whereupon he wrote to the Grand-Seigniour, That there was no more hope of obedience, vnleſſe the reuerence of his owne perſon did reuiue it. Yet he reſted at Tocat, and the ſouldiers disbanded and returned naked to the Port, as from an ouerthrow: and it was threatned, That thoſe which did ſtay with the Vizier, would bring him to Conſtantinople perforce; ſo that in the enſuing Spring, much trouble, if not a great deſolation, was preſaged. Yet it was reſolued to proſecute the warre: for though the renitencie of the Souldier, and many other impediments did perſuade againſt it, yet not to haue moued at all, was thought too plaine a diſcouerie of their owne infirmitie, and would too much encourage the Enemie; eſpeciall Abaſſa Baſſa, who had practiſed both the Tartars, Poles, and Coſſackes. Where- C upon Huſſeruph Baſſa a Vizier, and late Aga of the Ianizaries, was choſen conductor of the Militia, and ſent ouer the water to Aſia ſide with all prouiſion; much new ordnance was caſt, which the Grand Seigniour went in perſon to ſee in the Founders office; and from thence to the Arſenal, to giue order for the gallies. And it was concluded, That the new General ſhould march directly to Diarbecher to oppoſe the Perſian, and there remaine as Baſſa of the Prouince, with one diuiſion of the Army. But ſecretly he was made great Vizier, and the Seale appointed to be giuen him when he ſhould be on the way. This was done partly to ſaue charges, becauſe to that eminent degree appertained great expence in ſetting out; and partly for reſpect of Halil Baſſa in Tocat, that he might not ſeeme to be diſplaced in diſgrace, but that he ſhould ſurrender to the other, and retyre to the Port, ſaluo Honore. And when Huſſe- D ruph ſhould be declared prime Vizier, he had alſo order to change his wayes, but whither was not divulged: howſoeuer, it was iudged they could not attempt much that yeare, but onely make ſhew to keepe the field and the reputation of an army.

About the fifth of April Huſſeruph Baſſa was declared Vizier: who intended to march directly towards Babylon; for of Abaſſa they had enough the laſt yeare: Who had written a Letter to the Grand Seigniour, That he was his ſeruant and ſlaue, and would hold the Prouince for him; but if he ſought to force more, plainly that he would deliuer the poſſeſſion to the Perſian; againſt whom, as the great Enemy, if they would proſecute the warre, that he would do all ſeruice he could with his ſafety. And this was accepted as a full ſubmiſſion.

E Whileſt the Grand Seignior was thus buſied to ſettle the affaires of Aſia, and to reduce Abaſſa Baſſa to obedience; the Tartar Han was openly declared a Rebell, and Enemy to the Turkiſh Empire; and his brother Shachin Gheray hauing exacted a tribute of the Princes of Bugdania and Valachia, had receiued an ouerthrow of Cante-Emir a Tartar, his Æmulous, but obedient to the Grand Seigniour. Whereupon it was ſuddenly reſolued, to take Ghian Gheray (formerly depoſed) out of the Rhodes, and to ſend the Captain Baſſa with the whole Armado to eſtabliſh him Prince, and to diſplace the other. So that for that yere the Mediterranian was like to be free, & the Turkiſh Empire ingaged in ſo many troubles, that euery thing ſeemed to worke toward their ſubuerſion. But great Bodies haue ſtrong luctations, and die not with one fit, or by one blow; and ſuch was the miſerie and iniquitie of the Times, that F while Chriſtian princes contended for ambitious and enuious, rather than for iuſt quarrels; that none of them had leiſure to helpe to puſh forward that Enemy, which tottered by his owne weight; nor to vindicate the Chriſtian Honour; nor the Holy-Land, oppreſſed and poſſeſſed by a Tyrant, that onely ſubſiſted by their diſſentions: and I feare, the loſſe of the opportunitie hath loſt the Grace that gaue it; and that a common repentance wil requite a common ſinne and folly.

Hauing drawne out Hiſtorie for matters concerning the Temporall eſtate, and the reuolutions therein, vnto a period; it will not be impertinent nor vnprofitable, to make ſome relation of the Greeke Church, and the affaires thereof: which ſuffered many perturbations and aſſaults during theſe times, as if one Influence had diſpoſed all things to vniuerſall trouble: but the cauſes were farre differing. There are yet remaining vnder the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, Metropolitans and Biſhops, who liue with freedome of conſcience and Religion vnder the Grand Seigniour, and gouerne the Chriſtian Flocke, vnder their ſeuerall Iuriſdictions; and haue their antient churches, with ſome competent reuenue in their own poſſeſſion, teaching, preaching, and adminiſtring the holy Sacraments according to their owne Rites, without any moleſtation for matters of Religion. The preſent Patriarch is called Cyrillus, formerly gouerning the See of Alexandria, a reuerend and learned man, who hath deſired to reforme many errours, and enlighten much of the blindeneſſe of his Church; inſenſibly preuailing, for want of Lectures, Shooles, and Bookes, and by the mixture of Barbariſme. His reuenue, (though very good) and that of his Biſhops, not ariſing out of viſible lands and rents, but by ſecret contribution, and other duties; and the ſimplicitie of their life and habit, without ſhew or pompe, giuing no occaſion formerly to the Turkes to expect any profit by vexing them, as is vſually practiſed vpon other lay Chriſtians. They liued in great peace and tranquilitie; vntill of late yeares the Church of Rome, hoping either by the pouertie of the one, and the greatneſſe of the other, to force the Greekes to a ſubmiſſion, or perhaps, enuious of their quiet, to weary them by trouble, or to ſubuert them. To this end a Greeke Colledge was by the laſt Gregory erected in Rome, to breed vp the Youth of that nation; where they had liberty of all their owne Rites, onely acknowledging the ſupremacie of the Pope, which they muſt do: and that ground being layd, for poynt of doctrine it matters not; there is enough gained to make him that had ſworne obedience, to accept of all the reſt. By this foundation the Pope hoped to breed Proſelites enow in time to poſſeſſe all the Biſhoprickes, and to ſubdue the whole Church. For theſe Students returned admired men for their education and knowledge, and wanted not meanes to promoue their preferment; which was a great aduantage ouer the ignorant breeding and diſcipline of the meere Greeke. But by the foreſight and wiſedome of Cyrillus this plot taking little effect, as it did irritate the Pope and Cardinals againſt his perſon, ſo it did incite them to ſeeke other more powerfull meanes of corruption, or to ruine him. And both were put in practiſe. To this end a Congregation was erected to take care of the Eaſterne Church, and to direct the practiſes vpon it; whereof a principall Cardinall was made Protector: and many Conſiſtories were held, by which way to reduce the Greeke Church to obedience, or to root out all thoſe that oppoſed it. It was reſolued to make titular Biſhops of almoſt all the Sees (eſpecially in the Iſlands) where any Greeke Biſhop had reſidence; ſo that there were many Paſtors without a flocke. But theſe Emiſſaries being diſcouered to be ſupplanters and diſturbers of the poore Church, were alſo reſiſted, and ſome caſt into priſon; and ſome aſhamed of their empty honour, voluntarily returned. But all theſe deuices failing, they fell at laſt vpon the round and moſt aſſured way of force, to worke their ends by the Embaſſadours of Chriſtian princes of the Romiſh Religion reſiding at Conſtantinople, and the moſt potent of briberie and corruption: making vſe of the impotencie of the Turkiſh Miniſters, who they knew would ſell Mahomet himſelfe for gold: Flectere ſi nequeo ſuperos Acheronta mouebo. From this reſolution did all the danger and miſchiefe ſpring: and certainly the zeale of their Church is cloathed with ſo much honour and ſolicitouſneſſe, that in that onely it prouoked enuy. But whether they haue in this purſuit and cauſe proceeded with the rules of Chriſtian charitie, in that place among Falſe-Beleeuers, where euery ſcandall did concerne the honour of Chriſt himſelfe; or not, I leaue to the iudgement of euery ingenious man. And becauſe this Part, of the quarrels betweene the Roman and Greeke Church, though acted in ſeuerall yeares, hath beene related entirely by a ſincere Pen, in a Letter directed to a noble Senatour of Venice, whereby the paſſages will be more cleere and continuous, than if they had beene mingled and interrupted with other affaires; I haue rather choſen my owne eaſe and the Readers

A profit, by tranſlating that Letter, to ſerue it in all at once, than by pieces and fragments. The occaſion whereof ariſing (as I am informed) from the varietie of reports and printed pamphlets, of the laſt Act concerning the baniſhment of the Ieſuites, and a rumour ſpred, that they were reſtored: the truth whereof it ſeemes that Senator did deſire to know, and therefore prouoked ſome Friend to ſatisfie him. And ſo without other preiudice, I referre you to the Text it ſelfe following.

The Copy of a Letter written to a Senator of Venice, concerning the contentions betweene the Roman and Greeke Churches in Conſtantinople.

My Lord,

C YOur Letter hath layed vpon me a charge, that (if I were able to performe) is ſo full of enuy, and ſubiect to diuers cenſures, according to the preparations of the Hearers of a matter of that nature, that I would haue choſen to haue obeyed you in any other way, rather than in that of a Relator. For I perceiue by you, ſome preiudice is already gone out, and hath taken poſſeßion of a part of the world, harder to remoue than to teach a new hereſie. But hoping that you ſeeke the ſatisfaction of your owne curioſitie, and that you purpoſe not to controuert, I will not refuſe, againſt my owne reaſon, and little leiſure, to returne you aſſurance, how farre you haue power ouer them and me.

IT is now ten moneths ſince this conflict betweene the Greeke Church and the Ieſuits here fell out, but not the firſt time they haue been in trouble, impriſonment, and ablegation.
They were ſettled in Galata by the Grand Seigniours Licence, vnder the French protection, D about twenty fiue yeares ſince; in which time they had gotten a good Seat, builded much, gathered together a faire Librarie, and wonne greatly vpon the weaker Sect, and aged women and children. I ſpeake of the Greeks; for with the Romaniſts they had leaſt credit, who adhered to their antient Orders of Saint Francis and Dominicke; and were affraid that this new Societie would be too buſie, and caſt them into danger of their old priuiledges: for the Turkes are plaine, and yet raſh, and eaſily apprehend euery innouation.

The pretence of this Colledge was, To teach children for nothing, or charitie, Grammar, the Arts, and Tongues. And there being no open Schoole in thoſe parts, and few books for want of printing, the Greekes (who loue learning beſt, when it is beſt cheape) were content their children ſhould gleane tares in any field, to ſaue their purſes: and their wiues
E were wonne by eloquence & affabilitie, to open their ſins to them, who had more witty penances than Greekiſh ſhrift, Faſting, which did decay their beauty, and deiect their countenances.
But the wiſer ſort, eſpecially the Patriarch Cyrillus, and his Biſhops, diſcouered Anguem in herba; and did foreſee, That by this ſeeming benefit, the Youth of their Nation might be corrupted (Seruabit odorem teſta diu) and their owne boſomes tempted by the Daughters of Eue. And they likewiſe did feare, That vpon this foundation might be nouriſhed Proſelites to Rome, that in time would vndermine the whole Church. And therefore did as modeſtly as they could (to preuent an open diſſention) ſeeke to withdraw both from this bait of ſeducement. Hinc illæ lachrimæ: For when the Ieſuits did diſcouer they were diſcouered, they began to practiſe that by force which they had long deſigned. The firſt F open war brake out in Februarie, 1622; when theſe Fathers (protected by the French Embaſſadour) attempted to depoſe the Patriarch, and to place another Greeke in his Chayre, who had ſecretly ſubmitted to the Pope, and promiſed to render new obedience to the See of Rome.

Whereupon Cyrillus conſulted his friends, how to auoyd their enuy. He reſolued to proceed with mildeneſſe and charitie; and firſt to deale with the ſeduced Biſhop, as one of his owne Flocke: And the Sunday following hee preached and publiſhed the Counſels held G againſt him, and the danger of his Church; not naming the Ieſuites, otherwiſe than by admonition, to beware of certaine fierie Organs and Inſtruments, againſt whom hee ſhould be enforced to proceed with more ſeueritie, if they deſiſted not. And then being aſſiſted with foure Archbiſhops, and the Clergy preſent, he excommunicated that Greeke ioyned with his Enemies: hoping by this gentle Exhortation to the one, and Example on the other, to obtaine the bleſſing of Peace, left by Chriſt to his Church. The pretence of this quarrell and preſent diſdaine was publiſhed by the French Party, to haue root, becauſe that the Patriarch kept company with Lutherans and Heretiques, and therefore muſt needs ſauour of the ſame Leauen. This modeſt courſe did but exaſperate; for the Ieſuites hauing a Vizier fit for them, in Aprill following, by ſubornation of others, did accuſe Cyrillus H of a practiſe to betray an Iſland in the * Arches, to the Florentines; and by the promiſe of twenty thouſand Dollars for the eſtabliſhment of the excommunicate Biſhop, they preuailed to haue the Patriarch apprehended, depoſed, and ſent priſoner to Rhodes, where he ſuffered many miſeries and outrages, and their Friend to be placed in his Seat. But the Greeke Church, though they durſt not oppoſe the preſent furie, yet they would neither acknowledge Paſtorem qui non intrauit per Portam, nor reſort to the Cathedrall, nor contribute any mony to pay the fine due to the Grand Seignior vpon remoue. Vpon which the French relyed: for though they had promiſe from Rome of aid, yet it was not leuied. Whereby finding themſelues in a ſtreight, they made meanes to a ſilly Archbiſhop of Adrianople, who was I rich, to take the charge; the other willingly reſigning vnto him: who accepting the offer, aduanced part of the Symonie, and leuied the reſt by force of Turkiſh Commands vpon the poore Greekes; and ſo he was in appearance effectually ſeated. Their purpoſe was not long to ſuffer this man to continue, but onely to hold the See full vntill ſupply came from the Pope, and then to depoſe him, and place one fitted for their deſignes. By this mutation they hoped to recouer all the Greekes to the Catholique Cauſe, and Spaine. And in theſe changes the Patriarchie was robbed of moſt of the antient Manuſcripts and other Ornaments of the Church.

* Mare Ægeum.

In September following, Cyrillus by helpe of friends, and force of money, was reſtored to liberty, and returned to Conſtantinople. Where being arriued, all the Greekes flocked to K him: Which the Archbiſhop of Adrianople obſeruing, and knowing himſelfe an Intruder, (the true Patriarch neither reſigning, nor being Canonically depriued) ſecretly and voluntarily came and ſubmitted, and offered to ſurrender the charge to him. But Cyrillus not daring to accept it, vntill meanes were made to the State, or that he were recalled by a Synod, was content the Church ſhould be vacant, to ſee what would of it ſelfe emerge. The French Embaſſadour hearing of this ſudden defection from him, by the counſell of his Ieſuites fetched their Archbiſhop into his houſe, and encouraged him to reſume his place; promiſing him protection from the Pope, from the King his Maſter, and to ſpend fortie thouſand dollars for his ſuſtentation. And thus, partly by faire words abuſing the impotencie, and partly by force compelling him, they wonne the weake man to yeeld: and then the French Em- L baſſadour ſent his Interpreters and Ianizaries to re-ſeat him in the Cathedrall, and in Galata proclaimed him Patriarch, and threatened all thoſe that would not obey and acknowledge him. An inſolence full of proportion to the deſigne, to maintaine an ill cauſe by worſe means.

But the Clergie and people knowing the vnlawfulneſſe of this intruſion, and the vndue conſecration, and foreſeeing the ruine to come, if ſo pernitious example ſhould preuaile, did ſtill adhere to their old Paſtor. Which the new better weighing in his owne retyredneſſe, than in the French Houſe, where his ambition was fomented; and fearing that if Cyrillus ſhould recouer his iuſt right by the ſame way he had done his libertie, ſome greater diſgrace or puniſhment might fall vpon him; without further conſulting his high Protectour, in the night quitted the See, and came to his Patriach and caſt himſelfe into his mercy, asking ab- M ſolution; and vtterly renouncing French, Spaniſh, or Roman Factions, freely reſigned. Herewith Cyrillus encouraged, by the ſtrength of mony and friends was againe with the Letters of the Grand Seigniour reſtored, in deſpight of the Enemie, who now found himſelfe ouermatched. But this ſtrife did coſt the Greekes threeſcore thouſand Dollars, taken at Intereſt, A almoſt to the deſtruction of the Church, eſpecially to haue diſcouered to the Turkes a way to extort great ſummes by changes, from them, who formerly were eſteemed poore Monks: which will neuer be forgotten, and finally ruine the See. This was the effect of pretended zeale to Religion, and a Romiſh charitie.

Now all men hoped for peace; but there brake out another ſtorme. In Ianuarie following, a Coloyre was ſent from Rome, called Archemandrita, and was receiued by the French into his houſe; who brought a promiſe from the Congregation de propaganda Fide, That notwithſtanding the firſt faile for want of money, that now twenty thouſand Dollars ſhould be ready and returned thither; if they could make ſure the depoſition of Cyrillus, and place an obedient Sonne in his roome. To this end it was promiſed, that ten thouſand Dollars, B giuen by a widow in France to charitable vſes, ſhould by the Popes authoritie be conuerted. And thus new practiſes and new accuſations were aduanced; but being timely diſcouered, they were preuented: yet againe it coſt the poore Church a round ſumme of money.

The next yeare the perſecution was calmed in outward appearance, but more ſubtile and cloſe machinations ſupplied it: For it was then reſolued in Rome, to corrupt Cyrillus, and ſo to winne him: then to diſcredit him with his friends, and to lay him open and vndo him. To this purpoſe were ſent from Rome about Februarie 1624, two ſeuerall Agents, one called Padre Berillus, to ingage the Patriarch in a practiſe with the Coſſackes, which was treaſon: and a Ieſuited Greeke bred in the Colledge at Rome, named Cannachi Roſſi. To whom were giuen inſtructions vnder the hand and ſeale of Cardinall Bandini, to make ouerture C to Cyrillus of reconciliation, with great conditionall promiſes of ſupplies and this Comhelpe. But S^r^. becauſe you will beſt iudge of the ſcope of this negotiation, by the copy of miſſion, and from whence his hatred tooke root; I, that haue onely taken vpon me the part of a Relator, haue made it here a Parentheſis, and leaue your iudgement to collect your owne ſence.

Inſtruttioni per Canacchio Roſſi.

Inſtructions giuen to Cannachi Roſi. L

1 Hauing neither brought me Letters from the Patriarch, nor from any other Prelate, we cannot giue an anſwer other than by word of mouth, conforming to the relation you haue deliuered.

2 The Church of Rome hath alwayes deſired an vnion and peace with all other Churches, but eſpecially with thoſe of the Eaſt, (who haue heretofore ſo well merited of the Catholique Church) and not onely in antient times, but euen lately in the life of the Patriarch Hieromie, ſhe hath done what ſhe could poſſible, to aſſiſt and vnite the Greeke Church vnto her: not ſparing therein either coſt or labour: yea, to effect the ſame, ſhe hath founded, and doth yet maintaine a Colledge of yong Greekes with her owne reuenue, to the end that, that noble and ingenious Nation ſhould flouriſh in godlineſſe and learning, as in former ages it hath done. M

3 Concerning the propoſition of the preſent Patriarch, our Lord and Maſter the Pope (a Fauourer and Father of the Greeke Nation, as particularly your ſelfe haue knowne and ſeene) would disburſe a round ſumme of money to re-unite ſo noble a Member to the Church of Rome, and aſſiſt in

A in particular that See, vpon which the reſt of the Eaſterne Churches do depend. But conſidering the reports which haue been ſpread, and continually do come from Conſtantinople, of the Patriarch, wee do not ſee in what manner it can poſſibly be effected.

4 Concerning him, we are aduiſed, That he denieth the Inuocation of Saints, the Reall preſence of Chriſt in the Euchariſt, Free-will, the authority of Sacred Councels, Traditions, the authority of holy Fathers, the neceſſitie of Auricular Confeſſion, and in it, the reuealing of ſecret ſinnes: In ſtead of which he hath introduced a publique Confeſſion made to God in generall words. That he ſends yong men to ſtudy in the Engliſh and Germane Academies, where this Doctrine is taught and profeſſed: that by their meanes he may ſpread it in the Leuant. And to this end, That hee hath cauſed to bee printed, and that he himſelfe hath diſperſed and giuen to ſome Biſhops, certaine Catechiſmes full of B *this and other like erroneous Doctrine, condemned long ago, not onely by the Apoſtolique See, and the Councell of Trent, but euen of his owne Predeceſſours, as he himſelfe hath teſtified in that Confeſſion of Faith which he left many yeares ſince in the hands of the Archbiſhop of Leopoli, acknowledging this and the like doctrine for hereſie; and therefore concluding, That it was impoſſible, that the Greeke Church ſhould euer vnite it ſelfe with the Proteſtants. And that in contemplation of the Hugonot Embaſſadours (with whom he doth freely conuerſe) he hath taken away the * Sinodicon, and hath layed aſide the reuerence due to the moſt holy Euchariſt.*

* It ſignifieth an Aſſembly: I take it to bee the power of Excommunication. But enquire how it is vſed by the Romiſh Church.

5 His Holineſſe doth deſire, That all theſe reports were falſe; and that he being the Head of ſo noble a Nation, ſhould be ſuch a one as the preſent condition, both in matters ſpirituall and temporall of the Flocke vnder his Iuriſdiction doth require; that he might with a cheerefull countenance and ſafe conſcience extend his liberalitie and aid vnto him.

C 6 If theſe ſhall proue calumnies, and that the Patriarch doth thinke he can make his innocence appeare before his Holineſſe, let him iuſtifie himſelfe to the French or the Emperours Embaſſador: to whoſe relation (being perſons of great vertue and authoritie) credit and faith will be giuen: and by their meanes let him ſend to his Sanctitie the confeſſion of his Faith, in which he doth accept the Councell of Florence, and condemne the errours of Caluin and Luther, condemned alreadie by his Predeceſſours: And the Apoſtolique See will not be wanting in all fauour and aſſiſtance, to raiſe vp the Church of Conſtantinople, and all others on it depending.

7 That his Holineſſe will not require either of him or the other Prelates of Greece, any conditions but ſuch as were concluded and eſtabliſhed in the ſacred Florentine Councell; ſo that (according as the Grecian Church hath alway done) he condemne and anathematiſe the blaſphemies of the D Septentrionall Heretiques; to ſay, of Caluiniſts, Lutherans, and ſuch like. Rome, the xxj. of Februarie, 1625.

Cardinall Bandini.

The place of his Seale.

This Cannachi Roſſi became an vndertaker of his owne accord to merit of the Church of Rome, to conuert the Patriarch: who was amaſed at the boldneſſe, and feared both wayes; either to anſwer, and ſo to bee ingaged in pen-warre; or bee ſilent, and condemned as ſtanding mute. But at laſt he reſolued, That ſeeing the Cardinall vouchſafed not to write directly to him, to take no notice, but to ſee how patience would deliuer him out of this ſnare. But the Ieſuites content with no temper but preſent ſubſcription, ſtirred vp ſome Biſhops now made of their faction, anew to depoſe him; and there was offered twenty thouſand *dol*lars to eſtabliſh one of them. This Tempeſt forced Cyrillus to retyre and hide, vntill his Friends had reuealed to the State the miſterie of this forced practiſe, and opened the treche-F ry of both of theſe Miniſters, emploied only to introduce a change aduantagious to the Pope, and dangerous to the Grand Seigniour. Yet ſuch is the cuſtome of this Court, that his peace was againe bought at the expence of ten thouſand dollars.

Once more the Patriarch expected peace & ſecuritie; but the Congregation at Rome fel vpon a new counſel: Firſt, better to fortifie themſelues before they attempted their Enemies.

And to this end, vpon diuers pretences, it was reſolued to ſend hither an Anti-Patriarch from the Pope, qualified with abſolute authoritie, but vnder the Title of Suffraganeo Apoſtolico, and with him a Treaſurer for the Church (for Saint Peter durſt not truſt the French Embaſſadour with money) yet with theſe to ioyne him for his zeale, and countenance, and the Ieſuites for their counſell. To this Triumvirate was giuen all power to plant, diſplant, to ſow, and root out, and finally to do all things that might aduance the Roman Cauſe. For their better ſtrength and abetting, it was alſo decreed to create new Romiſh Biſhops in Smyrna, Naxia, and many Iſlands (a ſhift learned at Trent) to oppoſe the Greekes, and by aduantage of learning to ſupplant them. Of this miſſion there was great expectation.

About December, 1626, the Suffraganeo arriued at Naxia, whither the French Embaſſadour ſent the Biſhop of that place his Chapleine, and two Ieſuites to receiue him: who conducted him as farre as Scio, where hee was accepted with great ceremonie. But beginning his office too roughly and too ſoone (for he ſhould not haue declared himſelfe vntill he had crept hither vnder the French wings, and had been ſettled by degrees) many tooke offence at this noueltie. The Lay-men feared ſome preiudice in their right of patronage ouer the Churches: the wiſeſt foreſaw the danger of Chriſtian libertie, and that by their practiſes this innouation would inuolue all others into a ſuſpition of ſome conſpiracie: and if any ſcandall ſhould from hence ariſe, the Turkes would not diſtinguiſh betweene the guilty and the innocent, being in one liuerie by the name of Franke. Yea, the Friers could not endure a power ſo neere, aboue them, but refuſed him lodging in their Conuents. The Greeke Clergie began euidently to diſcouer the ſubuerſion of their authoritie, and antient Faith. Onely the Ieſuits triumphed, and thought the prize now their owne. But deſperation forced ſome, and charitie others to defend their poſſeſſions. Thus encouraged by ſtrong friends to oppoſe this fatall blow, all the plot was opened to the Vizier, and their deſigne quietly and without ſcandall fruſtrated. The Suffraganeo retyred without noiſe; their new Biſhops made by ſubreptitious Licences were impriſoned, their Letters of Priuiledge taken from them, to the extreame anguiſh and diſgrace of their Protector. This laſt repulſe made them furious; but Infeſtis animis deerat occaſio.

In Iune, 1627, here arriued vpon an Engliſh Ship one Nicodemo Mataxa, a Coloyre borne in Cephalonia: he brought with him the Greeke ſtampe made at his expence, and diuers bookes printed in London, as he pretended for the benefit of his Nation, drowned almoſt in inuincible ignorance, eſpecially for want of meanes to learne and ſtudy. As ſoone as hee came aſhore, and had ſpoken with the Patriarch, and made knowne his zeale to that Church, he was from him by the Archbiſhop of Corinth recommended to the Engliſh Embaſſadour, to aſſiſt this pious intention, to paſſe theſe heauy commodities through the Cuſtome-houſe without ſuſpition. In which though he foreſaw ſome trouble, yet he willingly vndertooke. But firſt conſulting with Cyrillus of Conſtantinople, and Gelaſius Patriarch of Alexandria, (then for his priuate affaires at the Port) and with the Reſident of the Vnited Prouinces, he was of opinion, That in a matter of that nature, which was in it ſelfe honeſt and iuſtifiable, it was requiſite to proceed openly and with leaue: which hauing obtained of the Vizier, hee tooke vp, and brought both ſtampe and bookes to his houſe. Now ſuppoſing all the difficultie had been ouercome, and neuer ſuſpecting any ſcandall from Chriſtians, for that which he thought did not, nor ought not to offend them, he gaue countenance and helpe to Mataxa to put his Induſtrie in order.

The Patriarch deſired the Stampe might worke in the Engliſh Houſe; but the Embaſſadour for priuate reſpects would not conſent, but offered to take a houſe, and to giue both it and them his protection. Which he did, not farre from his owne, and neerer to the French Embaſſadours: who pretending the vnion of the two Churches, there appeared no feare of him, that he ſhould enuy a Chriſtian worke, or do any act that might ſeparate them for euer. As ſoone as Mataxa was ſettled, and his print in order, the French and the Ieſuites tooke offence, as ſet vp to publiſh bookes againſt the Church of Rome, or at leaſt to take away their trade of teaching, and ſeducing children by his printing of Catechiſmes, Magna eſt Diana Epheſiorum. Firſt, they attempted to draw him into their gouernment, inuiting him to their Monaſterie; intimating, That adhering to them would take off ſome ill ſuſpition raiſed on him for hauing ſtudied in England. When he could not be wonne by flatteries, they reported

A him to be an Heretique and a Lutheran, becauſe he tooke ſanctuarie from the Engliſh. Againſt the ſtampe they excepted, at the Armes of the King of Great Britaine, which they ſayd was ſcandalous, and beeing in the Frontiſpiece of euerie booke, was malum augurium, and did foreſhew, that within they muſt ſauor of hereſie: for, What could be expected from an hereticall Fountaine, or from the Man that conuerſed with Heretiques.

These obloquies little moued the Engliſh Embaſſadour, who knew their malice proceeded from the matter of one Authour that wrote againſt the Supremacie. But the rage extended ſo farre, that it was reuealed to Mataxa, That hee ſhould be murthered in his bed, or in the ſtreet, as he paſſed in the night from the Engliſh to his owne houſe. Whereupon at his great inſtance the Embaſſador was content for his perſon to giue him lodging. So in the day B he continued his worke, and at euening retyred vnder protection.

Meleſiu, Pat Alex.

As yet they found no occaſion to worke their purpoſe: but the Patriarch ſent a little Treatiſe to the Preſſe, made by himſelfe (being an expoſition of the Faith, and Tenents of the Greeke Church, without any mention of Controuerſie, or cenſuring the opinions of others; principally to ſatisfie the world in thoſe calumnies ſpred, That hee had introduced new doctrines, to the ſcandall of his owne Flocke) which he had reſolued to dedicate to the King of England; but now hauing opportunitie to print it here, he prepared an Epiſtle fit for it. This prouoked the Ieſuites, who not able to endure any application of the Eaſt Church to that Monarch, could no longer containe themſelues, but conſpired with their Embaſſadours to ouerthrow both the Authour, Worke, and Workman; and hauing gotten another Booke C written by the Patriarch, printed in England, and brought by Mataxa againſt the Iewes, they found ſome paſſages which did modeſtly condemne the opinions of the Turkes. When they had this ſuppoſed aduantage, they practiſed with a Buffone, but a crafty knaue, who had credit with the Vizier, and had been Vayuod of Galata, to informe him, That this Mataxa was a Captaine ſent hither to raiſe ſedition, and that vnder the colour of printing books for children, he diſperſed others againſt the Alcaron; That they were brought from England ſecretly, and that the Engliſh Embaſſadour protected him and his deſignes: That theſe books were written by the Patriarch, to ſtirre the Greekes, and to draw them into defection; and many of them ſent to the Coſſacks, to prouoke them to vnite vpon the occaſion of the Grand Seigniors expedition into Aſia, that was then rumored.

These Accuſations were capitall, as they concerned Cyrillus and Mataxa; and ſufficient to D impaire the credit of the Engliſh Embaſſadour, if not to ruine him in the affaires for which he did reſide.

The Vizier without further conſideration reſolued to aſſault the houſe of Mataxa, and ſurpriſe him in the act of ſinne of printing againſt their Law; and gaue order to a Captaine and companie of Ianizaries to execute it. Which was out of courſe, to ſet at libertie vnruly Souldiers, that ſeldome containe themſelues within their Order, or can be appeaſed without booty. The exployt ſhould haue been done on Friday the fourth of Ianuarie: but the French Embaſſadour hearing the Engliſh had inuited the Patriarch, and Venetian Baylo, to ſome entertainment on the day of Epiphany, he ſtayed it two dayes, as he ſaid, to make ſauce to their E Feaſt. On that day at high noone, a hundred and fifty Ianizaries armed beſet Mataxa's houſe, & garded all the paſſages to the Engliſh: all was full of feares & rumor, and no man knew the cauſe. In this tumult, the Engliſh Embaſſadors Secretarie & Mataxa returning from church at Galata, paſſed by; and ſome of the Coloyres Seruants that were apprehended, ſhewed their Maſter, to free themſelues: but he being in a hat, and the Secretarie anſwering hee was one of his Lords Followers, he eſcaped ſafely, and got into the Engliſh houſe. The Captaine miſſing him the Principall, bound all his Seruants, brake open his cheſts, and carried all away, ſtampe, bookes, papers, plate, money, cloathes, and whatſoeuer was portable, as the goods of a Traitor, to the value of ſeuen thouſand Dollars. And returning thus full, a French * Drogaman told them, That the Offendor was fled to the Engliſh Embaſſador: but the Turke, that F had more charitie, anſwered, he had no order to follow him thither.

* Interpreter.

Now the Engliſh Embaſſadour thought himſelfe intereſſed; yet that day not to ſeeme to be moued, made as merrie as ſuch rumours would beare; That hee had practiſed againſt the State; others, That the Stampe was to counterfeit the Grands Letters; others, To make falſe money; and other ſuch as Ignorance and Accuſation beget among the Multitude.

The next day the Bookes were examined by two Greeke Renegado's, and the Folio by the Ieſuites noted where the blaſphemie ſhould be ; the place was interpreted before the G Vizier and ſome * Mulla's; but there was nothing found that by Law could touch the life of the Authour or Printer: yet the Patriarch was conuented, and many crimes obiected to him, without proofe or probabilitie.

* Churchmen and Lawyers.

There yet reſted ſome diffidence in the Vizier, at the report that Mataxa was a man of warre, and held correſpondence with the Coſſackes, and that he ſhould liue vnder the Engliſh protection; which was nouriſhed by ſhewing the Armes of England on the Frontiſpiece of that Booke. But when the Mufti had giuen ſentence, That euery doctrine againſt their opinions was not blaſphemie, nor criminall; and that the Grand Seigniour giuing leaue to Chriſtians to teach their owne Law, and to preach matters contrarie to Mahometiſme, it could not be thought but it was dayly done in their Churches, for which they were not puniſhable; H ſo they could not be culpable of treaſon for writing the ſame, ſo long as they did not ſcandall their Law, but onely oppoſe it. The maine Obiection being thus fallen, it was more eaſie to refell the acceſſaries grounded vpon it.

The third day the Engliſh Embaſſadour ſhewed himſelfe openly, and went to the Vizier, and profeſſed that he had receiued that Mataxa into his houſe, to keepe him from the furie;
but that he ſhould be ready to maintaine his innocencie. He put him in mind, That this buſineſſe and man accuſed, he himſelfe knew, that he was a gentleman a Colloyre, a ſubiect of the Senat, and preſented vnto him by the Venice Baylo; and that he had giuen leaue to land, and vſe the ſtampe, and that nothing was done without his communication and conſent: That therefore he much admired that he would be ſo raſh to ſuſpect his Friends, and ſo ſcandalouſly I to aſſault their houſes, to ſpoyle their goods at the inſtigation of thoſe whome hee had cauſe to know for Enemies; and to be ſo farre tranſported at the winde of an occaſion, without acquainting him, to ſend Souldiers that might haue done miſchiefe to be too late repented.

When the Vizier had called to minde the man, and all circumſtances, and remembred whom the matter concerned, (the Engliſh Embaſſadour, with whom he had confidence) he was aſhamed of his precipitation; and proteſted he had no doubt of him, nor purpoſe to affront him: That he wondered at the impudence of thoſe that had ſo groſſely abuſed him;
and concluded with this profeſſion (as the Engliſh Embaſſadour for his credit did publiſh)
That if againſt his will he had done him wrong, when he ſhould ſee all the goods of Mataxa K reſtored, their honour repaired, and thoſe that had procured this ſcandall, fallen into the ſnare they had made for others, and exemplarily puniſhed, then he deſired to be acquitted of iniuſtice, and to be eſteemed ſtill his true friend. By this office the Patriarch was wholly cleered, and reſtored to the good opinion of the Vizier, and after of the Mufti; to whom the Engliſh went immediately, to inſtruct him of the malice of the one part, and innocencie of the other.

The next day after the fury, Cannachi Roſsi the Agent of Cardinall Bandini, went to the Patriarch to braue him in aduerſitie: who mildely asking him, How long they would tempt his patience by wicked conſpiracies? and What had driuen them to this extremitie to ſeeke his life? he replied, That they were ſcandaliſed at him for two things; For fauouring Mataxa, L and ſuffering him to preach, being an Heretique, and liuing in the houſe of an Heretique.
Secondly, That he had begun to print a booke full of hereſies, dedicated to the King of England the Head of Heretiques. But if he would retract the one, and renounce the other, that the French Embaſſadour ſhould procure his accommodation.

With the next Poſt after this trouble, there came from Rome a copie of a Conſiſtorie, held in the houſe of Cardinall Bandini, entituled for Conſtantinople; wherein this practiſe againſt the Patriarch was debated and reſolued: the cauſe grounded vpon his conuerſation with Caluiniſts, and ſending of Students to be brought vp in their Schooles; that therefore he ſhould be accuſed of contriuing an inſurrection againſt the Ottoman Empire: And the execution M of this plot commended to the Embaſſadours of the Potentates reſiding in this court;
fauourers of the Catholique Cauſe. Which Councell being compared with the laſt practiſe, it did euidently appeare, that one was dependant on the other. Which the Patriarch well conſidering, and finding he had no more ſafetie in patience, reſolued to vſe his Friends to

ſend

A ſend them away that would not let him liue in peace. And the Engliſh Embaſſadour taking deepe offence at the inſolence of Cannachi Roßi, vſed to the name of his King; it is thought that they, together with the helpe of a good Friend no leſſe powerfull than either of them, vnited to baniſh the Ieſuites; and to ſhew their Protector, that they had not leſſe power to offend, becauſe they had leſſe malice and deſire to do it.

For the way they wrought (to omit other obſerueable circumſtances) it is true, the Engliſh Embaſſador was angry, and declared, and had good credit, and was ſeene often abroad; but he was not alone, for the Patriarch (that is a wiſe man) knew he ſtriued not now for victorie, but for life. The Ieſuites guilty of deſeruing a iuſt reuenge, retyred all to the French Embaſſadors houſe, where they lay hid about fourteene dayes; but in that time hearing no B noiſe, and hoping that all was ſecure, and that the Patriarch and Engliſh Embaſſador traueled onely in their defence, and to recouer their loſſes, they returned to their houſe triumphant; when ſuddenly we heard that a Meſſenger came to them, to let them know that ſome Greeke women were come to make confeſſion, and ſtayed for them in their garden. To whom two of them came downe, and were preſently arreſted by the Viziers Officers, who then entered their Lodgings, and apprehended another. This was done without any noyſe or ſcandall; and the Actors had ſuch care, that their Church was ſealed, all their Altars and plate ſaued, and whatſoeuer appertained to them inuiolated: onely their perſons and Librarie, per Legem Talionis, were carried to the Viziers houſe, where they were kept in irons about a moneth, and their bookes likewiſe viſited; in which were found much more aduantage C to haue drawne them within compaſſe of the Turkiſh Law, than their diſcouerie on the Patriarch. At the ſame inſtant Cannachi Roßi was alſo taken, and his papers in his Lodging, and carried to beare them ſad company. The French Embaſſadour deſired audience, but could not obtaine it; he viſited euery great mans port, eſpecially the Mufti, where hee had no other acceptance than admonition to carry himſelfe with more temper, and to meddle with the buſineſſe for which he was employed. He vſed all means, but could no where preuaile for reliefe; he threatened a breach of amitie, and to ſurrender his Capitulations, and interdicted the Traffique: But the Turkes were prouided with anſwers, That they would informe his Maſter the French King, and giue him ſatisfaction. In concluſion, the Ieſuites wearie, and in feare of death (for there was crime enough) they whom they ſuppoſed their D Enemies, to auoid ſcandall, and the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, interpoſed for them, and obtained their liues; and after many conſultations, it was agreed to baniſh their Order out of all the Grand Seigniours Dominions, to deliuer backe their bookes; and this grace at the interceſſion of thoſe of whom they had not merited that courteſie: that it might cleerely appeare there was no purpoſe of robberie, nor to take the goods that were innocent, and in the French Kings protection. In proſecution of which Councell, there were Commands ſent to Scio, Smyrna, Aleppo, and Cyprus, to diſcharge thoſe places from the practiſes of this Fraternitie, who had a deſigne to get the Sepulchre at Ieruſalem into their hands, and to ſupplant the Franciſcans: (which Controuerſie is well knowne at Rome, and would make a long Section in this narration) and finally they were put into a Barque, with good gard, in their E yrons, and ſent to Scio; with order to ſhip them and their fellowes vpon the next veſſel that went for Chriſtendome, and in the meane time to keepe them priſoners. When they came to the Caſtles on the Helleſpont, the French Embaſſador had procured, that the Caſtellane would not ſuffer them to paſſe for want of the Captaine Baſſa's Letter; and ſo they were returned to Conſtantinople, but ſtill kept in their gaole; and ſuddenly it was rumoured, they were reuoked, and ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed. But when the Vizier heard his authoritie was contemned, and this tricke put vpon him, he was ſo much enraged, that againe their liues were in danger. But the preſent fury appeaſed euen by their ſuppoſed Enemies, they were returned, baniſhed firſt to Scio, and ſo ſhipped for Italy. I muſt confeſſe, that I haue not obſerued any one ſorie but the French Embaſſadour, ſcarce his Houſhold; all other Catho- F liques, eſpecially the Orders of Friers, and the Franciſcans of Ieruſalem, were glad they were eaſed of their dominion, and the feares of their deſignes. And I haue heard it reported, That themſelues did ingeniouſly confeſſe an obligation to the Engliſh Embaſſadour; and in their Relations to Rome, layed all the fault vpon the precipitation of their Protector.

There was another Command ſent to Smyrna, to apprehend a couple that had crept in vnder the French Conſuls protection: who at firſt hid themſelues; but being aduiſed to giue G place, and a meanes opened to them to eſcape, fled ſecretly; there being no other purpoſe in their perſecutors, but to be rid of ſuch negotiating Fathers.

And thus Sr. you haue a true relation of what I haue obſerued, and for your ſatisfaction collected of thoſe that had better meanes to know particulars than I, who am buſie enough if I do mine owne buſineſſe. There reſts onely to tell you, That during the Engliſh Embaſſadors ſtay, which was about fiue moneths after, the French ſat downe and ſtirred not: but conſidering that his credit in France depended much from Rome, and from an opinion of his zeale to the Catholique Cauſe, and his power to ſupport it; hauing made the Colledge of Cardinals beleeue, that he would ſubdue the Greeke Church (wherein wiſe men thought he did diſſeruice both to the Cauſe and his Maſter: For the readie way to vndoe the Catholiques, H was to innouate any thing in their antient manner of life, gouernment, and priuiledges which they enioyed with their conſciences freely) he thought himſelfe vtterly loſt, if he did not do ſomewhat to recouer his reputation there, by a ſeeming reſtitution of the Ieſuites. Vpon which deliberation, hauing yet two of them refuged to his houſe, and hid there a moneth after the departure of the Engliſh Embaſſadour, he made petition to the Grand Seigniour, That his Chapleines might haue leaue to bury his dead, and doe other offices of their Function. Which being granted, it was publiſhed, That he had reſtored the Ieſuites.

And becauſe you are ſo curious to know all, and in what eſtate that reſtitution now ſtands, I will conclude with the true copy of the Command obtained; and leaue it to your iudgement, whether the breach be made vp ſo whole as is ſuppoſed. For euery plaiſter is not a I ſound cure.

The Grand Seigniours Command, directed to Aſſan Baſſa, Captaine of the Sea; and to the Caddee of Galata.

AT the ſight of this our high and Imperiall Signature you ſhall take notice, That the K Embaſſadour of France (by an Arz giuen to our happy Port) hath made vs to vnderſtand, That (their Law and Religion being not like to that of other Chriſtians which liue in our well gouerned Empire) they with our Imperiall Licence did procure to come from the Kingdome of France certaine* Religious men called Ieſuites. Who for the ſpace of twenty fiue yeares haue had their abode in the Church of Saint Benet appointed to them in Galata; and lately by ſiniſter enformation made againſt them, were ſent away to their owne Countrey: from which time the ſaid Church being ſhut vp, and hauing no other Religious who could aſsiſt in the neceſſarie offices of men ready to die, or dead; hath L *therefore petitioned for our noble Command. To which end (excepting alway the aboue named  Religious, *ſent away, and others, of other Nations) that hee may place in the ſaid Church ſuch perſons of Religious French, and French Religion, which are found at this preſent here, elect, and appointed by him, without moleſtation or iniury to be done vnto them by any whomſoeuer. Therefore in conformity to his requeſt, this my Command is obtained; and I doe command, That at the ſight of this my Imperiall Order, it be obeyed and executed; That becauſe, as is before pretended, the French haue not thoſe Religious who can performe the functions neceſſary for the dead (excepting away thoſe Religious M already baniſhed, and all others comming from the countries of our Enemies) that they may put into the ſaid Church ſuch perſons for Religious men, as are naturall Frenchmen, and of their owne Nation, which at preſent are found in Galata, and that ſhall by them be appointed;

A ted ; and that ſo long as they commit no faults in their charge, and that they practiſe nothing contrary to our Imperiall will, that they be of no man moleſted.

Vpon the obtaining this Command, the two Ieſuites in the French Houſe, were ſolemnly and with great oſtentation carried to San Benetto's Church, and placed there as the Embaſſadours Chapleines ; and an opinion ſpred, of an abſolute re-eſtabliſhment of their Order, and ſo it was divulged in Rome. But it was not ſuppoſed by the French, that this Copy ſhould be ſeene by any but himſelfe ; and then the Act would haue appeared as truth : but ſome critical and captious men here haue made many Quere's vpon this matter. Firſt they haue asked, B What then is the French Religion, if it differ from all other Chriſtians in the Grand Seigniours Dominions ; when in Galata there are fiue Romiſh Churches and Monaſteries, with French Capuchins, Dominicans, Franciſcans, and others ? Secondly they haue asked, What ceremonies are neceſſarie to a French man, in danger of death, or after it, that none of theſe Orders can aſſiſt or performe ? Againe they aske, Who are reſtored by this priuiledge, if the Religioſi ſupra nominati, and Strangers are excepted ? What is meant by French Religion, and the ſame Religion ? To which is anſwered, Firſt, that this new French Religion is onely Ieſuiticall, not approued by the moſt Chriſtian King, improued by the Sorbons, and reproued by all the louers of the liberty of the Gallican Church. To the ſecond, That they dying muſt be abſolued onely by a Ieſuite, or buried in his habit, or ſhut out of Paradice. C Againe they anſwer, they finde none reſtored but a new French Religion, and ſuch men as were perſonally then in Galata ; that is, two Chapleines onely to aſſiſt in caſe of death, but no Order of Ieſuites. And they finally conclude, That the French Embaſſadour hath more diſhonoured his Nation, to reſtraine their Religion to the Ieſuites ; and to the whole Clergy, to renounce all other Orders, than he hath done benefit to the Ieſuites, except he had need of ſome colour in ſtead of truth.

S^{r}. I will not comment at all ; to obey you, I haue gone thus farre extra prouinciam meam : And now I returne home to my ſelfe, to aſſure you, that I haue beene, and will ſo die,

This Trage-Comedie being ended, and a ſeeming Peace returning with the Spring : Whileſt the new Vizier marched towards Babylon, to ſettle the affaires of thoſe parts ; Sir Thomas Roe, then his Maieſties Embaſſadour reſident at the Port, procured His leaue to returne home, and was recalled : by whom the Grand Seignior writ this enſuing Letter to his Maieſtie of Great Britaine.

The Grand Seigniours Letter to his Maieſtie of Great Britaine.

TO the moſt glorious amongſt the greateſt Maieſties of the Princes of Ieſus, moſt reuerenced amongſt the People of the Meſſiah, ſole Director of the important affaires of the Nazaren Nation ; Lord of the limits of Honour and Power ; and Patron of F Grace and Authoritie, CHARLES, King of Great Britaine and Ireland ; to whoſe laſt dayes we wiſh all compleat and true happineſſe.

BE it knowne vnto your Maieſtie at the ſight of this Letter, That your Embaſſador Sir Thomas Roe, reſpected and beloued amongſt Chriſtians, to whom we wiſh a happy end; (being heretofore ſent to reſide as your Embaſſadour at our happy Port, to be watchfull ouer all offices of good correſpondence betweene vs, and that all requiſite termes of ho- G nour ſhould be fulfilled; and to renew the Mantle of our affection) hath from his firſt arriuall here, euen till this preſent, moſt perfectly attended vpon the charge impoſed vpon him; and in all his actions proceeded with extraordinarie diligence and induſtrie, for the high honour and great fame of your Maieſtie his Soueraigne. And now your Maieſty hauing ſent in his place, one of the chiefe of your moſt eſteemed, Sir Peter Wiche, to reſide at our Imperiall Port: and that the ſaid Sir Thomas Roe hath taken reſolution to returne to your Maieſty, with our Imperiall conſent: We ſend him vnto you with theſe our Imperiall Letters; hoping in the moſt high God, that when he is ſafely arriued with you, H out of your aboundant and innate clemencie, and your ſingular and ſincere goodneſſe, in reſpect of his good and faithfull ſeruice, that you will ſee him honoured and rewarded. And to the end that the great affection and loue which we nouriſh to your Maieſtie may be daily encreaſed, we deſire you readily to imploy your benigne care in the keeping and obſeruing of our Imperiall Capitulations, with euery Article therein contained; as we on our part will likewiſe do in all things that are meet to be done concerning their perfect obſeruation; whereof you ſhall finde a good and cleere teſtimonie by the future effects.

Giuen at Conſtantinople 1628. I

Though impertinent to the Hiſtory of Turkie, yet a conflict happening betweene the ſhip which tranſported Sir Thomas Roe into Italy, returning from Conſtantinople, and the gallies of Malta; I haue thought it would not be an vngratefull concluſion, to obſerue and record the mighty deliuerance of thoſe whom God is pleaſed to keepe; by communicating the copie of a relation made of that fight.

On the eleuenth of Auguſt, about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, the Sampſon being becalmed before Malta, the ſea as ſmooth as glaſſe, not a breath of winde; wee diſcouered K foure gallies to row from the Towne. They came vp all abreſt, right with the ſtarre-boord quarter of our Ship: which warned vs to fit ſailes and ſelues to fight, not knowing their purpoſe. When they came neere, the Admirall galley, without ſending boat, or ſpeaking with vs, made a ſhot, which fell ſhort: then rowing neerer, made another which did almoſt reach vs. And comming ſtill on, the Vice-Admirall gaue a third, all demy-cannon, that flew ouer vs betweene our maſts. Theſe we ſuppoſed they made to try the length of their ordnance, and to lie there for batterie; for they ſtopped, and piked halfe their oares. Whereupon we ſent them a culuerin ſhot, that grazed vnder the Admirals ſtarre-boord bow; and ſo we began a ſharpe fight betweene twelue and one. The Gallies were full of Cauagliero's and other men as they could ſtand: they lay on that quarter about three houres, changing L ſhot with vs, often hitting one the other. Then Captaine William Rainsborow (who behaued himſelfe with braue courage and temper) finding a breath of winde to giue the Ship motion; conſidering that he was a great marke on the broad-ſide, and the gallies very narrow, keeping their prowes ſharpe toward him, and that he could beare little vpon them, trimmed his ſailes before the winde, and brought them to a ſterne-fight; where they continued their batterie two houres more; and the Sampſon could then beare vpon them two whole culuerin in her Sterne-chaſe, and two tranſone culuerins in the Gunne-roome, and two Sakers in the great Cabbin; and by yawing of either ſide both her quarters, and ſome pieces forward on; this gauled them, and they found it not. Their manner of fight was, when they were all laden, they rowed vp, and brought all the maſts of our ſhip together, and then gaue all their M gunnes; hauing fired, they fell aſterne; and this in order, alternis vicibus: but yet we reached them. The Admirall of the gallies gaue eight pieces at once, ſo that ſhe appeared all fire; one demi-cannon of twenty fiue pound bullet, two demi-culuerin, fiue Saker and Minion. All the reſt were alike armed, and they plyed their ordnance very hard, and often dangerouſly.

Being

A Being aſterne at firſt, they ſhot at the maſts and yards of our Ship, and maimed them almoſt all in a line; hoping to ſee ſome fall, and then they had layn by vs. But it was ſo calme, that the maſts ſtrained not, though they were almoſt ſpoiled. The gallies helpt a man on the end of their after-maſt vane to obſerue where their ſhot fell; and ſent boats often off, of which one returned well waſhed. About fiue a clocke they pauſed, and the Admirall ſent to his Fleet: whereupon they tooke a reſolution, either to boord, diſmay, or ſinke vs; and came vp on our larboord quarter all abreſt, within piſtoll ſhot, and their ſwords drawne, and Trumpets ſounding; bidding vs Amaine for Malta. The Captaine cauſed one from the poope to waft them aboord, and anſwered a point of warre. Then began a hot fight, and too hot for them; for the Sampſon forbare, and gaue them not a ſhot vntill they were very neere, and al-B moſt vnder vs; and then poured in two Culuerin, and two demy-culuerin, and one Saker with a round ſhot and a caſe, that raked them fore and aft: and they hauing giuen vs all their gunnes together, began to fall againe aſterne. But we tasked and ſent them a broad ſide at parting; and ſo they lay, and renewed their ſterne batterie vntill Sun-ſet. What blowes wee receiued is in a note following. What harm the Enemie receiued we knew not: only this we ſaw, the Admirals foremaſt was ſhot by boord, his poope carried away into the ſea; one culuerin round ſhot and caſe that fell in the bow, and went out in the quarter through the bankes of Rowers; and many other that raked them through. The Admirall lay athwart a good ſpace to mend ſomewhat, and let men downe her ſides, and neuer came more vp: for that ſhot that brake out her poupe, made them all at once take in their flagges; which being an vn-
C uſuall thing, we coniectured that the Generall was ſlaine. And ſo they left vs, and hoyſing their ſailes, and rowing, made all haſte into their port, in ſight whereof they fought. The laſt ſhot they made came into the gun-roome of the Sampſon, the force being ſpent, yet hurt three men: and ſhe hauing a Culuerin laden, ſent it to take leaue of them, which raked the Admi-rall. When they came vp with vs, they did not expect ſuch bullets, but hoped to batter vs to the water out of our ſhot. They left vs at halfe houre paſt ſix a clocke; ſo that the fight laſted ſeuen houres. The gallies gaue the Sampſon foure hundred great ſhot, and hit her in the hull, maſts, yards, or rigging, with more than a hundred and twenty; and we ſhot fifty ſix whole Culuerin, and ſpent in all aboue ten barrels of pouder. Neuer gallies had ſo much aduantage of a time, nor did ſo brauely, but they were at their owne dores. By Gods grace we D had but one man a paſſenger ſlaine, foure hurt, and ſome bruiſed; but our ſhip terribly battered, her maſts, yards, ſailes, and ropes all torne. That night continued with little wind, and the ſea ſmooth, and we plugged vp our wounds the beſt we could. The next day wee were enforced to ſtand out of the way to the Southward of the Iſland Lampadoſa, when we found our danger: and there we lay fiue days without ſaile, to fiſh our maſts & yards, and mend our ſailes, and to make firme our breaches by, and vnder water. Which we could not haue done if it had not continued calme: for thoſe demy-cannon bullets of twenty fiue pounds made too great holes, and ſplit all plankes and timbers; and the Carpenter was forced to hang like a Tortoiſe vpon the water, and driue many nailes vnder the ſending of the ſea, waſhing him ouer contiuually; eight ſhot either with, or within three fingers of the water. So that if that night, or the next day there had been any ſea, we had neuer made this relation; for the pumps
E of our ſhip were as well exerciſed as the men. But God helped vs.

When we arriued at Ligorne, we vnderſtood of eighteene Knights of Malta killed in the Fight: but after, by an Engliſh man that came from thence it was knowne, That the Generall of the Gallies was ſlaine, and thirtie ſix Knights and Officers, and two hundred ſixtie foure ſlaues, Rowers and Souldiers. Which was too great an exchange for one Iew. But ſuch is the reward of arrogance, and ſhall be the protection euer of a good cauſe, and of them that truſt not in the broken reed of Fleſh, but in the Almightie God.

Courteous Reader, we heartily deſire you before you peruſe this laſt Continuation, to mend with your pen theſe following errours; which for want of time to tranſcribe a faire and perfect copy, and opportunitie to overſee the prooues before they were printed off, haue to our great diſcontent happened in the ſame. And then we doubt not but it will giue you your deſired ſatisfaction; eſpecially if you haue a regard rather to the matter, than the eſcape of a word or letter.

A briefe Diſcourſe of the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Empire: as alſo wherein the greateſt ſtrength thereof conſiſteth; and of what power the bordering Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, are in compariſon of it.

By RICHARD KNOLLES.

THe Hiſtorie of the Turkes (being indeed nothing elſe but the true record of the wofull ruines of the greater part of the Chriſtian commonweale) thus as before paſſed through, and at length brought to an end; and their Empire (of all others now vpon earth farre the greateſt) as a proud Champion ſtill ſtanding vp as it were in defiance of the whole world: I thought it good for the concluſion of this my Labour, to propoſe vnto
C the view of the zealous Chriſtian, the greatneſſe thereof; and ſo neere as I could to ſet downe the bounds and limits within the which it is (by the goodneſſe of God) as yet contained, together with the ſtrength and power thereof, as alſo in what regard it hath the neighbor princes bordering or confining vpon it, with ſome other particularities tending vnto the ſame purpoſe. All or moſt part thereof, although it be by the conſiderate well to be gathered out of the whole courſe of the Hiſtorie before going, yet ſhall it more plainely here together in the full thereof appeare, than by the long and particular conſideration of the riſing and encreaſe thereof be perceiued: not much vnlike the ouergrowne tree, at the greatneſſe whereof euery man wondereth, no man in the mean time either perceiuing or marking how by little and little in tract of time it grew vp to that biggeneſſe, as now to D ouertop all the reſt of the wood. The Imperiall ſeat of this ſo great and dreadfull an empire, is the moſt famous city of Conſtantinople, ſometime the glory of the Greeke Empire, but now the place where Achmat the firſt of that name, and fourteenth of the Othoman Emperors, acknowledging no man like vnto himſelfe, triumpheth ouer many Nations: a city fatally founded to command, and by the great Conqueror Tamerlane, of all others thought to be the beſt ſeated for the Empire of the world. In which city (taken from the Chriſtians by Mahomet the ſecond, by the Turks ſyrnamed the Great, and the Greeke Empire by him ſubuerted) as the Othoman Emperors haue euer ſince ſeated themſelues, ſo haue they wonderfully, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, out of the ruines of that ſo glorious a State encreaſed both their ſtrength and Empire, almoſt altogether fixed euen in the ſelfe ſame Kingdomes, E countries, and regions, as was ſometimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attaine to the vttermoſt bounds that that Empire ſometimes had, eſpecially in Europe; albeit that it hath oftentimes in pride thereof moſt mightily ſwolne, & in ſome few places thereof ſomewhat alſo exceeded the ſame. Amongſt the reſt of the Othoman Emperors, this great Monarch of whom we ſpeake (namely Achmat the firſt, which now raigneth in that moſt ſtately and Imperiall city) hath at this preſent vnder his command and Empire, the chiefe and moſt fruitfull parts of the three firſt knowne parts of the world: onely America remaining free from him, not more happy with the rich mines thereof, than in that it is ſo far from out of his reach. For in Europe he hath all the ſea coaſt from the confines of Epidaurus (the vttermoſt bound of his Empire in Europe Weſtward) vnto the mouth of the riuer Tanais, now F called Don, with whatſoeuer lieth betwixt Buda in Hungarie, and the Imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople: in which ſpace is comprehended the better part of Hungarie, all Boſna, Seruia, Bulgaria, with a great part of Dalmatia, Epirus, Macedonia, Grecia, Peloponeſus, Thracia, the Archipelago, with the rich Iſlands contained therein. In Affrica hee poſſeſſeth Conſtantinople the ſeat of the Turks Empire.

The greatneſſe of the Turkes Empire.

all the ſea coaſt from Velez (or as ſome call it Belis) De Gomera, or more truly to ſay, from the Riuer Muluia (the bounder of the Kingdome of Fez) euen vnto the Arabian Gulfe, or Red-Sea Eaſtward; except ſome few places vpon the riuage of the Sea, holden by the King of Spaine; viz. Merſalcabir, Melilla, Oran, and Pennon: and from Alexandria Northward vnto the citie of Aſna, called of old Siene, Southward: in which ſpace are contained the famous Kingdomes of Tremizen, Algiers, Tunes, and Ægypt, with diuers other great Cities and Prouinces. In Aſia all is his from the ſtreights of Helleſpontus Weſtward, vnto the great Citie of Tauris Eaſtward: and from Derbent neere vnto the Caſpian Sea Northward, vnto Adena vpon the Gulfe of Arabia Southward. The greatneſſe of this his empire may the better be conceiued by the greatneſſe of ſome parts thereof: the Meere of Meotis, which is all at the Turkiſh Emperors command, being in compaſſe a thouſand miles; and the Euxine or Blacke-Sea in circuit two thouſand and ſeuen hundred; and the Mediterranian coaſt, which is ſubiect vnto him, containing in compaſſe about eight thouſand miles. But to ſpeake of his whole territorie together; he goeth in his owne Dominion from Tauris to Buda, about three thouſand two hundred miles. The like diſtance is from Derbent vnto Adena. From Ballera vpon the Perſian Gulfe, vnto Tremiſena in Barbarie, are accounted little leſſe than foure thouſand miles. He hath alſo in the ſea the moſt noble Iſlands of Cyprus, Euboea, Rhodus, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, and others of the Archipelago. In this ſo large and ſpacious an empire are contained many great and large countries, ſometime moſt famous Kingdomes, abounding with all manner of worldly bleſſings and natures ſtore: For what kingdome or country is more fruitfull than Ægypt, Siria, and a great part of Aſia? What countrie more wealthy or more plentifull of all good things, than was ſometime Hungarie, Grecia, and Thracia? In which countries he hath alſo many rich and famous cities, but eſpecially foure, which be of greateſt wealth and trade; namely Conſtantinople, Caire, Aleppo, and Tauris. Conſtantinople for multitude of people exceedeth all the cities of Europe; wherein are deemed to be aboue ſeuen hundred thouſand men; which if it be ſo, is almoſt equall to two ſuch cities as Paris in France. Aleppo is the greateſt citie of Syria, and as it were the centre whereunto all the merchandiſe of Aſia repaire. Tauris, of late the Royall ſeat of the Perſian Kings, and one of the greateſt cities of that kingdome, from who it was in this our age taken by Amurath the third, hath in it aboue two hundred thouſand men. Caire amongſt all the cities of Affrica is the chiefe, leauing all others farre behinde it, (although that ſome make the city of Cano equall vnto it in greatnes) being as it were the ſtorehouſe not of Ægypt onely, and of a great part of Africa, but of India alſo; the riches whereof being brought by the Red-Sea to Sues, and from thence vpon Camels to Caire, and ſo downe the riuer Nilus to Alexandria, are thence diſperſed into theſe Weſterne parts: albeit that this rich trade hath of late time been much impaired, and ſo like more to be; the Chriſtians (eſpecially the Portugals) trafficquing into the Eaſt Indies, and by the vaſt Ocean tranſporting the rich commodities of thoſe Eaſterne countries into the Weſt, to the great hinderance of the Grand Seignior his cuſtomes in Caire.

The foure chief cities for trade in the Turkes Empire.

The Othoman gouernment meere tyrannicall.

The Othoman gouernment in this his ſo great an Empire is altogether like the gouernment of the maſter ouer his ſlaue, and indeed meere tyrannicall: for the great Sultan is ſo abſolute a lord of all things within the compaſſe of his empire, that all his ſubiects and people, be they neuer ſo great, do call themſelues his ſlaues, and not his ſubiects: neither hath any man power ouer himſelfe, much leſſe is he lord of the houſe wherein he dwelleth, or of the land which he tilleth, except ſome few families in Conſtantinople, to whom ſome few ſuch things were by way of reward, and vpon eſpeciall fauor giuen by Mahomet the ſecond, at ſuch time as he won the ſame. Neither is any man in that empire ſo great, or yet ſo far in fauor with the great Sultan, as that he can aſſure himſelfe of his life, much leſſe of his preſent fortune or ſtate, longer than it pleaſeth the Sultan. In which ſo abſolute a ſoueraignty (by any free borne people not to be endured) the tyrant preſerueth himſelfe by two moſt eſpecial means: firſt, by taking off all armes from his natural ſubiects; and then by putting the ſame and all things elſe concerning the ſtate and gouernment thereof into the hands of the Apoſtata or renegate Chriſtians, whom for moſt part euery third, fourth, or fift yeare (or oftner if his need ſo require) he taketh in their childehood from their miſerable parents as his tenths or tribute children. Whereby

The meanes whereby the Turkiſh Emperours preſerue themſelues in ſo abſolute a ſoueraignty.

A Whereby he gaineth two great commodities: firſt, for that in ſo doing he ſpoyleth the prouinces he moſt feareth, of the flower, ſinues, and ſtrength of the people, choice being ſtill made of the ſtrongeſt youths, and fitteſt for war: then, for that with theſe as with his owne creatures he armeth himſelfe, and by them aſſureth his ſtate; for they in their childehood taken from their parents laps, and deliuered in charge to one or other appointed for that purpoſe, quickely and before they be aware become Mahometans; and ſo no more acknowledging father or mother, depend wholly on the great Sultan; who to make vſe of them, both feeds them and foſters them, at whoſe hands only they looke for all things, and whom alone they thanke for all. Of which fry ſo taken from their Chriſtian parents (the only ſeminarie of his wars) ſome become horſemen, ſome footmen, and ſo in time the greateſt commanders of his ſtate and empire next vnto himſelfe; the naturall Turkes in the meane time giuing B themſelues wholly vnto the trade of merchandiſe, and other their mechanicall occupations; or elſe to the feeding of cattell, their moſt antient and naturall vocation, not intermedling at all with matters of gouernment of ſtate. So that if vnto theſe his ſouldiers, all of the Chriſtian race, you ioyne alſo his fleet and mony, you haue as it were the whole ſtrength of his empire: for in theſe foure, his horſemen, his footmen, his fleet and money, eſpecially conſiſteth his great force and power: whereof to ſpeake more particularly, and firſt concerning his mony, it is commonly thought, that his ordinary reuenue exceedeth not eight millions of gold: and albeit that it might ſeeme, that hee might of ſo large an empire receiue a far greater reuenue, yet doth he not, for that both he and his men of warre (in whoſe power all things are) haue their greateſt and almoſt onely care vpon armes, fitter by nature to waſt and deſtroy C countries, than to preſerue and inrich them: inſomuch that for the preſeruation of their armies, and furtherance of their expeditions (euery yeare to do) they moſt grieuouſly ſpoyle euen their owne people and prouinces whereby they paſſe, ſcarce leauing them neceſſaries wherewith to liue: ſo that the ſubiects diſpairing to enioy the fruits of the earth, much leſſe the riches which by their induſtrie and labour they might get vnto themſelues, do now no further endeauour themſelues either to husbandrie or traffique than they needs muſt, yea, than very neceſſity it ſelfe inforceth them. For to what end auaileth it to ſow that another man muſt reape? or to reape that which another man is ready to deuoure? Whereupon it commeth, that in the territories of the Othoman country, yea euen in the moſt fruitfull countries D of Macedonia and Greece are ſeen great foreſts, all euery where waſt, few cities well peopled, and the greateſt part of thoſe countries lying deſolate and deſart: ſo that husbandry (in all well ordered commonweales the Princes greateſt ſtore) decaying, the earth neither yeeldeth her encreaſe vnto the painfull husbandman, neither he matter vnto the artificer, neither the artificer wares to furniſh the merchant with, all together with the plough running into ruine and decay. As for the trade of merchandiſe, it is almoſt all in the hands of the Iewes, or the Chriſtians of Europe, viz. the Raguſians, Venetians, Genowaies, French, or Engliſh; the naturall Turks hauing therein the leaſt to do, holding in that their ſo large an empire no other famous cities for trade, more than the foure aboue named, viz. Conſtantinople, Tauris, Aleppo, and Caire: whereunto may be added Caffa and Theſſalonica in Europe; Damaſcus, Tripolis, and Aden in Aſia; Alexandria and Algiers in Affricke. In our countries here in this E Weſt part of Europe, of the aboundance of people oftentimes ariſeth dearth; but in many parts of the Turks dominions, for want of men to manure the ground: moſt part of the poore country people drawne from their owne dwellings, being inforced with victuals and other neceſſaries to follow their great armies in their long expeditions, of whom ſcarce one of ten euer returne home to their dwellings againe, there by the way periſhing, if not by the enemies ſword, yet by the wants, the intemperateneſſe of the aire, or immoderate paines taking. But to come neerer vnto our purpoſe, although the great Turks ordinary reuenues be no greater than is aforeſaid, yet are his extraordinary eſcheats to be greatly accounted of, eſpecially F his confiſcations, forfeitures, fines, amerciaments (which are right many) his tributes, cuſtoms, tythes and tenths of all preyes taken by ſea or land, with diuers other ſuch like, far exceeding his ſtanding and certaine reuenue: his Baſſa's and other his great officers like rauening Harpies as it were ſucking out the bloud of his poore ſubiects, and heaping vp ineſtimable treaſures, which for the moſt part fall againe into the grand Seigniot his coffers. Ibrahim Vizier

Foure things wherein the greateſt ſtrẽgth of the Othoman Empire conſiſteth.

The Turks ordinary reuenues, and why they are no greater.

The Turks caſualties more than his ordinary reuenue.

Baſſa (who liued not long ſince) is ſuppoſed to haue brought with him from Caire to the value of ſix millions: and Mahomet another of the Viziers was thought to haue had a far greater G ſumme. His preſents alſo amount vnto a great matter; for no Embaſſador can come before him without great gifts, no man is to hope for any commodious office or preferment without mony, no man may with empty hands come to the preſence of him ſo great a prince, either from the prouince he had the charge of, or from any great expedition he was ſent vpon;
neither vnto ſo great and mighty a Prince are trifles preſented. The Vayuods of Moldauia, Valachia, and Tranſyluania, before their late reuolt, by gifts preſerued themſelues in their principalities, being almoſt daily changed, eſpecially in Valachia and Moldauia: for thoſe Honors were by the grand Seignior ſtill giuen to them that would giue moſt; who to performe what they had offered, miſerably oppreſſed the people, and brought their prouinces H into great pouerty. In briefe, an eaſie thing it is for the great tyrant to finde occaſion for him at his pleaſure to take away any mans life, together with his wealth be it neuer ſo great:
ſo that he cannot well be ſaid to lacke money ſo long as any of his ſubiects hath it. Neuertheleſſe the late Perſian war ſo emptied the moſt couetous Sultan Amurath his coffers, and exhauſted his treaſures, that all ouer his empire the value of his gold was beyond all credit enhanced, inſomuch that a Chequine was twice ſo much worth as before: beſide that, the mettall whereof his gold and ſiluer was made was ſo embaſed, that it gaue occaſion vnto the Ianizaries to ſet fire vpon the city of Conſtantinople, to the great terror not of the vulgar ſort only, but of the grand Seignior himſelfe alſo. And in the city of Aleppo onely were in the name of the great Sultan ſixty thouſand Chequines taken vp in preſt of the merchants there, I which how well they were repayed we leaue for them to report.

The Turks Timariots of greater value than his reuenues.

Now albeit that the Turks reuenues be not ſo great as the largeneſſe of his empire and the fruitfulneſſe of his countries might ſeeme to afford, all the ſoile being his owne; yet hath he in his dominion a commoditie of far greater value and vſe than are the reuenues themſelues:
which is the multitude of the Timariots or penſioners, which are all horſemen, ſo called of Timaro, that is a ſtipend which they haue of the great Sultan, viz. the poſſeſſion of certaine villages and townes, which they hold during their life, and for which they ſtand bound for euery threeſcore duckets they haue of yearely reuenue to maintaine one horſeman, either with bow and arrowes, or elſe with targuet and launce; and that as well in time of peace as K war: for the Othoman Emperours take vnto themſelues all ſuch lands as they by the ſword winne from their Enemies, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, all which they diuide into Timars, or as we call them Commendams, which they giue vnto their ſouldiers of good deſert for terme of life, vpon condition that they ſhall (as is aforeſaid) according to the proportion thereof keepe certaine men and horſes fit for ſeruice alwaies ready whenſoeuer they ſhall be called vpon. Wherein conſiſteth the greateſt policie of the Turkes, and the ſureſt meane for the preſeruation of their empire. For if by this meanes the care of manuring the ground were not committed vnto the ſouldiers, for the profit they hope thereof, but left in the hand of the plaine painefull husbandman, all would in that ſo warrelike an Empire lie waſte and deſolate; the Turkes themſelues commonly ſaying, That whereſoeuer the grand L Seigniour his horſe ſetteth his foot, the graſſe will there no more grow: meaning the deſtruction that their great Armies bring in all places where they come. The inſtitution of theſe Timariots, and the taking vp of the Azamoglans, (for ſo they call thoſe children which are taken vp from their Chriſtian parents to be brought vp for Ianizaries) are the two chiefe pillars of the Turkes Empire, and the ſtrength of their warres: both which ſeeme to be deuiſed vnto the imitation of the Romans, as are diuers things moe in the Turkiſh gouernment:
for the Romane Emperours vſed their owne ſubiects in their warres, and of them conſiſted the Prætorian Armie, which neuer departed from the Emperours ſide, but were ſtill to gard his perſon, as do the Ianizaries the great Turke. And in the Romane empire lands were giuen vnto ſoldiers of good deſert, for them to take the profit of during their liues, in M reward of their good ſeruice and valour, which were called Beneficia, and they which had them, Beneficiarij, or as we terme them Benefices, and Beneficed men. Alexander Seuerus granted vnto ſuch Souldiers heires that might enioy thoſe lands and Commendams, vpon

ſtantine the Great alſo gaue vnto his Captaines that had well deſerued of him, certaine lands for them to liue vpon during the terme of their life. The like fees in France, which they called Feuda, were of temporaries made perpetuities by theſe their late Kings. Theſe Timariot horſemen in the Turkiſh Empire, ſerue to two great and moſt notable purpoſes: whereof the firſt is, That by them the Grand Seigniour, as with a bridle, keepeth the reſt of his ſubiects in euery part of his great Empire in awe, ſo that they cannot ſo ſoone moue, but that they ſhall haue theſe his Timariots as faulcons in their neckes; for to that purpoſe they are diſperſed all ouer his dominion and Empire. The other vſe of them (and no leſſe profitable than the former) is, for that out of them he is alwayes able to draw into the field an hundred and fifty thouſand horſemen well armed, ready to go whither ſoeuer he ſhall command them; with all whom he is not at one farthing charge. Which ſo great a power of horſemen cannot continually be maintained for leſſe than fourteene millions of duckets yearely. Wherefore it is to be maruelled, that ſome comparing the Turkes reuenues with the Chriſtians, make no mention of this ſo great a part of the Othoman Emperours wealth & ſtrength, ſeruing him firſt for the ſuppreſſing of all ſuch tumults as might ariſe in his Empire, and then as a moſt principall ſtrength of his continuall warres, alwayes ready to ſerue him in his greateſt expeditions. The number of theſe Timariot horſemen is now growne very great, taking encreaſe together with the Turkes Empire. It is reported, That Amurath the third, grandfather to Achmat that now reigneth, in his late warres againſt the Perſian, ſubdued ſo much territorie as ſerued him to erect therein fortie thouſand Timariots: and appointed at Tauris C a new receit which was yearely worth vnto him a million of gold. Theſe Timariots are in all accounted to be ſeuen hundred and nineteene thouſand fighting men, of whom two hundred and fifty ſeuen thouſand haue their aboad and dwelling in Europe, and foure hundred ſixtie two thouſand in Aſia and Affricke. Beſide theſe Timariots, the grand Seigniour had a great uumber of other horſemen alſo, vnto whom he giueth pay; which are his Spahi, Vluſagi, and Carapici of his Court, being indeed the nurſeries and ſeminaries of the great Officers and gouernors of his empire: for from among them are ordinarily choſen the Sanzacks, which afterwards, through their good deſerts, or the Sultans great fauor, become Viziers, Beglerbegs, and Baſſa's, the chiefe Rulers of that ſo mighty a monarchie. He hath alſo ſtill in his army a great multitude of other horſemen called Acanzij, being indeed but rurall D clownes, yet for certaine priuiledges which they haue are bound to go vnto the warres, being euen of the Turks themſelues accounted of ſmall worth or value in compariſon of the Timariots. He receiueth great aid alſo from the Tartar in his wars, as alſo from the Valachians and Moldauians, (vntill that now of late by the example of the Tranſyluanians, they haue to the great benefit of the reſt of the Chriſtian commonweale reuolted from him) all which are to be accounted as the Romans Auxiliarij, that is to ſay, ſuch as come to aid and aſſiſt him. And thus much for his horſemen.

Another great part of his ſtrength conſiſteth in his footmen, and eſpecially in his Ianizaries: in whom two things are to be conſidered, their Nation, and Dexteritie in armes. Concerning their Nation, ſuch of the Azamoglans as are borne in Aſia are not ordinarily inrolled E in the number of the Ianizaries, but ſuch as are borne in Europe; for they of Aſia are accounted more effeminate, as they haue been alwaies, more ready to fly than to fight: whereas the people of Europe haue euen in the Eaſt been accounted for better and more valiant ſouldiers, hauing there, to their immortall glorie, ſet vp the notable trophies of their moſt glorious victories. The ſouldiers of Aſia be called Turkes, after the name of their nation, and not of their countrey, (no countrey being indeed ſo properly called) and they of Europe, Rumi, that is to ſay, Romani, or Romans; as the countrey, eſpecially about Conſtantinople, is called by the name of Rum-Ili, that is, the Roman countrey, as it was in antient time, of the notable Roman Colonies therein, knowne by the name of Romania. Now as concerning their Dexteritie, ſuch male children are culled out from the Chriſtians, as in whom appeareth the F greateſt ſignes of ſtrength, actiuitie, and courage: for theſe three qualities are in a ſouldier eſpecially required. This choice is made euery third yeare, except neceſſitie enforce it to be made ſooner, as it happened in the late Perſian warre: wherein not onely oftener choice was made, but they were glad to vſe the Azamoglans alſo, a thing neuer before by them done: for thoſe youths, the children of Chriſtian parents, being by them that haue taken them handſome are appointed for the ſeraglio of the great Sultan himſelfe. All the time that theſe youths thus ſent abroad liue in the leſſer Aſia or other the Turks prouinces, they are not appointed to any certaine exerciſe, but ſtill kept buſied, ſome at husbandry, ſome in gardening, ſome in building, ſome in other domeſticall ſeruices, neuer ſuffered to be idle, but alwayes occupied in painfull labor; where after certaine yeares they haue been thus inured to labour H and pains taking, they are called thence into the cloiſters of the Azamoglans (for ſo they are called all the time vntill they be inrolled into the number of the Ianizaries) and are there deliuered vnto certaine ſpeciall gouernors appointed to take charge of them: who keepe them ſtill exerciſed in painfull worke and labour, entreating them euill enough, as well in their dyet, as in their apparell and lodging; they ſleepe together in large roomes, like vnto the religious Dormitories, wherein are lampes ſtill burning, and tutors attending, without whoſe leaue they may not ſtirre out of their places. There they learne to ſhoot both in the Bow they be moſt inſolent, and are feared of all men, yea euen of the great Sultan himſelfe, K who is ſtill glad to make faire weather with them. In their expeditions or trauell they rob the poore Chriſtians cottages and houſes, who muſt not ſay one word to the contrarie.

therefore ſuch execution is ſeldome done, and that very ſecretly. They haue a thouſand roialties:
ſome of them are appointed to the keeping of Embaſſadors ſent from forrein princes:
other ſome of them are aſſigned to accompany ſtrangers, trauellers, eſpecially them that be men of the better ſort, to the intent they may ſafely paſſe in the Turks dominions; for which ſeruice they are commonly well rewarded. They haue made choice of their Prince, namely L of Selymus the firſt, his father Baiazet yet liuing; neither can any the Turkes Sultans account themſelues fully inueſted in the Imperial dignity, or aſſured of their eſtate, vntill they be by them approued and proclaimed. Euerie one of their Sultans at his firſt comming to the Empire doth giue them ſome great largeſſe, and ſometime the better to pleaſe them, encreaſeth alſo their pay. In euery great expedition ſome of them goeth forth with their Aga, or his Lieutenant, and are the laſt of all that fight. There is no office among the Turkes that moe enuie at, than at the office of the Aga of the Ianizaries, for the greatneſſe of his authoritie and command: onely hee and the Beglerbeg of Grecia chuſe not their owne and ſo occaſion ſought for to take him out of the way. The number of the Ianizaries of the Court is betwixt ten and fourteene thouſand. This warrelike Order of ſoldiers is in theſe our days much imbaſed: for now natural Turks are taken in for Ianizaries, as are alſo

ſo

A for the people of Aſia; whereas in former times none were admitted into that Order but the Chriſtians of Europe onely: beſide that, they marrie wiues alſo, contrary to their antient cuſtome, which is not now forbidden them. And becauſe of their long lying ſtill at Conſtantinople (a city abounding with all manner of pleaſure) they are become much more effeminate and ſloathfull, but withall moſt inſolent, or more truly to ſay, intollerable. It is commonly reported, the ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire to conſiſt in this Order of the Ianizaries: which is not altogether ſo; for albeit that they be indeed the Turks beſt footmen, and ſureſt gard of the great Sultans perſon, yet vndoubtedly the greateſt ſtrength of his ſtate and empire reſteth nothing ſo much in them, as in the great multitude of his horſemen, eſpecially his Timariots. Beſide theſe Ianizaries, the Turkiſh Emperour hath a great number of baſe footmen, whom B the Turks call Aſapi, better acquainted with the ſpade than with the ſword, ſeruing rather to the wearying of their enemies with their multitude, than the vanquiſhing of them with their valour: with whoſe dead bodies the Ianizaries vſe to fil vp the ditches of townes beſieged, or to ſerue them for ladders to climbe ouer the enemies walls vpon. But as the Romans had both their old Legionarie, and other vntrained ſouldiers which they called Tirones; of whom the firſt were the chiefe ſtrength of their wars, and the other but as it were an ayd and ſupply; euen ſo the Turke accounteth his Timariot horſemen the ſtrength of his army, and the Acanzij (which is another ſort of baſe and common horſemen) but as an acceſſorie: and ſo amongſt his footmen he eſteemeth of his Ianizaries, as did the Romans of their Prætorian legions, but of his Aſapi as of ſhadowes. The Ianizaries are by none to be commanded, more C than by the great Sultan himſelfe, and their Aga: as for the Baſſa's, they much regard them not, but in their rage oftentimes foule entreat euen the greateſt of them. The Aſapi, as they are but baſe and common ſouldiers, ſo haue they alſo their ordinarie captains and commanders, men of no great place or marke.

The Turks Aſapi: what ſmall regard they are had.

The whole ſtate of the great Empire of the Turks is commanded by the great Sultan, by the graue aduice and counſell of his Vizier Baſſa's, which were not wont to be in number aboue foure, ſo prouiding for the ſecrecie of his high deſignes or important reſolutions, hardly by a greater multitude to be concealed: howbeit that the Sultans of later times haue had ſometimes moe, ſometimes fewer, as their pleaſure was. Theſe men are of all others in that empire the greateſt, and for their high places moſt honoured: vnto them euen the greateſt D princes that haue any thing to do in the Turks court, ſue and ſend their honorable preſents. By their aduice the great Sultan taketh his wars in hand, neither without them concludeth he any peace. They giue audience vnto the Embaſſadours of forreine princes, and from them receiue their diſpatch. The greateſt honors and preferments (which are many in that ſo great and large an empire) are all by their meanes to be obtained: which maketh them of all others to be ſought vnto. Some one or other of them are ſtill Generals ouer the great armies of the Turks, eſpecially in theſe their late wars, their three laſt Emperors neuer themſelues going forth into the field (excepting once that Mahomet the third for the maintenance of his credit with his men of warre) came downe into Hungarie, and there wonne the citie of Agria:) which leading of ſuch mighty armies is ſtill with great emulation and ambition of the Vizier E Baſſa's amongſt themſelues ſought after, as well for the great profit thereby vnto them ariſing, as for the honour thereof, which is of all other the greateſt. But leauing theſe great ones, the chiefe counſellors for his ſtate; the whole body of his ſo large and mighty an Empire (all in the hands of martiall men) is gouerned by other great Baſſa's, whom they by a moſt proud barbarous name cal Beglerbegs, that is to ſay, Lords of Lords, euery one of them hauing vnder him certaine Begs or Sanzackes, who are lords and rulers alſo ouer ſome particular cities and countries, with the Timariots therein; yet all ſtill at the command and becke of their Beglerbeg. In antient time there was wont to be but two of theſe proud Beglerbegs in all the Turks empire: the one commanding ouer all the prouinces the Turke had in Eu-F rope; & the other ouer all that he had in the leſſer Aſia, now of the Turks called Natolia. But the Turkiſh empire greatly augmented in Aſia by Selymus the firſt, and alſo afterwards much enlarged both in Europe and Aſia by Solyman his ſon, the number of the Beglerbegs were by him encreaſed, and in ſome ſort alſo changed: who although that they be all Beglerbegs, and that one of them (eſpecially in the time of peace) in the managing of his ſoldiers, and affaires of

of his countrey is not ſubiect to any other, but is onely at the command of the great Turke; G yet notwithſtanding in the time of warre, where the Beglerbeg of Romania is, all are obedient vnto him, as the chiefeſt of the reſt; inſomuch that none of them but onely he and the Baſſa of Natolia are called by the ſtately name of Beglerbegs, the others being then only called the Baſſa's of ſuch and ſuch places, as of Buda, Aleppo, and ſuch like; although indeed they are in nature Beglerbegs, and ſo written in their Records. For the more manifeſting of which their gouernment, as alſo that they which come hereafter may by comparing of that which is here written, with the ſtate that then ſhall be, ſee how much this great Empire in the meane time encreaſeth or diminiſheth, I haue thought good here briefely to ſet downe all the ſaid Beglerbegs, with their Sanzackes and Timariots, and as neere as I could (either by H reading, or the credible relation of others well trauelled in thoſe countries) together, and as it were at one ſhew, ſet forth the whole ſtrength and power of this ſo mighty an Empire, as alſo in what countries and prouinces the ſame is eſpecially placed.

The firſt and chiefeſt of all the Beglerbegs in the Turkiſh Empire, is the Beglerbeg of Romania or Grecia, called of the Turks Rum-Ili (as we ſay the Roman Countrey) the principal reſidence of whoſe Beglerbegſhip is at Sophia, a city of Bulgaria, ſo appointed for the commodious ſcituation thereof, for the better command of the reſt of the prouinces of Europe; I howbeit that he for the moſt part, or rather altogether abideth at the court: which the other Beglerbegs cannot do, for they are bound not to depart from the gouernment of their Prouinces: in which charge they ordinarily continue but three yeares onely, the great Sultan ſtil changing and altering them at his pleaſure. This Beglerbeg hath vnder his owne enſigne and command forty thouſand Timariots alwayes ready at his call, vnder the conduct of theſe and twenty Sanzackes following; namely the

The Beglerbegs of the Turkes empire in Aſia.

The Beglerbeg of

1 Anatolia, who hath his reſiance in Cutaie, the Metropoliticall city of the greater Phrygia (called in antient time Catyai) and hath vnder his enſigne and command thirty thouſand of the Timariot horſemen, with 12 Sanzackes.

2 Caramania, who hath his abode at Caiſaria (in antient time called Caſaria) a citie of Cilicia, and hath vnder him ſeuen Sanzackes, with twenty thouſand Timariots.

3 Siuas, who hath his abiding at Sebaſtia, a city of the leſſer Armenia, and hath vnder his gouernment ten thouſand Timariots.

4 Tocatun, who reſideth at Amaſia, the Metropolis of Capadocia, and hath vnder him fiue Sanzackes.

5 Dulgadir, ſometime part of the kingdome of Aladeules, and commandeth ouer foure Sanzackes.

6 Halep, commonly called Aleppo, a city of Syria, and one of the moſt famous marts of the Eaſt, who hath vnder his Regiment fiue and twenty thouſand Timariots.

7 Sham, otherwiſe called Damaſco, a moſt famous city of Syria, who commandeth ouer forty thouſand Timariots.

8 Tarapolos, or Trapolos, commonly called Tripolis, another famous city of Syria.

9 Maras, a city vpon the great riuer Euphrates, betwixt Aleppo and Meſopotamia, who hath vnder his command ten thouſand Timariots.

10 Diarbekir, otherwiſe called Meſopotamia, who maketh his abode at the city of Amida, or as the Turkes call it, Cara-hemid, who commandeth ouer twelue Sanzackes, and thirty thouſand Timariots.

11 Bagdat, or new Babylon, where he reſideth, not farre from the ruines of old Babylon, who hath vnder him forty thouſand Timariots.

12 Balſara, not farre from Bagdat, vpon the Perſian gulfe, who hath vnder his rule or gouernment fifteene thouſand Timariots.

13 Laxa, towards Ormus, and neere vnto the Perſian, hath vnder his regiment ten thouſand Timariots.

F

14 Gemen and Aden, two famous cities in Arabia Fælix, vpon the coaſt of the Red-Sea, who hath vnder him thirty thouſand Timariots.

15 Chebetx, or Zebet, vpon the coaſt of the Arabian gulfe, neere vnto the kingdome of the great Æthiopian King Preianes, commonly (but corruptly) called Presbiter Iohn.

16 Cyprus, who lieth at Nicoſia or Famaguſta, commanding ouer all that great Iſland, ſometime of it ſelfe a Kingdome. G

17 SchehereZul in Aſſyria, bordering vpon the Perſian, who hath vnder his gouernment ten thouſand Timariots.

18 Wan, a city in the confines of the greater Armenia towards Media, who hath vnder him twelue thouſand Timariots.

19 ArtZerum, or ErZerum, in the borders of Armenia towards Capadocia, about foure dayes iourney from Trapezond, who commandeth ouer twentie thouſand Timariots.

20 Teflis, neere vnto the Georgians, erected by Muſtapha Baſſa, General of Amurath the third his Army againſt the Perſian, in the yeare 1578.

21 Siruan, or Media, erected by the ſame Muſtapha, and at the ſame time, commandeth ouer all that great countrey, ſometime a famous kingdome. H

22 Temir-Capi, or Derbent, neere vnto the Caſpian Sea, taken by Oſman Baſſa the ſame yeare 1578: who hauing ſlaine Schehemet Chan his father in law, reduced that countrey into the forme of a Beglerbegſhip.

23 Cars, a city of Armenia the greater, diſtant from Artzerum foure dayes iourney, by Muſtapha Baſſa made a Beglerbegſhip in the yeare 1578.

24 Tſchilder or TZildir, in the confines of the Georgians, erected by the ſame Generall Muſtapha, in the ſame yeare 1579.

25 Faſſa, or Phaſis, in Mengrelia, neere vnto the Georgians, erected by VluZales the Turks Admirall, the ſame yeare 1579. I

26 Sochum, in the borders of the Georgians, erected by the great Baſſa Sinan, in the yeare 1580.

27 Batin, there erected alſo by the ſame Sinan Baſſa.

28 Reiuan, erected by Ferat Baſſa, Generall of the Turks Army, taken from Tochomac Chan the Perſian in the yeare 1582, whereof Cicala Baſſa was the firſt Beglerbeg.

29 Sumachia, in the countrey of Media, erected by Oſman Baſſa in the yeare 1583.

30 Tauris, a moſt famous city of Armenia the greater, ſometime the Regall ſeat of the Perſian kings, but of late taken from them by Oſman Baſſa, and conuerted into a Beglerbegſhip in the ſame yeare 1583. K

But theſe late erected honours, namely the Beglerbegſhips of Teflis, Siruan, Temir-Capi, Cars, Tſchilder, Faſſa, and the reſt gained by Amurath from the Perſians and the Georgians, although they containe a great territorie, are not of themſelues any of them worthie of thoſe proud titles, or yet able to maintaine the ſame (Siruan, Reiuan, and Tauris onely excepted) but were by the great Baſſa's, Muſtapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Oſman, Amurath his Lieutenants, for their owne greater honour, and the encouraging of them which were to defend thoſe their new conqueſts, erected, being indeed nothing either in power or ſtrength comparable with the other more antient Beglerbegs either in Europe or Aſia. But hauing thus paſſed through the great kingdomes and prouinces by the Turks holden in Europe and Aſia, with their proud honors therein, let vs go forward toward the South, to ſee what great kingdomes and territories they at this preſent hold in Africke alſo. L

The Beglerbegs or great Commanders of the Turkes Empire in AFRICKE.

The Beglerbeg of

1 Miſſir, who ſtill making his abode at the great city of Caire, hath vnder his command all the Kingdome of Ægypt, with ſixteene Sanzackes, and an hundred thouſand Timariots. M

2 Ceſair, in antient time called Iulia Cæſaria, but now commonly Algiers, where the Beglerbeg ſtill reſiding, commandeth ouer all that Kingdome, wherein are forty thouſand Timariots.

A The Beglerbeg of
3 Tunis, where he ſtill remaining as a Viceroy, commandeth all that great and large kingdome.
4 Tripolis, the ſeat of his Beglerbegſhip, by Sinan Baſſa taken from the Knights of Malta in the yeare 1551.

There are beſide theſe, two other kingdomes in Africke inrolled in the Turkes records as their owne, although they be not as yet by them brought into the forme of Beglerbegſhips, namely the kingdomes of Fez and Moroco, but are as yet holden by them as their tributaries and Vaſſals.

But hauing thus as it were taken view of the greatneſſe and forces of this ſo mighty a monarchs empire by land, and ſo in ſome ſort bounded it out, let vs conſider alſo his power by ſea. With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the gulfes of Perſia and B Arabia, moſt of his territories lying vpon the mediterranian and Euxine ſeas, or elſe more inwardly into the heart of Aſia neere to no ſea. Now for theſe ſeas, no prince in the world hath greater or better means to ſet forth his fleets than hath he: for the ouergrowne woods of Epirus & Cilicia, and more than they, thoſe of Nicomedia and Trapezond are ſo great and thicke, and ſo full of tall trees fit for the building of ſhips and gallies of all ſorts, as is almoſt incredible. Neither wanteth he ſtore of ſhipwrights and carpenters for the framing of that ſo great ſtore of timber, large pay drawing euen the Chriſtian ſkilfull carpenters and workemen into his Arſenals at Conſtantinople, Synope, Callipolis, and others. For proofe wherof it is worth the noting, that Selymus the ſecond in our freſh remembrance, the next yeare after that notable ouerthrow by him receiued at the Echinades (commonly called the battel C of Lepanto) rigged vp a fleet wherewith Vluzales his Admirall was not afraid to face the whole power of the confederate Chriſtian Princes at Cerigo. Neither hath the Turke euer wanted good ſtore of expert ſeamen after the manner of thoſe ſeas; for beſide thoſe hee hath in ſtore at Callipolis and Sinope, out of his gallies which hee hath alwaies in readineſſe at Lesbos, Chios, Rhodus, Cyprus, and Alexandria, and from the pyrats which he continually receiueth into the ports of Tunis, Bugia, Tripolis, and Algiers, he can and doth from them when need is, chuſe captaines, mariners, and rowers ſufficient for the manning and ſtoring of his fleet. What he is able ao do in thoſe ſeas was well ſeene in our time, by thoſe fleets which he had at Malta, Cyprus, the Echinades, and Guletta. He hath beſide of all neceſſary and warlike prouiſion aboundant ſtore, and of great ordnance to furniſh himſelfe withal both by ſea D and land an infinite quantity. Out of Hungary he hath carried away aboue 5000 great pieces, out of Cyprus 500, and few leſſe from Guletta, not to ſpeak what he hath more got from the Chriſtians in diuers other places alſo. What ſtore he hath of ſhot and pouder hee ſhewed at Malta, where hee diſcharged aboue 60000 great ſhot; at Famaguſta, where hee beſtowed 118000; and at Guletta, where in the ſpace of 39 dayes he by the fury of his great ordnance ouerthrew the fortifications which the Chriſtians had bin 40 yeares in building. So that to returne againe to our purpoſe, the Great Turke ſo well prouided of men, mony, ſhipping, and great ordnance, and hauing done ſo great matters at ſea as is before rehearſed, is not in reaſon otherwiſe to be accounted of, than as of a moſt mighty and puiſſant prince as well by ſea as land: which to be ſo, the greatneſſe of his Denizi Beglerbeg or great Admiral (commonly called E Capitan Baſſa, of whom we haue not yet ſpoken) well declareth. This great man hauing charge of all the grand Seigniors ſtrength at ſea, is alway one of the Vizier Baſſa's, not bound ſtill to follow the court, as the other Viziers be, but alwaies or for moſt part reſiant at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, ſo to be the neerer vnto his charge. He that now hath this honourable place is called of the Turks Cigala Baſſa, deſcended of an honorable family of that name in Genoa: who commonly reſiding at Conſtantinople or Callipolis, hath vnder him fourteen Sanzacks, all of them great commanders and men of great place: namely the

The princes as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, vpon whõ the great Empire of the Turke confineth, and of what power they be in compariſon of the Turke.

The Perſian too weake for the great Turke.

The greatneſſe, wealth, and ſtrength of this ſo mighty an Empire, as well by ſea as land, thus in ſome ſort declared, let vs now ſee vpon what princes it alſo confineth, and of what G power euery one of them is in compariſon of it ſo great and ouergrowne a State. The Turks toward the Eaſt border vpon the Perſians, acccording to a right line drawne by imagination from Tauris to Balſara: vpon the Portugals at the Perſian gulfe, and ſo there likewiſe toward the South: at the Red Sea, vpon the great Æthyopian King Precianes, commonly called Preſter Iohn: towards the South, in Affricke vpon the King of Moroco: and in Europe, vpon the kingdome of Naples, with ſome part of the Venetian ſigniorie: toward the North vpon the Polonians, and the territories of the houſe of Auſtria. Now to begin with the Per-ſian, the great Turke no doubt is in field too ſtrong for him, as by proofe hath beene oftentimes ſeene; for Mahomet the Great in plaine battell ouercame the valiant Vſun Caſſanes: Selymus the firſt, and after Solyman his ſon put to flight the noble Hyſmael and Tamas, the two H great and famous Perſian Kings: and now of late in our time Amurath the third by his lieutenants hath taken from the Perſians all Media, with the greater Armenia, both ſometimes famous kingdomes, together with the regall city of Tauris. That the Turke ſo preuaileth, is by reaſon of his footmen, which the Perſian wanteth; and of his great ordnance, whereof the Perſian hath neither ſtore nor vſe: and although the Perſians by valour of their horſmen haue ſomtime in open field foiled the Turke, yet haue they ſtill loſt ſome part of their country; Solyman taking from them Meſopotamia, and Amurath Media and Armenia. Neither did the Perſians alone feele that harme, and loſe their owne, but vndid their Confederates alſo; Selymus the firſt ſpoiling the Mamalukes of Ægypt and Syria, and vtterly rooting them from off the face of the earth; and Amurath by his lieutenants hauing brought to a low ebb I the warlike Georgians, both of them the Perſian Kings friends and confederats. Now is not the Turke ſo much too ſtrong at land for the Perſian, but that he is as much too weake at ſea for the Portugals; in thoſe ſeas I mean where their forces haue more than once to the Turks coſt met together in the Eaſt Indies: the Portugals hauing in thoſe rich but remote countries, many ſure harbours and ports, yea faire countries and territories abounding with victuals and all prouiſion neceſſarie for ſhipping, with ſome alſo of thoſe great Eaſterne princes their allies and confederats: wheras the Turke on the other ſide hath nothing in the Perſian gulf ſtrong, beſide Balſara; the ſea coaſt of Arabia which might ſtand him in beſt ſtead, hauing no more but foure townes, and thoſe but weake and of ſmall worth. So that there, as alſo in the Red ſea, it is a matter of exceeding charge and difficultie for him to ſet out any great fleet into K thoſe ſeas, for that thoſe countries are vtterly deſtitute of wood fit to make ſhips of. For which cauſe, thoſe few times that he prepared his fleets in the Red ſea (to haue cut off the Portugals trade into the Eaſt Indies) being not able to performe the ſame in the Perſian gulf, he was inforced to bring the timber for the building of his gallies out of the ports of Bithinia and Cilicia (out of another world as it were) vp the Nile vnto Caire, and from thence vp-on camels by land to Sues, where he hath his Arſenall, a thing almoſt incredible. And yet hauing done what he could, as oft as he hath made any expedition againſt them, he neuer gained any thing but loſſe and diſhonor: as in the yeare 1538 at the city of Dium; and in the yeare 1552 at the Iſland of Armuz; and after that at Mombaza, where foure of the Turks L gallies, with one galliot, which by the fauour of the king of Mombaza had thought to haue ſtaied in thoſe ſeas, were by the Portugals taken: who ſtill haue a ſpeciall regard and care that the Turks ſettle not themſelues in thoſe ſeas; but as ſoone as they perceiue them to prepare any fleet, they forthwith ſet vpon them, and to that end oftentimes without reſiſtance enter into the Red ſeas. Preſter Iohn, of whom although men ſpeake much, yet is hee nothing in ſtrength to be compared vnto the Turke, but far inferior vnto him both for commanders and ſoldiers, as alſo for weapons and munition: for that great prince hath a great kingdome without fortification, and a multitude of ſoldiers without armes: as appeared by the ouerthrow of Barnagaſſo his Lieutenant towards the red ſea; who hauing loſt all that ſea coaſt vnto the Turks, was brought to that extremitie, that to haue peace with them, he yeelded to pay vnto M them a yearely tribute of a thouſand ounces of gold. In Africke the Turke hath more Territories than hath the King of Moroco, otherwiſe called the Xeriſe; for hee poſſeſſeth all that there lyeth betwixt the red ſea and the kingdome of Fez: but the Xeriſe hath the better part, the richer, ſtronger, and more vnited: yet dare neither of them well make war vpon the other,
for

The Portugals too ſtrong for the Turke in the Eaſt Indies

Preſter Iohn too weake for the Turke.

The King of Moroco & the Turke both in doubt of the king of Spain.

for the neereneſſe of the King of Spaine, enemie vnto them both. Now then there remaineth the reſt of the Chriſtian princes bordering vpon the Turke; and firſt the king of Polonia. What theſe two Princes can do the one againſt the other, hath beene ſeene in ſome former expeditions, wherein the Polonian had ſtill the worſe: yet it ſhould ſeeme, that of later time the Turke hath not bin greatly deſirous to moue the Polonian too farre, for that being prouoked by diuers occaſions, (namely in the reigne of Henry the third, in the wars that Iohn the Vayuod of Valachia had with the Turks, many Polonian horſemen ſerued the ſaid Vayuod, though not indeed ſent from the King: and in the time of Sigiſmund the Polonian Coſſackes haue with diuers incurſions not a little troubled them: beſide the late motions of Iohn Zamoſchie the great Chancellour and Generall of the Polonian forces, for the ſtaying of the Tartars by the Turks ſent for) he hath been content to comport the ſame, and not with his wonted pride ſought to be thereof reuenged, as he hath for far leſſe vpon ſome other princes. And on the other ſide, the Polonians ſince the vnfortunate expedition of King Ladiſlaus, neuer tooke vpon them any warres againſt the Turkes, neither gaue ſuch aid as they ſhould vnto the Valachians their confederates, but ſuffered to be taken from themſelues whatſoeuer they had toward the Euxine or Blacke ſea: a thing imputed rather vnto the want of courage in their Kings, than in the Nobilitie of that Kingdome. Sigiſmund the firſt being by Pope Leo X. inuited to the warres againſt the Turks, anſwered them in theſe few words: Set you the Chriſtian princes at vnitie amongſt themſelues, and I for my part will not be wanting. Sigiſmund the ſecond ſo abhorred the wars, that he not onely declined the Turks, but prouoked by the Muſcouites, neuer ſought to reuenge the ſame. King Stephen (by the commendation of Amurath choſen King of Polonia) an indifferent eſteemer both of his enemies Forces and his owne, thought it a moſt dangerous thing to ioyne battell with the Turke, and yet in priuate talke with his friends, would oftentimes ſay, That with thirty thouſand foot ioyned vnto his Polonian horſmen, he durſt well to vndertake an expedition againſt the Turke: which he was ſuppoſed oftentimes to haue thought vpon. The Emperour, with the reſt of the Princes of the houſe of Auſtria, are by a longer tract of ground ioyned vnto this great empire of the Turks, than any one other prince of the world, and beſtow in fortifications and the maintenance of their garriſons, (wherein they haue continually aboue twenty thouſand horſe and foot) the greateſt part of their reuenues euen in the time of peace, much more in theſe their long wars: and with the German forces ioyned vnto their owne, are more carefull how to defend that they haue yet left, than how to recouer that they haue alreadie loſt, or to enlarge their empire. The Emperor Ferdinand with greater force than ſucceſſe vndertooke the vnfortunate expeditions of Bada and Poſſega: which ſo euill fell out, not for that his forces were not ſufficient or ſtrong enough, but for that they wanted agilitie and dexteritie. The truth is, thoſe his armies were ſtrong enough, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, but conſiſted for the moſt part of Germans and Bohemians, ſlow and heauie people, vnfit to encounter with the Turkes, a more ready and nimble kinde of ſouldiers. The Venetians alſo confrontier the Turks by many hundred miles, both by ſea and land, and defend themſelues rather by peaceable policie than force of armes: notably fortifying their ſtrong Holds vpon their frontiers, declining by all means the dangers and charges of warre, by Embaſſages and rich preſents, leauing nothing vnattempted (their liberty and ſtate preſerued) rather than to fall to wars. To ſay the truth of them, although they had both coyne and warlike prouiſion ſufficient, yet want they men and victuals anſwerable to ſo great a war againſt ſo puiſſaint an Enemie. There remaineth onely the King of Spaine, of all other the great Princes either Chriſtians or Mahometanes bordering vpon him, the beſt able to deale with him; his yearely reuenues ſo farre exceeding thoſe of the Turks, as that they are alſo probably thought to counteruaile the greateſt part of his Timariots: and his great Dominions in Spaine, Portugall, Naples, Sicilia, Millaine, Sardinia, and the Low-Countries (if they were with him at vnitie) able to affourd vnto him ſo great and powerfull a ſtrength both by ſea and land, as might make him dreadfull euen vnto the Great Turke when hee ſwelleth in his greateſt pride: but conſidering how his Forces are diſtracted for the maintenance of his warres at once in diuers places; as alſo for the neceſſarie defence and keeping of his ſo large and diſperſed territories, not all the beſt of themſelues affected to the Spaniſh gouernment,

The king of Polonia vnwilling to meddle with the Turke, or the Turke with him.

The Emperour with the reſt of the princes of the houſe of Auſtria, together with the aid of the Germanes, haue much adoe to defend themſelues againſt the Turke.

The Venetians by policy rather than by force, maintain their ſtate againſt the Turke.

The King of Spaine, of all other Princes that border vpon the Turk, beſt able to wage war with him.

why the Turke is not to bee thought inuincible, neither his power ſo ſtrong, as in ſhew it ſeemeth to be.

ment,he is not to be thought of himſelfe ſtrong enough againſt the vnited forces of the great G Turke,whenſoeuer they ſhall chance to be imployed vpon him. So that by this we haue alreadie ſaid, is eaſie to be gathered, how much the Turke is too ſtrong for any one the neighbor princes,either Mahometans or Chriſtians, bordering vpon him, and therefore to be of them the more feared. Yet leſt ſome miſtaking me, might thinke, What, is then the Turke inuincible? Farre be that thought from me,to thinke any enemy of Chriſt Ieſu (be his arme neuer ſo ſtrong) to be able to withſtand his power, either quite to deuoure his little flocke, rage he neuer ſo much about it. As for the Turke,the moſt dangerous and profeſſed enemie of the Chriſtian Commonweale, be his ſtrength ſo great, yea and haply greater too than is before declared (the greatneſſe of his dominion and empire conſidered) yet is hee not to be thought therefore either inuincible,or his power in deed ſo great,as it in ſhew ſeemeth for to H be: his Timariot horſmen(his greateſt ſtrength)diſperſed ouer his whole empire,being neuer poſſibly the one halfe of them by him to be gathered into the body of one army: neither if they were ſo,poſſible in ſuch a multitude long to be kept together,liuing vpon no pay of his, but vpon ſuch ſtore and prouiſion only as they bring with them from their Timari,neuer ſufficient long to maintaine them. Beſides that, the policie of his ſtate hardly or neuer ſuffereth him to draw aboue a third part of his Timariots out of his countries where they dwell, for feare leſt the reſt of the people,by them ſtill kept vnder,ſhould in their abſence take vp armes againſt him in defence of themſelues and their antient libertie: whereafter the greateſt part of thoſe poore oppreſſed Soules, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians in euery prouince of his Empire, awaiting but the opportunitie, moſt deſirouſly longeth. So that more than two I parts of them being alwaies to be left at home for the neceſſarie defence of the ſpacious borders of his ſo large an Empire, as alſo for the keeping in obedience of ſo many diſcontented Nations; it is a great matter, if he euen in his greateſt warres draw together of theſe kinde of ſouldiers the full number of an hundred and fifty thouſand ſtrong, making vp the reſt of his huge multitude with his Acanzij, liuing of no pay of his, but vpon the ſpoile of the enemy onely, the fifth part whereof they pay vnto him alſo. All which put together, what manner of men they be, and of what valour, not onely the ſmall Armies of the Chriſtians vnder the leading of their worthy Chiefetaines, Huniades, Scanderbeg, King Matthias, and others, haue to their immortall glory in former times made good proofe: but euen in this our age, and that as it were but the other day, the Tranſyluanian Prince, with diuers other captaines K and Commanders yet liuing, haue done the like alſo, as well witneſſeth the late battell of Agria, wherein the Chriſtians, in number not halfe ſo many as the Turkes, by plaine valour draue the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe, (with Ibrahim Baſſa his lieutenant General) out of the field, and had of him had the moſt notable victorie that euer was got againſt that Enemie, had they not by too much careleſneſſe,and vntimely deſire of ſpoile,themſelues ſhamefully interrupted the ſame. But thus to let his horſemen paſſe,the chiefe ſtrength of his footmen are his Ianizaries, neuer in number exceeding twelue or fourteene thouſand,yet ſeldom times halfe ſo many euen in his greateſt armies,except he himſelfe be there in perſon preſent in the middeſt of them: who beſide the ſmall number of them, in the time of theſe their L late voluptuous and effeminate Emperours, corrupted with the pleaſures of Conſtantinople, and for want of their wonted diſcipline, haue together with their antient obedience and patience, loſt alſo a great part of their former reputation and valour: all the reſt of his footmen filling vp the bodie of his populous Army, being his Aſapi, rather pioners than ſouldiers, men of ſmall worth, and ſo accounted of both by the Turkes and their Enemies alſo. So that all things well conſidered, his beſt ſouldiers being the leaſt part of his greateſt armies, and they alſo farre vnlike their predeceſſours the ſterne followers of the former Othoman Kings and Emperours, but men now giuen to pleaſure and delight, it is not otherwiſe to be thought,but that he bringeth into the field farre moe men than good ſouldiers,more brauerie than true valour,more ſhew than worth, his multitude being his chiefeſt ſtrength,his ſup- M poſed greatneſſe the terrour of his neighbour princes, and both together the very maieſty of his Empire. Which although it be indeed very ſtrong, for the reaſons before alledged,yet is it by many probably thought to be now vpon the declining hand,their late emperors in their owne perſons far degenerating from their warrelike progenitors, their ſouldiours generally giuing

The ſignes of the declining of the Turks Empire.

A giuing themſelues to vnwonted pleaſures, their antient diſcipline of war neglected, their ſuperſtition not with ſo much zeale as of old regarded, and rebellions in diuers parts of his Empire of late ſtrangely raiſed, and mightily ſupported: all the ſignes of a declining State. Which were they not at all to be ſeene, as indeed they be very pregnant, yet the greatneſſe of this Empire being ſuch, as that it laboureth with nothing more than the weightineſſe of it ſelfe, it muſt needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it ſelfe fall, and againe come to nought, no man knowing when or how ſo great a worke ſhould be brought to paſſe, but he in whoſe deepe counſels all theſe great reuolutions of Empires and Kingdomes are from eternitie ſhut vp: who at his pleaſure ſhall in due time by ſuch meanes as he ſeeth beſt, accompliſh the ſame, to the vnſpeakeable comfort of his poore afflicted flocke, in one place or B other, ſtill in danger to be by this roaring Lyon deuoured. Which worke of ſo great wonder, He for his Sonne or Sauior Chriſt his ſake, the glory of his name, and comfort of many thouſand oppreſſed Chriſtians, fed with the bread of carefulneſſe amidſt the furnace of tribulation, in mercie haſten, that we with them, and they with vs, all as members of one body, may continually ſing, Vnto him be all honour and praiſe world without end.
